Nancy Jo is a senior this year, and is now on the Colonnade Hall council; they decided they needed something fun to do in the dorms. Nancy Jo ran the game in South Cunningham a couple of years ago when she was an R.A. there. Cathy Wilcox started a big game in the Colonnades a few years ago, which helped build up the game's popularity.

After last week's game Nancy Jo said, "We were really surprised at the big turnout, because no one signed up. We had to start turning girls away because we had too many." There was a total of six teams for the girls and for the guys, plus score keepers. Each question had a number of points assigned to it, the team with the most points in the end won. The game was based on the T.V. version of the Newlywed Game. They were always close games. John Kersee and Scott Estes of first floor TABB won for the guys and Cindy Engelman and Lori Richardson of French won for the girls. They each received "Longwood College" mugs as their prize.

Nancy Jo says next month they are planning a family feud game. People will form teams, dress up again, and make up a family name to test their wits in the dorms and possibly in a campus-wide competition. The hope to have at least one game each month in the Colonnades, such as: the dating game, a field day, or an outdoor cookout. Nancy Jo expects a good turnout for the dating game because she says, "It's always real fun to watch people get embarrassed."

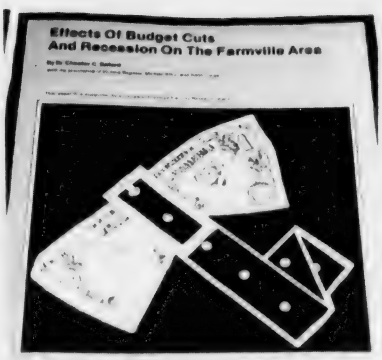
Study Released



By JOHNEL D. BROWN

Dr. Chet Ballard, of the Department of Sociology and Anthropology, and a team of three students have completed a 1½ year study titled "The Effects of Budget Cuts and Recession on the Farmville Area." The final published report of the study was released Friday, March 2.

Ballard, along with junior Vickie Beasley, senior Mike Ellis and 1983 graduate Keith Lucas, interviewed and collected data from 50 local leaders in Farmville. The research team worked to find out what effects the recession has had on the town, and compile that data to present a "portrait of the total impact on the community," according to Ballard. They pieced together not only economical effects, but also people's perceptions to produce a descriptive as well as a qualitative study.

The study was funded by a Faculty Research Grant of $520.

Copies of the report are available from the Department of Sociology & Anthropology.

German At Work In Sociology Department

Written by:
W. W. EDWARDS, III
Reported by:
JACQUELINE SMITH

Dr. Jurgen Nowak usually makes his home in the massive urban sprawl of West Berlin, Germany. For the '83-'84 school year, though, Dr. Nowak has put up his shingle here at Longwood as a visiting professor, under the auspices of the College of Social Work in West Berlin.

The Sociology department has been greatly augmented by Dr. Nowak's services as he is instructing in Sociological theory and other upper level Sociology courses. He comes to Longwood with fairly impressive credentials, having received his economics degree from the University of Berlin and a PhD in sociology from the Technological University of Berlin. In his college days, he traveled extensively throughout Europe and was fascinated by the languages and cultures that he saw. These experiences laid much of the groundwork for his interest in Sociology.

Presently, Dr. Nowak is working on a manuscript titled "Immigration and Minorities in Europe and America." Using the influx of Turks into his own native Berlin as a case study of immigrant minorities, he found an interesting corollary here in the U.S. with the Chicano immigrants of Baltimore. He recently visited Baltimore to see Chicano family life first-hand, and followed their activities from dawn to dusk. The manuscript should be finished in late April and Dr. Nowak says that a few publishers have shown a good deal of interest in the project.

Aside from the sociological observations he has made, Dr. Nowak has noticed some aspects of the American educational system that he feels are not quite up to par. One of the major inadequacies he feels is the lack of emphasis on foreign language in American schools. He notes that students in Germany are required to learn at least one foreign language, and most learn more than that. Dr. Nowak himself speaks English, French, Italian, and Spanish. He also can read Dutch, Swedish, Polish, and a little Russian.

One other item that caught his attention was the lack of enthusiasm and class participation in his classes here. He feels that the students, or at least the ones he has taught here, are too reserved in the class environment.

While he has found his stay here in Farmville enjoyable, it is somewhat of a change for him. Certainly the rural flavor of the Virginia countryside is a bit different from the heavily metropolitan West Berlin with its thousands of restaurants and discos, and heavy concentration of business and industry.

Nevertheless, Dr. Nowak has found ways to spend his free time while he is here. The massive quantity of books in his office testify to his love for reading, and he also manages to jog about six miles a week. Although he enjoys Longwood basketball games, he confesses that he does not understand football very well, as it is unknown in his country.

As an added diversion, Dr. Nowak's father is expected to visit during Spring Break. As his father has never been to the U.S. before, and speaks no English, he is sure that it will be an interesting experience. They plan to travel to Washington, D. C., Philadelphia, and New York during his father's stay here.

Dr. Nowak believes that upon his return to Germany at the end of the semester, he will be able to look at his experiences here in a better perspective, and he hopes to return to the U. S. in about two years. Although he will be glad to return to his wife and two daughters back home, he has enjoyed his stay here, and will certainly carry back many useful experiences and fond memories of his time here in the United States and at Longwood college.

The new policy is in reaction to the possibilities for an epidemic since for a period the serums used in the vaccinations were ineffective, or shortlived. The policy is a precautionary measure on the part of the college to prevent such a possibility.

Flu Outbreak

Southern and Southeastern campuses were swept with an outbreak of influenza in January and February. Most cases resulted from Russian Type A flu.

Karl Kappus, Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, said that this particular form of Type A first hit the United States in 1977. "There's not a heck of a lot anybody can do to prevent it.

Longwood College was also victimized by the epidemic. Barbara Agee, Student Health Services, said that they saw 790 students the last few weeks of January, and 600 students the first few weeks of February. Ms. Agee estimates that 500 of those cases were the flu.

She noted that "there were probably many students we didn't see, either because they went to local doctors, or they knew they had it (the flu) and that there was nothing they could really do about it."

Rock Of Ages

By PAUL GILLESPIE

As I cross the small bathroom bridging the distance between myself and my college suite-mate, I hear some power-charged, high-decibal guitar licks blasting off on the opposite side of the wall. I can't place the specific song that the guitarist is practicing. It could be a tune from Joan Jett, 38 Special or Journey. Whatever it is, it's aggresive, loud, professional and highly danceable. It is definitely not Memorex.

Ladies and gentlemen, meet Mark Bass, Christian rocker.

The 20 year-old lead guitarist for the rock band Ruth knew it was time for our interview, and obligingly set aside his guitar. Among the assorted posters on his wall was a picture of the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse and a poster of Bill the Cat from the biting "Bloom County" comic strip, a long-time favorite of his. Bass is a sophomore at Longwood College, Farmville, Va. with a passion for rock 'n roll, a devout faith in Jesus Christ, and deep disregard for accusations that rock is an exclusively sexual, morally harmful medium. "It can be anything you want it to be," he said. "It's like food. You can overeat or undereat . . . (Rock) can get sexual at times, though." Yet there's nothing sexual about the songs from Ruth, some of which Bass has written himself.

"Jesus, take this thorn away
Tell me what it takes.
'Christ has forgiven you, forgive yourself'
Everyone makes mistakes."
—Mark Bass, "Ghosts"

"There's a feeling of power that goes with singing or speaking in front of an audience," Bass said. "I think it's important to use that poser wisely."

When asked how his stand on Christianity compares with that of the Moral Majority, Bass had mixed feelings. "I'd say I'm not as conservative as they are," he said, although adding "I think we could do without the pornography and the alcohol . . . I think they're trying to do some good, though I'm not sure if I agree with their methods . . . If you want me to get specific, though, people like Jimmy Swaggert make me ill. He gets on there attacking contemporary music without even knowing the facts."

Bass' interest in being a musician began when he played around with a cheap acoustic guitar he had in his much younger years in Pennsylvania. He was eventually taught much of the guitaring know-how which has brought him through several bands over the years by Dexter Payne, the rhythm and bass guitarist who is the leader of Ruth. Payne and Bass have alternated as lead guitarists in the band. Other members of Ruth include Billy Younger on additional rhythm guitaring and vocals, and Bobby Alderman on drums.

Some of Bass' biggest commercial influences in guitaring include Ozzy Osbourne's late guitarist, Randy Rhodes, as well as Eddie Van Halen and Phil Keaggy, the letter of which is a Christian rocker whose best work recalls John Lennon and Steely Dan. A tape of Ruth in concert reveals melodies that sound like vintage Doobie Brothers' or 38 Special material, while the reedy lead vocals sound roughly like those of the Allman Brothers. The band has been searching for someone to play a synthesizer with them, however.

Along with Bass, Dexter Payne and former member Andy Leonard write the abundance of original material sung by the band, with only rare exceptions of borrowed material from other Christian acts. Bass may mix some secular material that he has written into the act in the future. Bass is particularly proud of the band's name out of his belief in women's rights. He feels that the band should meet more often for practice, yet he and the band are very enthusiastic about their work. And, as the tape proves, so is their audience.

Gypsy

A Review

Diahn Simonini, Paula Moore, Curt Walker, Jerry Dagenhart, Connie Watkins and Jim Scott in GYPSY.

By JEFF ABERNATHY

Gypsy, a musical based on the memoirs of stripper Gypsy Rose Lee was produced by the Longwood Players and Departments of Music and Speech and Dramatic Arts February 23-25. The production involved a huge number of actors, musicians, and crew members, and it was a credit to the Longwood Players and Director Thomas Williams that the three-hour musical ran as smoothly as it did.

Diahn Simonini, a resident of Buckingham County, portrayed well the role of Rose, the lead part which Ethel Merman played in the original production on Broadway. She portrayed the role sincerely and was able to engage the audience in Rose's dilemmas as she forces her dream — to be a successful performer — on her daughters. Her singing, however, was not equal to her acting. Like much of the singing in Gypsy, Simonini's was dull and did little to progress the musical. Her singing parts should have been cut down by the directors to make up for this.

Curt Walker, played the lead male role of Herbie who watches Rose's failures throughout the musical. He was relaxed and believable and perfectly got inside of the role as well as anyone on the stage. His singing was rare, for which the audience was thankful.

Playing the title role was Paula Moore, who proved to be the best singer in the cast. "Little Lamb", the first song she sang in the Hotel Rooms scene was best of the musical and her singing at the conclusion of the play was done well. Her acting was fair in comparison to that of Simonini's and Walkers but after she went from the youthful Louise to the mature Gypsy she lost the audience. In her attempt to act sophisticated she was nearly comical, and she lost character on two occasions.

Some of the smaller parts were also played well, Jerry Dagenhart was very good in the roles of Uncle Jocko and Kringelein, and was wonderful as Pastey — the effiminate stage manager of Witchita's Burlesque House.

The other members of Mama Rose's Acting Troupe, Tulsa (Robert Henkel) Yonkers (Sam St. Phard) and Angie (Tony Russo) were enjoyable on stage, although the casting of Tulsa was questionable.

Jim Scott was especially good as Pop, Rose's Bible wielding father. However, there was little vocal variation in his later role of Cigar. The roles of the strippers, portrayed by Connie Watkins, Denise Wilson, and Cynthia Jude were acted well, singing aside, and Connie Watkins was particularly effective in her role as Tessie Tura.

The musicians gave the audience a superb performance and the technical work was good. The backdrops were gorgeous but the minimalistic set design could have been improved upon. Mr. Goldstone (Glenn Saunders) was played more like a speed freak than an agent of the Orphium Circuit, and the Showgirls were basically unorganized.

The musical as a whole was slow and the audience was put to sleep on too many occasions. Much work was needed on the performers' singing, and if possible the elimination of some of the songs would help.

The Longwood Players attempted a huge production, perhaps too much for the four-week rehearsal schedule, and as a result the work was at times cumbersome and uninspiring. It was also, at times, an enjoyable performance. A longer rehearsal schedule may have aided the production enormously.

Lancers Notch 6th Straight Winning Season

Longwood fell to Mount St. Mary's 65-61 Friday night in the semi-finals of the Mason-Dixon Conference Basketball Tournament as a late rally came up short. Despite the loss, Longwood finished with its sixth straight winning season, 15-12.

The Lancers, second in the Mason-Dixon regular season race with a 7-3 mark, received a bye in the first round of the league tournament at Mount St. Mary's home floor in Emmitsburg, MD. The Mounties beat Pittsburgh-Johnstown 110-75 in first round action Thursday night, while Liberty Baptist topped UMBC 80-69.

After top-seed Randolph-Macon dispatched the Flames 68-51, the Lancers squared off against the Mount.

Turnovers hurt Longwood from the opening moments as the Mounties took a 37-31 lead at the half. The Lancers trailed 52-43 with 8:26 left when the momentum shifted. Sparked by six points from Lonnie Lewis, four from Stan Hull and two from Jerome Kersey, Longwood outscored the Mount 12-4 to pull within 56-55 with 4:49 to go.

Longwood had two golden opportunities to take the lead, but failed to cash in. Mountie Darryle Edwards blocked Lewis' shot at 3:50 and Lancer guard Kevin Ricks threw the ball away at 2:42.

Two free throws and a slam-follow by Kersey made the score 62-61 with 17 seconds to go. The Mount's Marion Cook made a free throw with 10 seconds left for a 63-61 edge. Cook, however, missed the second attempt. Kersey grabbed the rebound, but fired a wild pass downcourt which was intercepted by Joe Reedy. Cook got the ball back for a layup as the game ended.

Longwood hit 11 of 12 free throws, made 56.8 per cent of its shots from the floor and out-rebounded the Mount 27-26. Turnovers were the difference in the game as the Lancers turned it over 20 times to 10 for the Mounties.

Kersey, in his final college game, had 22 points, 11 rebounds and a school record seven blocked shots. The 6-7 center also had eight turnovers. Lewis scored 12 points, David Strothers 11 and Hull had eight points and six assists.

Strothers was 1-1 at the free throw line to keep alive his streak of consecutive free throws at 24. The 6-6 junior made 63 of 72 at the charity stripe during the season for a Longwood best-ever .875 per cent.

Kersey ended his career with 1,756 points and 1,162 rebounds, in addition to 142 blocked shots, 248 steals and 93 dunks (all school records). He also had 259 career assists.

The loss put a damper on what had been a strong finish for the Lancer cagers, who won their last five games in a row before the tournament.

Randolph-Macon won the tournament title, beating Mount St. Mary's 67-62 in the finals Saturday night.

Lancer Jerome Kersey (arm raised) celebrates 86-77 win over Mt. St. Mary's.

Kersey Named Mason Dixon Player Of The Year

Jerome Kersey of Longwood College has been selected as the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference Player of the Year. Kersey was a pre-season All-American selection and ranks among the nation's top rebounders with an average of 14.2. He is also scoring at a pace of 19.5 which leads the MDAC. Longwood finished in second place with a 7-3 conference record. They were 15-12 overall.

Hal Nunnally of Randolph-Macon has been selected as the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference Coach of the Year. The Yellow Jackets finished the regular season with a 23-4 record and won the MDAC regular season title with a 9-1 conference mark. Macon has been selected for the NCAA Division II playoffs for the second year in a row. They are currently ranked tenth in the Division II poll.

Longwood Will Retire Jerome Kersey's No. 54

Longwood College will formally retire the number 54 jersey worn by senior All-American Jerome (THE COBRA) Kersey at the college's athletic banquet in April, Lancer basketball coach Cal Luther announced February 25.

Kersey, who holds 19 Longwood career, season, and game basketball records, closed out his homecourt career February 25 in an 86-77 win over Mount St. Mary's with 27 points, a record-tying 26 rebounds, nine assists, three steals, one blocked shot and three dunks.

A third team All-American last season, Kersey will be the first member of a men's basketball team at Longwood to have his jersey retired.

The 6-7, 220-pound center is Longwood's career leader in points (1,756) rebounds (1,162), steals (248), blocked shots (142) and slams (93). He also ranks second in career assists with 259. Kersey has started a record 103 consecutive games since his freshman season.

Kersey is currently averaging 19.5 points, 14.2 rebounds, 3.7 assists, 3 steals and 1.3 blocked shots per game. He has led Longwood to a 15-12 record and a 7-3 mark in the Mason-Dixon Conference for second place in the regular season.

Luther says of Kersey: "Jerome has been our leader in every respect. He has been an inspiration to me and his teammates. Players like him just don't come along very often."

Fitzgerald In Top 12

Longwood sophomore Tom Fitzgerald won one of three matches and placed among the top 12 competitors in the NCAA Division II Wrestling Tournament February 24 at Morgan State University in Baltimore, Maryland.

Wrestling in the 118-pound class, Fitzgerald edged the number four seed Mike Baker of Portland State 16-15 in his first match.

After his first round upset, Fitzgerald dropped a 12-6 decision to the Number 5 seed Chuck Kennedy of Morgan State. With only an hour's rest, the Lancer grappler came back and wrestled again in the consolation round, losing to Mike Brown of Northweat Missouri 12-1.

Fitzgerald is the first Longwood wrestler to compete in a national tournament. He ended up with a fine 19-11-1 overall record. Tim has a 33-22-1 career record at Longwood in two years.

Longwood Baseball Team Gets Off To 4-2 Start

Longwood's baseball team got its 1984 season off to a successful start last week, winning four of six games on a four-day road trip to South Carolina. The Lancers split twinbills with Francis-Marion and Morris Thursday and Friday before sweeping two from Allen Sunday. A doubleheader at Benedict Saturday was canceled.

This week the Lancers are scheduled to play at Hampden-Sydney Tuesday at 2:30 and then open their home schedule Friday against West Virginia Tech at 1:00. Slippery Rock and California State of Pennsylvania will visit for doubleheaders Saturday and Sunday.

A pair of freshman pitchers turned in complete games as Longwood beat homestanding Allen University 6-1 and 19-3 Sunday afternoon. Sam Hart tossed a five-hitter and struck out five in the opener while Rob Furth allowed only one hit and fanned seven in the shortened, five-inning nightcap.

Soph Dennis Leftwich ripped a double and a triple with three RBI's and Mike Haskins had two hits to pace the opening win. Both Leftwich and Haskins are outfielders. Hart had a shutout going until Allen scored a run in the bottom of the seventh.

In the second game Longwood exploded for 11 hits as Haskins and Todd Thompson had two hits each. Thompson had a double and four RBI's, Allen Lawter drove in two runs, and Sonny Bolton and James Jackson had doubles. The Lancers stole 11 bases in 11 attempts and had 17 of 18 for the day. A seven-run second inning put the game away.

Freshman Tony Browning hurled a four-hitter and Longwood collected 11 hits as the Lancers beat Morris College in Sumter, S. C. 12-1 in the first game Friday.

Morris rallied for four runs in the bottom of the seventh to win the second game 10-8 to spoil a potential Lancer sweep.

Browning allowed Morris only a single run in the second inning in his first collegiate start. Freshman Marty Ford had two hits and three RBI's, John Sullivan, three hits and two RBI's, Haskins two hits and three RBI's and Bolton a double and two RBI's. Longwood totaled 11 hits in the contest.

In the nightcap Sullivan had three hits, Thompson two and Bolton a double. Longwood led 8-6 heading into the final half-inning, but Morris got four runs off Lawter, who came on in the fourth in relief of Mike Butler.

Leftwich stole six bases in six attempts in the twinbill.

Longwood began its southern swin with a doubleheader in Florence, S. C. Thursday. The Lancers beat Francis-Marion 3-2 in the opener behind Scott Mills who tossed a six-hitter. Francis-Marion scored two in the bottom of the seventh to win the second game 5-4, wiping out a 4-3 Lancer lead.

Senior Sonny Bolton had four hits in the two games, going 4-6 with an RBI. Leftwich went 2-2 in the opener, Sullivan had a double and Lawter two RBI's. Freshman Jeff Mayone had a two-run single in the sixth inning of the second game. Soph Todd Ashby took the loss.

Strayer Sets School Record; Gymnasts Close With Best Ever

The Longwood gymnastics team ended its regular season Saturday afternoon in Lancer Hall by picking up two victories, defeating George Washington and Pittsburgh-Johnstown. The Longwood score, 163.15, is a new school record, topping the old mark by three points. Pittsburgh-Johnstown finished second in the tri-meet (157.15) and George Washington third with 139.25.

Kelly Strayer led the Lancer gymnasts, placing second in beam (8.35) and floor (8.8), and placing first in bars (8.65) and all-around (34.45). Her all-around score set a school record, breaking the old mark of 34.05. Longwood coach Ruth Budd had been confident throughout the season that Strayer could top 34 points. Her previous high was 33.4. In vaulting Strayer tied for third with 8.65.

Dayna Hankinson had her best performance of the year as well. She finished third in all-around (33.35) and beam (8.15). Dayna placed first in floor (8.85) and finished second in vaulting (8.7).

On bars, Lisa Zuraw tied for fourth for Longwood with 8.3.

Coach Ruth Budd was pleased with her team's performance, but noted the gymnasts needed to work on beam, the event which has haunted the Lancers all season.

better on bars and were very good on floor," said Budd. "The girls are still falling on beam though."

The 6-5 Lancers can only wait till next Monday, to see if they will receive a bid to the Division II regionals.

Lady Lancers Place Third In VAIAW Final Four

The Longwood Lady Lancers ended a fine season Saturday, placing third in the VAIAW Division II Final Four Tournament at Radford. The Lady Lancers broke the record for most wins in a season with a 16-10 mark.

In the first round of the tournament Friday, the Lady Lancers faced strong, nationally-ranked Radford University. Longwood lost 84-64 in a game that was closer than the score indicated. Three Lady Lancers scored in double figures: Florence Holmes 19 points, Valerie Turner 14 points and 14 rebounds, and Mariana Johnson 11 points.

Longwood won the consolation game 82-74 over Randolph-Macon Saturday. Holmes led the Lancers with 22 points, 7 steals, and broke the school record for most blocked shots in a game with 9. Providing Holmes with considerable support were Turner with 17 points and a record breaking 23 rebounds, Johnson 10 points, and Melanie Lee with 10 points.

Senior and captain of the Lady Lancers, Robin Powell played in her last game for Longwood Saturday against the Lady Jackets of Randolph-Macon. Powell averaged 7.1 points per game and was second on the team with 95 assists.

Turner was named to the All-VAIAW Final Four Tournament Team. Her 31 points and 37 rebounds in two games were the major factors in her selection.

Turner is the top rebounder in the state at 14.5 and ranks among the scoring leaders at 18.4.

Longwood coach Shirley Duncan knew that the Lady Lancers had the potential to be strong at the beginning of the year.

"There were times where we played extremely well and realized our potential," said Duncan. "We got a lot accomplished this year, like the most wins in school history and several individuals broke school records."

"In the tournament," said Duncan, "Radford came out like a house-a-fire but we played well against Randolph-Macon. It was nice to end the season on a good note."

Greenwood Speaks in Open Forum

W. W. EDWARDS, III
News Editor

After a considerable absence from the spotlight here at Longwood, President Janet Greenwood came back in fine form this past week in an Open Forum presented by the Student Government Association. The forum was well attended with about 70 present, and the wide-ranging topics were covered pretty thoroughly, although Greenwood's original statements on certain issues tended to be a tad vague.

Greenwood began by recapping her efforts in the state legislature to appropriate funds for the College, explaining that this work has kept her from being as accessible as she would like to be on campus. She bemoaned the fact that Longwood is the only four-year institution in the state that has no full-time representative at the Capitol, but she said that her work in Richmond as Longwood's voice to the legislature was only an interim measure until other ways of functioning can be found. Greenwood stressed that with the General Assembly almost out of session, she would be back to her normal duties for the rest of the semester and would be much more visible on campus.

Tjhe question of budget cuts and the fate of some of the Academic departments were high on the list of priorities for most, but unfortunately President Greenwood did not have many concrete answers to the questions posed on these issues. She stated that the College was trying to have some of the positions that have been cut reinstated, but that it was "not a situation where there's any easy solution."

The fate of the Home Economics department is still unknown at this time, and a report from the Department is now under study by the administration. The only thing that Greenwood would say for certain was that "the College has a commitment to the students in that department, no matter what the decision." She also added that Longwood would be admitting freshman Home Economics majors in the fall, and it is presumed that these freshmen will be allowed to graduate in their major.

Throughout the forum, President Greenwood stressed the positive, especially concerning efforts being made by the Administration in the area of student services. She said that special emphasis is being placed on students with academic problems who stand to lose financial aid, and those students who are on differing degrees of academic probation. Programs are being formulated for those students who may benefit from summer school, and she promised more availability of course work in summer school.

Other topics that were discussed were:

Quality of Students: In response to worries from many students that the quality of students at Longwood is suffering, Michael Haltzel (V.P. for Academic Affairs) stated that the SAT scores of incoming freshmen have shown a slight increase and that the quality was very high, in his opinion. Dr. Greenwood emphasized that admission standards were the same for all students and that the school certainly had a vested interest in keeping the quality of students high.

Access for Handicapped Students: Greenwood said that, unfortunately, "We have to work with the situation the way it is," and that increased access renovations had to be incorporated into already scheduled renovations of school buildings.

Lancaster Library: Answering complaints that the contents of the library are outdated, Dr. Greenwood recommended that students push their professors for new or more volumes having to do with that professor's department. She also said that it was hard to justify more allocations for the library when the student use was so low.

Housing: Greenwood covered a number of considerations in this area, but most of the policy decisions on housing are based on the requirement (by law) that the College break even financially on housing. She also added that Greek housing is a very viable option, but that is still in the long-range planning process.

Fall Break: Greenwood said that the decision to discontinue fall break was reached by a majority vote of the Department heads, but she sidestepped a little by noting that Phyllis Mable (V.P. of Student Affairs) is working on several progams that will make the Longwood student more willing to stay on campus. Among these are proposed Snack Bar renovations, and added Campus Life attractions.

Parking: In an informal straw poll of those present, an overwhelmingly large number of students expressed the opinion that freshmen should not be allowed to bring automobiles to school to alleviate some of the problems. Dr. Greenwood expressed interest in this and directed any recommendations on parking to the Student Affairs office.

Business Department: Responding to queries about accreditation of the Business Department, Greenwood turned the floor over to Mr. Haltzel, who said that Dr. Jacques was brought to Longwood with a goal of accreditation, and they hope to achieve that goal within the next three years. He also pointed out that Longwood is by no means a pariah on the accreditation problem, noting that only 60 percent of similar

Administrators Field Questions on Faculty Cuts

DAVID MILLER
Staff Writer

In response to overwhelming concern over the recent faculty cuts at Longwood, the administration granted an open forum last March 5. This question and answer session conducted by Dr.'s Greenwood, Haltzel and Conway was organized for the benefit of the faculty and students who were in question as to the nature of the decision.

Dr. Haltzel's opening statement summarized the mechanics involved in determining which faculty members were eligible to be cut. As the floor opened for discussion, Dr. William Frank, of the English Dept. inquired as to why the following alternatives to the cuts were not pursued: Could the Department chairmen have been given a chance to send form letters to their faculty members, informing them of the impending cuts and suggesting that members who are about to retire or who are thinking about retirement or taking a leave of absence, do so early so that cuts may not have to be made.

The faculty and administration were in accordance with this suggestion, yet it is unfortunate that this alternative was not considered before the cuts were made.

A number of faculty members present were curious as to why two out of the four academic departments involved in the cuts were not consulted in advance. In fact, one of the faculty who was cut, received two letters on the day of notice: one stating that he was recommended for renewal of contract and the other received later in the same day stating that his contract was recommended for termination. This breech of protocol was not addressed by the administration.

Sophomore, Jerry Dagenhart posed the following question: In considering the termination of the Technical Director for Jarman Auditorium, were any of the following affectations realized? How would Longwood be affected by the sudden drop in cultural activities such as Drama, Music, Dance and in fact, all of the events that occur on the stage of Jarman? What would be the feasible extent of having a degree in Dramatic Arts without having knowledge of or practical experience in the technical aspects of theatre?

To these questions, Dr. Greenwood and Dr. Haltzel replied that they are aware of the situations that this decision would cause and that the teaching of Technical Drama would not be affected by this cut.

In conclusion, it was evident that the students, faculty and administration are deeply concerned for the future of a well rounded education at Longwood College.

perspectives

Executions have become a creative exercise for corrections officials. There have been new and more technological ways of ridding society of all its evils. First, criminals were stoned to death, then beheaded, hanged, shot, gassed, electrocuted and finally injected. Injections, proponents of the death penalty claim, are the most "humane" and painless of any of the other extermination methods.

James David Autry is scheduled to be executed before sunrise Wednesday, March 14, in Texas for the 1980 shooting death of a convenience store clerk. Autry will be injected with a combination of anesthetic drugs in a deadly dose.

The first man to be executed by injection was Charles Brooks in December of 1982. The event was one of much controversy, even among proponents of the death penalty.

The question before the Board of Corrections is not whether the sentence will be carried out, but whether they should televise the execution. Ah — and yet another possibility for creative barbarianism.

It's not enough for the people of the state to stage an execution on a hospital gurney, with plenty of witnesses and cameramen who will stand silently, taking notes and pictures, as a man is injected with drugs, flinches just a touch and dies.

No. No. "The people ought to be taught a lesson! They should see what happens to those criminals. Yes siree Bob — let's show 'em what they'll get."

Autry, on the other hand, will go to the gurney professing innocence. He feels that if the sentence is to be carried out, he wants it to be televised. The lesson Autry hopes the publicity will teach is far from that of the state's. Autry wants everyone to be witness to the injustice that will cost him his life.

The death penalty, by whatever means is no longer enough to satisfy the blood-thirsty, death hounding proponents. They want to see it, get right in there and see it.

If the Board of Corrections approves the televised execution, the proponents will get their druthers, and their thirsts will be quenched, as James David Autry is medically, and fatally overdosed until death before the public. The only remaining hope is that the public will be forced to see what it is that their elected representatives are condoning and taking part in, and be moved enough to do something about it.

Your Turn

Miss Longwood Replies

I would like to express my sincere appreciation to all of the wonderful people who made the Miss Longwood Pageant a success — Don Winkler, Brenda Ferguson, Niki Fallis, Jerry Dagenhart and his stage crew, student workers, community businesses and advisors, and the contestants. You were great!

In response to Jeff Abernathy's editorial on the pageant, I would like to point out that the Miss Longwood Pageant is just one more way Longwood can extend its Liberal Arts Program. The opportunity for faculty, students and community members to get involved in something that can benefit students, the college and is also entertaining is immense. The pageant is a chance for women to grow physically and mentally and obtain recognition and scholarship money for their efforts. It takes more than just a pretty face or nice figure — although appearance is a part of it. And why not? A healthy body is just as important as a healthy mind! It also takes talent, intelligence, poise and guts!

There are, of course, criteria for entering the pageant just as any other scholarship program. Music, sports and honors scholarships, just to name a few, require certain qualifications of their applicants. As for the argument of there being no minority students in the pageant, I would like to mention that applications were open to anyone and that Miss America 1984, Vanessa Williams, is a minority student.

It greatly saddens me that some of our faculty and administration are so narrow-minded that they do not see the value of such scholarship programs — programs that attract over 1100 people to the college and receive state-wide recognition. The scholarship aspect of the pageant should be enough to gain the support of the administration, because that is one area in which Longwood is greatly lacking. I do realize that everyone is entitled to his-her own opinion, but I do wish some members of the Longwood Community would be more open-minded and support programs that benefit the college.

One point that Mr. Abernathy stressed in his article which baffles me, was that the Office of Career Planning and Placement should be involved in programs that affect "a larger percentage of Longwood students." In the past week there were three programs presented by this office relating to careers in which only four students, total, from this entire campus, attended. The Miss Longwood Pageant was an opportunity for this office, in its spare time, to come in contact with not only the ten contestants but approximately 30 student workers and the entertainment groups — not to mention the friends and family of these students.

The Office of Public Affairs sees the pageant as a chance for 10 girls to grow and improve themselves in a relatively short period of time. They learn interviewing skills, poise and stage presence all incorporating Longwood's 14 goals. The Miss Longwood Pageant is also a showcase for student talent, not only for the contestants but also for the Lancer Edition, the Jazz Ensemble and the student stage technicians. It is a way to involve the community and gain local support for the college. Already local businesses have been calling saying to "count them in for next year"!

The Miss Longwood Pageant is a super opportunity for all those involved and I hope that in the future it will be supported by more of the Longwood administration.

As a side note, I would like to say that the Miss Longwood Pageant or any other production in Jarman Auditorium would not be possible without a technical director. A. Moffett Evans was indispensible with this and other productions. I do hope that further consideration will be given regarding the continuation of his job position. I would hate to see Longwood lose such a valuable asset.

LONGWOOD COLLEGE
Farmville, Virginia

Celebrating 100 Years Of Teacher Education In 1984

Dear Prospective Summer School Student:

I hope you will consider coming to Longwood during Summer '84. We provide academic opportunities so that you can graduate sooner, improve your academic standing, maintain eligibility for financial aid for next year — to mention but a few. If you come, you will find the campus contains a diverse group of people intensely involved with their own endeavors. It is the one time of the year when the campus assumes the characteristics of a micro-community. You will find a variety of different activities occurring about you as compared with the one you are involved with. Conventions, field study programs, elderhostels, girls state, as well as the undergraduate and graduate academic programs. Yet the campus assumes a relaxed atmosphere because there are fewer people present than during the regular academic year.

The College provides dining facilities on campus throughout the summer session. There are fast food restaurants, stores, and shopping centers within easy walking distance of the campus.

Campus recreational facilities are available to the campus community, allowing each to find a way to further his enjoyment of the summer experience at Longwood. These include gym areas, swimming and tennis. In addition there are three state park facilities located within a 45 mile radius of the campus, as well as cultural activities located in Charlottesville, Lynchburg and Richmond.

The College sponsors a variety of activities during the summer session: Intramural sports — softball and volleyball — Coffee house-folk singing, Disco dances, several Rock Bands, Films, Tubing on the James River, Picnics, as well as the recreational areas of the Student Union which are open until 10 p.m. week days.

You're invited.

Sincerely,
Dean of Faculty Edmond C. Conway institutions were accredited.

Disciplinary Procedures, Security, Student Health Service: Dr. Greenwood called for more even dispensation of student discipline, said that a committee is handling suggestions on Security measures, and decried the lack of physicians in the Farmville area available to be utilized by the Student Health Service.

On the whole, the Forum was a constructive dialogue that informed both the students and the administration. Dr. Greenwood said she was very impressed by the way things went and urged similar activities in the future. Certainly, such forums can only help solve the many problems that exist and will serve to keep the channels of communication open in the college community.

Controversial Films to be Shown

"If You Love This Planet"

Twenty-six minute film in which Helen Caldicott, National President of Physicians for Social Responsibility, warns of the devastation and suffering caused by atomic and nuclear weaponry. The film won an Academy Award in 1982. In 1983, the United States Department of Justice, Internal Security Section had declared the film to be "political propaganda."

"Hiroshima — Nagasaki, August 1945"

Filmed by Japanese cameraman one week after the bombings. The United States government seized the film and kept it secret for 25 years.

Both films will be shown Wednesday, March 14, at 6:30 p.m. in Bedford Auditorium.

A group discussion will follow, led by Dr. Chet Ballard.

Campus Security

By W. W. EDWARDS, III
News Editor

Campus security has always been a thorn in the side of many colleges and universities, and Longwood is surely no exception. Most people know at least one or two people who have been the victims of some type of crime here on campus, and many have found out first-hand the anger and frustration that results when one finds out he has been bereft of radios, cameras, gasoline or just hard cash. According to Campus Police Chief Eric Shoemaker, the answer to this dilemma lies right at the students' door.

In an interview this past week, Chief Shoemaker stated, "Of the crimes that are reported here on campus, we estimate that nearly half of those could have been prevented." He pointed out that in many of the thefts they have investigated, either the door or window was simply left unlocked. "It's time that every student considered him or herself a potential victim of crime," he said. "If we could impress that fact on the students, it would make our job much easier."

Another concern of the Campus Police is the large amount of vandalism that takes place in the dorms. While he acknowledges that most students think that vandalism is not that big a deal, Chief Shoemaker stressed that "students should realize that vandalism is a crime that costs the school (and eventually the students) thousands of dollars every year." He also emphasized that students are adults, and will be treated as such should they be caught vandalizing school property, and dealt with severely.

On the bright side, the Campus Police itself has made great strides in the year and a half since Shoemaker arrived. Besides the increase in facilities and equipment (a larger office, new communications gear, new weapons and a vehicle that "actually looks like a police car should"), the training and proficiency of the officers themselves has improved. Before, officers received little or no training, only had to fire their weapons on the range once a year, and had no supervision. Now there are supervisory personnel, frequent training in police subjects, and the officers are required to fire their weapons every few months. They also now have a trained investigator who can actually try to solve some of the many reported crimes that occur here at Longwood.

Shoemaker cited the reporting of crimes as an essential tool in combating crime, and said that students should report any crime to the Campus Police, no matter how small. He noted that "As the efficiency of the police department increases, we find that more and more students are reporting crimes because they know that something will be done about it. The year before I arrived, there were 64 crimes reported to Campus Police, and that was for the whole year. We have that many reports in a month's time now."

Shoemaker concluded that it is the "responsibility of the student" to help increase the security on campus. Students can exercise that responsibility with an act as simple as turning a key.

Hedda Gabler in Rehearsal

By JERRY DAGENHART

The cast of Henrik Ibsen's drama, Hedda Gabler is already in its second week of rehearsal. The cast, directed by Patton Lockwood, includes many veterans of the Longwood stage and some promising newcomers.

The title role of Hedda will be portrayed by Connie Watkins, who was last seen as Tessie Tara in Gypsy. Hedda's husband, Jurgan Tessman, will be portrayed by Glenn Gilmer who was last seen in Gypsy as well. Hedda's ex-lover will be played by M. Jeff Abernathy, marking his acting debut at Longwood.

The frantic Miss Tayuh Elusted will be portrayed by freshmen Alyssa Abbey. Although Alyssa has worked extensively on past productions, the role of Tayuh is also her acting debut.

The blackmailing appraiser, Mr. Brock, will be portrayed by veteran Longwood actor, Vince Decker. Tessman's maid Bairtuh, will be played by Jerry Johnson. Tessman and Hedda's aunt Yooluh will be portrayed by Donna Baldwin.

Lockwood is directing his troupe of actors with a great deal of enthusiasm and the production should be an entertaining success.

The production dates have been set for April 17-20.

Further information and ticket prices will follow in the coming weeks.

LANCER SPORTS

Netters Open Season

The Longwood College men's tennis team opened its 1984 season last week with one win in three matches. The Lancers stopped Newport News Sunday 5-4 after losing to Randolph-Macon 9-0 Saturday and Averett on Thursday, 4-2 at Longwood. The Lancers host King's College Thursday afternoon at 2:00.

Pete Maxwell and Mark Hogge won the decisive doubles match for the Lancers against Newport News. In singles action, Paige Tilghman, J. D. Almond, Maxwell and Hogge were victorious for Longwood.

Tilghman is playing in the top position for the Lancers. He is followed by No. 2 Darden Smith, No. 3 Hogge, No. 4 Rudy Hull and No. 5 Almond. Tim Colyer, Matt Sweeney, Hampton McClellan, and Maxwell are competing for the final position.

Coach Rich Posipanko describes his tennis team as "a very young and inexperienced team," and because of that hopes for a 500 season. "We're working really hard, but the inexperience will hurt," said the Lancer coach. "Our competition is strong this year to add to our problems." The Lancer coach feels Virginia Wesleyan, Lynchburg, Mary Washington and Randolph-Macon are the best teams the team will face.

Posipanko, in his first year at the helm of the tennis team, would like to equal last season's 7-7 record. Only three players return from that squad — Tilghman, Hull and Maxwell. Tilghman and Maxwell are seniors, but the remaining seven netters are freshmen or sophomores.

Sports Briefs

Jerome Kersey of Longwood College has been named as the men's college division basketball Player of the Year by the Virginia Sports Information Directors (VaSID).

Valerie Turner of Longwood College has been selected as the Virginia Sports Information Directors (VaSID) Women's College Division basketball Player of the Year.

Longwood made it a sweep as Shirley Duncan was selected as VaSID College Division Coach of the Year. Duncan led the Lady Lancers to a 16-10 record which marked the first winning season for Longwood in six years.

Lancers Sweep Tourney

While it's far too early to be thinking about post-season play, Longwood's young baseball team served notice Sunday that it could be in the chase for a berth in the South Atlantic Regional Tournament when bids are extended in May.

With senior shortstop John Sullivan supplying the hitting and sophomore pitcher Todd Ashby picking up both wins, Longwood took two from visiting California State of Pennsylvania Sunday 13-6 and 8-3 to move its early season record to 8-4.

Sunday's twin bill sweep was important, coming against a team which qualified for the NCAA Division II playoffs last season, But, what made the wins even more crucial was the fact that they came on the heels of 9-1 and 3-2 losses to Slippery Rock on Saturday. The Lancers and the two Pennsylvania teams are all potential contenders for post-season play in the South Atlantic Region. Longwood swept two from West Virginia Tech Friday, 19-7 and 12-6.

This week the Lancers host Maryland Baltimore County for two Thursday. UMBC is another possible contender for the Division II Playoffs. Friday, Longwood visits rival Hampden-Sydney for a single game, starting at 1:00, and Saturday the Lancers visit St. Paul's for a doubleheader, beginning at 1:00. The Lancers won't play again until March 25 after Saturday.

LC's Tony Browning shows determination as he fires a pitch in Saturday's 3-2 loss.

Minithon and Fun Run To Be Held

The seventh annual Longwood Minithon Run, sponsored by Longwood College and Army ROTC, will be held on Sunday, April 15, beginning at 3 p.m.

The 10K (6.2 mile) minithon course begins at Hampden-Sydney College, follows Route 643, and finishes in front of Longwood College. The course is on a shaded, paved road that is level or downhill with the exception of one upgrade in the last mile. Split times will be given at every mile.

Awards will be given to first place winners according to age group and sex, and ribbons will be given to second and third place winners. The awards ceremony will be at 4:30 p.m.

Divisions for the minithon are as follows: age 14 and under, 15 to 18, 19 to 22, 22 to 29, 30 to 40, 40 and above, and wheelchair. There is also an Army division which is not open to the public.

In addition to the minithon, there will be a three-mile "fun run" for all ages and running levels. The fun run will begin at 2:45 p.m. at a point on Route 643 three miles from Longwood. Transportation will be provided from the registration point at Hampden-Sydney to the starting point.

Entry fees for the minithon are as follows: $7.00 prior to April 6, $8.00 thereafter; $6.00 for military personnel and Longwood students. The entry fee for all participants in the fun run is $5.00. Walk-up registrations will be accepted between 12 noon and 2 p.m. at the starting point at Hampden-Sydney.

All entrants in the runs will receive T-shirts, and will be eligible for prizes to be drawn at the conclusion of the race

For additional information and entry forms contact Cheryl Crawford, Minithon Director, Longwood College, Farmville, VA 23901, telephone (804) 392-9348.

Sports Psychologist to Speak

Dr. William Morgan, internationally-recognized sports psychologist, will speak at Longwood College on Wednesday, March 14, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium.

The public is cordially invited to hear Dr. Morgan discuss "Psychological Effects of Physical Activity and Sport."

The lecture will deal with the influence of exercise on anxiety, depression, and self-esteem; adherence to exercise programs; and exercise addiction.

Dr. Morgan has lectured around the world, including the Sports Medicine Seminar in Singapore in 1973 during the Southeast Asian Pacific Games and in 1976 in Australia. He has been speaker for the American College of Sports Medicine Lecture Series and is currently speaking throughout the U. S. as the 1983-84 Scholar of the American Alliance of Health, Physical Education, Recreation, and Dance.

Exhibit To Feature The Ordinary

By JEFF ABERNATHY

Longwood professor Marilyn Simpson-Johnson and 1980 LC graduate Lynne Swann are working together on a project which will celebrate the ordinary in Prince Edward County.

The project will feature the women of Prince Edward County from Depression times to the present, but its focus will not be on the more affluent women of Prince Edward. The project will study "the ordinary rather than the extraordinary," according to Simpson-Johnson, the originator of the project.

Mrs. Simpson-Johnson, an assistant professor of social work, will coordinate the project's three phases. In the first phase, recordings will be made of selected members of the community for permanent history of Prince Edward County. The women will be selected for their contributions to the community on the basis of family life, religious and civic involvement, work history and education.

The second phase of the project will be an exhibit entitled "Feminist Self Expression: A Portrait of Private Lives in Prince Edward County". The exhibit will consist of photographs and artifacts from women and women's groups throughout the county. Lynne Swann will coordinate the effort as part of her work towards a master's degree at Virginia Commonwealth University. The final collection will be catalogued and presented at the Wynne Building this fall.

The culmination of Simpson-Johnson's project will be a series of presentations on WFLO by humanities scholars. The scholars will interpret the value of the project as a whole and address the universality of the exhibition.

"The ordinary person really forms the backbone of most American cities," Simpson-Johnson noted in an interview last week, "but these are the women who perceive their lives as being unexciting and uninteresting. We hope that this project will enable these people to see that they have made a real contribution to society."

The project is supported by a $6,300 grant from the Virginia Foundation for the Humanities and Public Policy and tying in with the Virginia Women's Cultural History exhibit which will tour the state later this year.

Numerous Longwood faculty will be assisting Simpson-Johnson on the project, and she sees the effort as an opportunity for assisting the Prince Edward community as a whole. "It is an excellent opportunity for Longwood College to become involved in a project which goes out to the community. The College usually caters to the educated elite. Here is a project which goes and celebrates the people who are the unsung heroes of Prince Edward County."

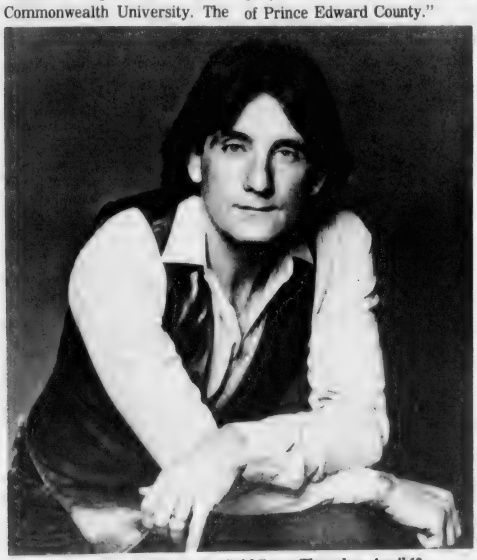
VASA Forum

By W. W. EDWARDS

A feeling of vitality and optimism pervaded the 1984 Virginia Student Association Forum which was held in Fredericksburg, Va. on March 30-31. Throughout the two-day gathering, which was filled with seminars and talks by prominent legislators and state government personnel, the student leaders present consistently displayed a "can-do" attitude and a sense of accomplishment about the work of VASA.

VASA is a nonprofit group that contains representatives from institutions of higher learning from across the state, forming the organization's General Council. This council directs the programs of VASA and also elects an Executive Committee, which performs most of the nuts-and-bolts work of the group. VASA has been very active in the General Assembly as a lobbying group for student interests, and have lobbied on such issues as financial aid, voting laws affecting students, and opposition to the raising of the legal minimum drinking age.

The forum drew over 100 representatives from colleges and universities in Virginia, and also many members of the State government who spoke and sat on panel discussions. The panel discussions were very informative and covered such diverse topics as "Students and the Media," "Students and the Board of Visitors," and "methods of Voter Registration." Credibility was added to these panels by the presence of people like Susan Fitz-Hugh, head of the State Board of Elections (on the Voter Registration discussion), and Ray Ashworth of the Virginia Highway Users Association and Barbara Bolton of the Virginia Nurses Association who both spoke on the topic of lobbying techniques.



State Senator Richard Sasslaw headed up the impressive group of guest speakers that addressed the forum on matters dealing with Virginia's education system. Former state legislator Wyatt Durette spoke on Saturday morning and was followed by Virginia's Secretary of Education John Casteen. While all three speakers were generally optimistic about the direction of education in Virginia, they all expressed the same ideas about one of the main problems in Virginia's school system; the lack of money.

The forum ended with a general session in which the new Executive Committee was announced (the vote had been taken earlier in the morning). -

State Secretary of Education John Casteen confers with student delegates at Fredericksburg VASA Forum.

Gene Cotton will be in the Gold Room Thursday, April 12.

Gene Cotton To Appear At Longwood

The Longwood College Student Union will present Gene Cotton concert on Thursday, April 12, at 8 p.m. in the Gold Room, Lankford Building.

Cotton also will give an informal lecture on "The Music Business" at 1 p.m. on Thursday in Wygal Auditorium. Both the lecture and the concert are open to the public free of charge.

A native of Ohio, Cotton grew up in Columbus, one of nine children. He attended Ohio State University and then began his musical career playing small clubs and colleges in the Mid-West.

He has recorded seven albums and has had numerous hit singles over the past few years. He has appeared on Midnight Special, Dick Clark's American Bandstand, Merv Griffin, Dinah Shore, Mike Douglas, and several TV specials. In 1979, he was voted one of the three top male vocalists by Cashbox Magazine.

Cotton's first Top 10 hit was "You Got Me Running," released in 1975. Other hits were "Before My Heart Finds Out," "You're A Part of Me" (with Kim Carnes), and "Like A Sunday in Salem."

His latest album is ECLIPSE OF THE BLUE MOON. There were two chart singles from the album — "Bein' Here With You Tonight" and "If I Could Get You."

Cotton has a heavy touring schedule in this country and abroad. He has played at colleges and universities throughout the U. S.

There was three of us, counting Lancelot — Lancelot doesn't really count though cause he's an Irish setter — but I'll put him in anyways cause he's a damned sight better than some of the folks around here.

So there was three of us — me, Lance and Ray. Ray's a buddy of mine, known him a few years — good friend too, but well, you know— he's got a little problem with liquor and stuff. But he's an allright guy — just keep him away from the bottle.

So the bunch of us is walking out towards the haunted house — ya know — just casual like. I'll admit we were a little messed up. Not bad. Just . . . well, no matter — we were holding our own. 'Cept for Rusty. Damn dog kep trippin' us up. Couldn't walk straight. Lemme tell ya something — it does no good to waste good drugs on a dog. Ain't worth it — he won't do nothin' but walk round in circles and confound the hell outta ya. But we kept kicking him and he got the message. The dog ain't stupid normally — just ya shouldn't . . . well . . . you know what I mean.

So we're walkin out there, right? The three of us lookin' all wide-eyed like and Ray's talkin up a storm — something about Reagan — and you know Ray. If ya don't convince him to shut the hell up right off, hell, he'll go on all night.

So I shoved that bottle of Taylor's in his hand and he took a long swallow. "Let me tell ya" he tells me, "there's nothing worse than having a damned conservative in the White House in times like these. Especially with us here in Farmville.

I didn't want to, but I had to find out what he was trying to get at. "Why's that, Ray?"

"Well, it's like this. We're here locked in this place for two more years, waiting to get a piece of paper that won't do us a damn bit of good by the time we get it."

"And I suppose that's Reagan's fault?" I had to know.

"Course not," he answered. "Can't blame all of that on Reagan. I mean, he didn't send us here. Robb's got a lot to do with it."

"So Reagan and Robb are both against us?"

"No. Not exactly. A lot of it's our own fault, ya know. A school like Longwood tends to get overlooked sometimes when it comes down to government action. If we don't let 'em know. . . "

"So we get overlooked by a lot of people, Ray."

"Right. But just now when we've got all this talk about record enrollment and stuff — just when things are starting to happen — BAM — and there you have it."

"And just what was the BAM?

"Well Reagan cuts our student aid even further. Robb cuts our faculty. We're being double-teamed by opposing teams and the only thing our record number of students are worried about is the date and time of the next mixer."

"C'mon Ray. I can believe Reagan and Robb are cutting our future out from under us. But you're saying it's our own fault?"

"Well, what do you think?"

"I think I need that bottle."

"That's just what I'm talking about. You're already brainwashed. What do you think everybody else's answer is to the hassles of working for a good education? I need a beer. I need a beer. The only thing you can do to get people out of bed nowadays is to offer them a damn beer. Whatever happened to the marches, the demonstrations. . .

"I gotcha. Join the Peace Corps, love not war, right?"

"Yeah. Where HAVE all the good times gone? Nobody cares. There ain't a respectable liberal on this campus."

"Now c'mon Ray."

"There's not! Cause if there was we wouldn't be standing for this. No way. Supposed to be a demonstration against Reagan's policies in D. C. last month for all the college students across the nation. You want to know how many showed up?"

"Not really, Ray. . ."

"Three-hundred and fifty. That's how many. Three hundred and fifty. Damn near total apathy."

"Well, what can ya do, Ray. We can't change the world."

"We used to think we could. But now all that's been pushed back. I don't know. Maybe some good down-home liberalism will manage to work its way back.

Just then Lancelot came running up from behind us. Barking and howlin so loud it scared the hell out of both of us. Jumped up on Ray and knocked him down. I was laughing so hard I fell down right next to him with Lancelot jumping up and down between us.

"Shit. Hey, Ray?"

"What?"

"You all right?"

"Damn Dog."

"Don't make 'em like they used to, huh?"

"Yeah. . ."

"Ray?"

"What?"

"You wanta pass that bottle?"

Your Turn

To The Editor:

In the televised discussion following "The Day After," Henry Kissinger and Robert McNamara stressed the need of introducing greater stability between the U. S. and the USSR. Specifically, they referred to negotiating limitation or abolition of multiple warheaded missiles which increase the temptation to attempt a first strike. At present the chances of reaching such an agreement appear remote. Instead, President Reagan has compounded the problem with his proposal to deploy a space-based Ballistic Missile Defense (BMD). According to Mr. Reagan such a system would increase security - by blunting the destructive potential of a Soviet first-strike.

The truth is quite the contrary. A defensive system can only increase instability by encouraging a first strike. Example: In the absence of BMDs, one side launches a preemptive first strike reducing the opponent's forces to 1000 warheads with which to retaliate. With an operational BMD (assuming 95 percent reliability), the number of retaliatory warheads might be reduced to 50. If both sides have operational BMDs, the temptation to strike first could become irresistable during heightened tensions. In addition, BMDs will increase the likelihood of a policy of "launch on warning" upon suspicion of being under attack. One side might decide to accept 50 nuclear detonations in response to initiating a first strike, despite international scientific recognition that even "limited" nuclear war may irrevocably disrupt the planet's biosphere.

The cost of a BMD will transform the idealized vision of the "High Frontier" into an economic quagmire of disastrous proportions. No BMD will ever possess absolute reliability. Moreover, the predictable exaggerated response of each side to BMDs will be to increase offensive capabilities. One response will undoubtedly be escalation in the capability and numbers of cruise mssiles which are not threatened by BMDs. Costly new defensive systems will then be proposed to counter cruise missiles if they are not, in turn, subjected to negotiated limitation.

In sum, BMD will increase the enormous national debt, the instability among strategic forces, and the risk of nuclear war. We feel strongly that neither the present nor future administrations should embark upon actions or policies to develop BMD. Specificially the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) treaty should be strengthened through negotiation, not abrogated. Moreover, our country and the Soviet Union together must contain the development of anti-satellite weaponry, the technological cornerstone of BMD development.

Dear Editor:

The irony that the Rotunda has twice chosen to ignore a major literary event on campus is paralleled only by the irony that these events, the awarding of the Dos Passos Prize for Literature and the Longwood Literary Festival, were planned by individuals who are members of the Publications Board and who fought to save the Rotunda. Why did they bother?

Both of the visiting writers enjoy great student followings on their respective college campuses, UNC at Chapel Hill and the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa. It is unfortunate that Longwood students were not afforded in-depth information about these writers of fiction so that they, too, could have chosen to take advantage of an opportunity to hear two talented contemporary novelists, Doris Betts and Allen Wier, read from their works.

That the media of the written word on Longwood Campus is so unconcerned with the medium is sad.

A disgusted alumna,

Dear Editor:

The situation in Nicaragua is extremely critical at this time. The Nicaraguan economy which depends heavily on only a few agricultural exports has been under increasing attack from CIA-backed counterrevolutionaries. Several hundred million dollars worth of damage has already resulted from attacks such as the one against the vital oil storage facilities at the port of Corinto last October.

Nicaragua needs a successful coffee harvest to be able to purchase basic food stuffs, medicines, spare parts for industry and transportation, and oil. Because of the urgent political and military situation, many Nicaraguans have been mobilized in the defense of their country and cannot participate in the December-February coffee harvest this year.

That is why I have chosen to respond to Nicaragua's call for international work brigades to ensure a successful coffee harvest this year.

In the United States, the National Network in Solidarity with the Nicaraguan People (NNSNP) is working to coordinate volunteer participation. U. S. citizens have a particular role in this harvest, because if it were not for our government's open attempts to overthrow the government of Nicaragua, the Nicaraguans would be free to develop their own political life and their own economy in peace.

By participating in the volunteer coffee harvest, I hope to show that as an American citizen, I stand with the people of Nicaragua in their moment of need and that I oppose the policies of the Reagan administration. I urge others to support and write to NNSNP for further information on how to help the people of Nicaragua and to make donations. Their address is: NNSNP, 2025 "I" Street NW, Suite 402, Washington, DC, 20006.

The time has come to give Central America back to its people!

Sincerely,

To the Editor:

The Brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon, as part of their quest for community service, have decided to sponsor a child in conjunction with the Christian Children's Fund. For sixteen dollars a month, we are able to help feed and adequately clothe a needy youngster in Bolivia.

The child's name is Locio Condori Opi. "We call him Opie." Opie is just six years old, and already his future is bleak. Of Indian peasant descent, he lives with his family in a small adobe, thatched, hut in an undeveloped, rural area. Opie's dad is a farmer, but cannot supply enough for him to eat because of poor land and a harsh climate. He raises Llamas for wool and a few sheep. Opie's usual diet consists of only potatoes and soup. He receives only one-half the normal nutrition requirements needed for proper growth. Thus, he is very susceptible to disease. His mom makes all his clothes and cares for him in the best manner with her limited resources.

The Brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon are doing this in addition to maintaining their "Big-Brother" Program. We are considering holding of a mixer to bring in funds to further expand this project and we hope that others might consider sponsoring a child through this worthwhile program.

The new president, taking the place of Eric Ferguson (University of Virginia), is Allen Jones (Univ. of Richmond), who promised more communication and increased activity for the 84-85 term of his office.

The VASA forum for 1984 was constructive and a positive experience for all concerned, and definitely set the tone for more gains to be made on behalf of Virginia's student population within the next year.

HAPPENINGS

Grassroots Education

American education is launched upon a magnificent renaissance after 20 years of nearly unbroken decline, reports U. S. Secretary of Education T. H. Bell.

That is the thrust of an article the Secretary will have published in the April issue of the Phi Delta Kappan, journal of Phi Beta Kappa, an organization of professional educators.

"The grassroots reform movement that took the country by storm last year will become firmly established in our educational system this year," the Secretary said.

In his article, titled "American Education at a Crossroads," Secretary Bell credits the beginning of a renewed national commitment to improving education to the Reagan Administration's successful effort to combine some 29 categorical education programs into one block grant, thus giving state and local governments "more authority to set their own priorities and to direct Federal assistance to areas of greatest need."

The Secretary adds, "The Education Department's efforts to eliminate paperwork have lightened the regulatory burden faced by local school officials and saved the U. S. taxpayers approximately $1 billion per year."

"The release (April, 1983) of A Nation at Risk: The Imperative for Educational Reform, the landmark report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, appears to have been the firebrand that ignited the national campaign for educational improvement," Secretary Bell states.

The National Forum for Excellence in Education, held last December in Indianapolis, "provided an arena for invigorating and productive discussions of the tangible steps being taken across the U. S. to improve schools," he said.

Now, according to the Secretary, college entrance examination scores are beginning to climb, and there is renewed dedication to improving education on the part of state governments, school boards, teachers, and community leaders.

Dr. Bell lays out priorities and goals for American education and puts a five-year time limit on them. Among the priorities are:

- Every student must be given the opportunity to achieve the highest possible level of literacy.
- All students should master, within their limits, the basic elements of mathematics.
- Schools must instruct students in the preservation of the American system of government.

His goals include the "five new basics" of English, mathematics, science, social studies, and one-half year of computer science as requirements of all high school students in the country, an increase in the scholastic aptitude test scores, a decrease in the high school drop-out rate to ten percent, and better teacher salaries.

Dr. Bell also cites the importance of improved teacher training, tougher school curricula, more teacher professionalism and higher college entrance requirements. Ane he also reminds the reader of the President's commitment, and his own, to tuition tax credits so that parents will have the right to send their children to schools of their choice.

"The home is the first school," writes the Secretary. "Parents are a child's first teacher. Parents should reinforce the lessons their children learn in school." Dr. Bell also suggests that parents share their views on education with school officials.

The Reagan Administration, the Secretary states, will continue to recognize excellence in education through special recognition of schools and individual academic achievement.

The Secretary said that motivation, leadership, and a strong commitment are keys to the achievement of excellence.

Hedda Gabler

By JERRY DAGENHART

Henrik Ibsen's drama Hedda Gabler, is in its final week of rehearsal. The play is being produced by the Longwood Players and is under the direction of Patton Lockwood. Hedda Gabler will open Tuesday, April 17, and run through Friday, April 20.

HENRIK IBSEN

The title role of Hedda will be portrayed by Junior Connie Watkins. Connie is no stranger to the Jarman stage. She was last seen in Gypsy and she was also in last semester's production of The Imaginary Invalid. Connie also brings to the play a wealth of experience from her junior college productions performed at Southern Seminary. Although Hedda is probably Connie's most challenging role to date, her progress in rehearsal gives great promise that it will be her best performance yet.

Supporting Connie are: Tony Russo in the role of Jurgen — her bookworm husband, Vince Decker as appraiser Brack — an interloping friend of the family, Jeff Abernathy as Ejlert Lovborg — Hedda's old flame, Alyssa Abbey as Thea Elvested — Hedda's school day rival, Donna Baldwin as Jula Tessman Jurgen's old maid aunt, and completing the cast is Jenny Johnson as Berta — Hedda's maid.

Behind the scenes supporting the cast is a very hard-working array of crews who are diligently creating the technical aspects for Hedda Gabler. All of the crews are under the direction of Technical Director A. Moffet Evans.

Curtain time is 8:00 p.m., general admission is $3.00 and all Longwood students will be admitted free with college I.D.

What Are You Doing Here?

By BILL MOORE
Student Development Educator

Have you ever stopped to think what you're doing in college? Sure, you say — I'm taking a few classes, going to some parties, uh, you know, having a good time. Yes, but what are you doing here? Hey, it's not important; I've got to experience the present, the future will take care of itself.

Would you say that? Perhaps not; but I see a lot of people who seem to be acting on those assumptions, and I'd like to explore an alternative: we shape the future by what we do in the present, and in clarifying our present we can improve our future. Let me explain.

A number of times I have talked to graduating seniors and heard the line, I haven't done much of anything, how can I write any kind of resume? They know that they took some classes, and yes, by golly, they will have a degree in whatever, but they are stumped when asked about their skills what they've learned in four years of "higher education". Most students are not accustomed to thinking in terms of building skills; it is much more common to only think of college as a place where KNOWLEDGE is driven-infused into your brain. Certainly that element is there, and not to be denied. Yet through your experiences both in and out of class you are developing a set of skills which will prove useful in the "real world". I'm not talking about specific job skills, either; those skills are almost always taught on-the-job and not before. I'm talking about basic functional skills which are necessary for most jobs — the ability to think, to raise questions about issues and problems, to communicate both in written and oral form, to relate to people. These are the skills, believe it or not, that can be the difference between getting or not getting the job you want, that can determine how satisfied you are with your job and how long you stay there. And you can gain these skills in a variety of ways in your years in college.

Which brings me back to my original point — if you do not think about what you're doing in the present, then you are missing an opportunity to fully benefit from your college experience and construct the resume you'll write when you graduate.

So take some time to think about what your classes mean, and what skills you are building. Just in case somebody asks you, what are you doing here?

Survey Reveals Freshmen Views

76% of men, 27% of women say that "sex is ok if the two people really like each other."

By JEFF ABERNATHY

In a survey of 353 freshmen at the beginning of the fall semester, Student Development Educator Bill Moore found that Longwood freshmen are "more conservative" than college freshmen nationally, they had lower academic expectations, and 52 percent listed Longwood as their first choice as opposed to 70 percent nationally. They also, however, placed being "very well off financially" 11 percent lower than did freshmen nationally (59 percent-70 percent) and showed higher expectations of receiving a bachelor's degree.

The survey was based on Alexander Astin's 1983-84 Cooperative Research Program. A partial listing of the survey results follows:

Political Viewpoints:

— 45 percent of freshmen males believe that "military spending should be increased" as opposed to 40 percent nationally; 40 percent of the women agreed.

— 62 percent of all freshmen surveyed believe that abortion should remain legalized (55 percent nationally).

24% of Longwood freshmen expect to marry within a year after College.

— 59 percent of men, 40 percent of women believe that there "should be laws prohibiting homosexual relationships."

Academics:

— 46 percent of women decided on Longwood in the fall of their senior year (32 percent decided in the spring).

— 58 percent of men decided on Longwood in the spring of their senior year (24 percent in fall).

— 15 percent of males came to Longwood because "athletic department recruited me" (4 percent females).

— While 58 percent reported a 'B' average or better in high school (65 percent women, 40 percent men):

19 percent expecte to get a 'B' or better in college;

51 percent have educational plans beyond a bachelor's degree;

19 percent expect to transfer;

— expected to live in a coed dorm at twice the national rate.

Miscellaneous:

— 45 percent of men believe that student publications should be cleared by college officials.

— 76 percent of men, 27 percent of women say that "sex is OK if the two people really like each other."

— 74 percent cited one of their life objectives being to raise a family as opposed to 65 percent nationally.

— 24 percent expect to marry within a year of college.

Mass Student Protest Of Aid Cuts Becomes A 'Dud

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — National student leaders tried to stage a massive show of student opposition to proposed federal financial aid cuts last week, but not many student showed up.

About 300 students rallied outside the Capitol March 26 to register their protest of President Reagan's proposed aid budget. If the budget passes it would translate into about 900,000 fewer loans and grants during the 1984-85 school year.

The event, part of the annual National Student Lobby Action Day, drew about 2,000 students last March, and about 4,500 in March, 1982.

As recently as the end of February, event organizer Kathy Ozer told College Press Service she hoped some 7,000 students would participate this year.

"The numbers weren't as important as the information the students brought," she asserts. The effort, which included talking to legislators before the rally, "was one of the most effective we've ever had."

Lobbying, not the rally, was the major order of the day, Ozer says, and students patrolling the Capitol's halls wearing "Education Cuts Never Heal" buttons did get to speak to many legislators and legislators' staff members.

The legislative timing, moreover, was fortuitous. Different committees were in the midst of debating the all-important Higher Education Reauthorization Act of 1985 — which will influence aid programs through the remainder of the decade — and President Reagan's proposed $17 billion Department of Education budget.

Students themselves had mixed feelings about how effective they were in their lobbying.

Local Student Performs Unusual Internship

Valerie Perini has read the personal letters of Jefferson Davis' wife. She has researched the furnishings inside the White House of the Confederacy. In short, she is familiar with the Confederacy's First Family, their home and their private life.

Not bad for someone who grew up in New York City and, until recently, "had no overwhelming interest in the Civil War."

Ms. Perini, of Farmville, is a senior anthropology major at Longwood College. Since last spring, she has been involved in an internship program at The Museum of The Confederacy in Richmond. This semester marks the third consecutive semester she has worked part-time for the Museum.

She began as an intern last spring, working two days a week for a six-week period, learning the various functions of each division at the Museum. In the fall semester and again this semester, she has been a research assistant one day each week. Valerie is under the direction of Patti Loughridge, who formerly was curator of education and now is curator of the White House of the Confederacy, located adjacent to the Museum.

"I've always liked history because it's like reading a storybook," she said recently. "When I was young, I was encouraged to go to museums."

These internship experiences were developed by Dr. James Jordan, head of the Sociology and Anthropology department, after discussing her interests with her. Ms. Perini is interested in "cultural anthropology" — the study of living groups — and is considering a career in museum work. She is the first Longwood student from her department to participate in such an internship. The Museum of The Confederacy staff has been flexible in adjusting work hours that fit her schedule, she said.

The Museum, which opened in 1976, is next to the White House of the Confederacy, which is closed while being restored to its wartime appearance.

Ms. Perini, who is the mother of three daughters, will graduate in May. She moved to Farmville in the late 1970s, and entered Longwood in the fall of 1980.

She has made the Dean's List five times, and recently was selected for the 1984 edition of Who's Who Among Students in American Universities and Colleges. Valerie is a member of Alpha Lambda Delta honor society and, during her sophomore year, received the Kathleen G. Cover Award for academic excellence. On April 17 she will be initiated into Phi Kappa Phi honor society.

The research Ms. Perini conducted last semester was primarily "literary" research — it included the letters of Varina Howell Davis, Jefferson Davis' wife, and the often-quoted diary of Mary Boykin Chesnut, a chronicler of wartime Richmond. This semester, she has researched items donated to the Museum that are thought to have belonged to the Davis family.

"Records such as Mrs. Davis' letters and the Chesnut diary are valuable because they flesh out the historical data and let us know how the people actually lived. In our research this semester, we're branching out — spending more time at the Virginia Historical Society and the State Library. What I'm doing now is a continuation of last semester, but the research is broader."

Although her primary interests lie in the primitive or prehistoric past, Ms. Perini finds it much easier to research the events of only 120 years ago. "This era of history is very gratifying because if you look hard enough, you're going to find what you're after. The work at the Museum has been very interesting. I've learned a lot and it's been fun."

Before going into museum-related work, Ms. Perini would like to do anthropological field work. "I'd like to have actually been there. I don't want someone coming in from the field in their jeans, trying to discuss things I've never personally experienced."

Ms. Perini also would consider teaching; when she graduates, she will be provisionally certified to teach sociology or anthropology at the secondary level. She has applied to the University of Virginia Graduate School of Anthropology.

Voter Registration

By W. W. EDWARDS

The attempt to get college students registered to vote is gaining wide-spread support throughout the country, and the Student Government Association here at Longwood does not intend to get left out. The SGA is in the process of planning a Voter Registration drive, which they hope will inform students on how they can register, and how to vote by absentee ballot.

Even though college students have often been willing participants in political demonstrations, their voting record has not always been the best. Statistics show that, for instance, in the 1982 Congressional elections, only 18.3 percent of 18-and-19 year olds voted, while only 27.2 percent of all 20- to 24-year-olds did so.

Several organizations are lending their support to this nationwide movement. The United States Student Associaton is one of the main ones launching a 200,000 dollar campaign this summer to register college students in 16 states, while the Public Interests Research Group is beginning a multi-million dollar campaign to register from one to three million students.

Nationwide leaders of this movement stress the importance of a strong youth movement in elections. Beth De Grasse (of the Public Interests Research Group) has said that despite their relatively low turnout at the polls in the past, students could gain some political clout in this year's election if they can convince the news media and the candidates that they are capable of mobilizing a large number of voters.

Thomas M. Blanton, of the Black Law Students Association at Howard University stressed that students would be in a better lobbying position if more office holders were elected with strong student support, so that leaders of student organizations could just "pick up the phone" when important policy votes are being cast.

On the local level, the Virginia Student Association held a Fall Voter Awareness Week that disseminated voter information to nearly 10,000 students in Virginia. The SGA here hopes that their drive will be successful, as having students participate in the political process is one of the best ways to obtain those rights which students are entitled to.

"Visit us for information, to get help for a friend, or for yourself"

The Alcohol Education Committee has developed the Center to provide for "structured observation" by trained volunteers. Currently we have over 60 students who are very excited about running the program!

The Center allows for students, who have drunk beyond a responsible limit, to be aided in an appropriate environment. We receive students as "referrals" by boy/girl friends, roommates, RAs, etc. Please encourage your students to become familiar with the Center. We also have excellent brochures, handouts and other information free for the taking.

If you want more information, please call Barb Gorski, Student Development Educator and Chair of the Alcohol Education Committee at 392-9347.

Thank you for your support of this greatly needed service.

Longwood's Kersey On Way To The NBA

If one were going to write a book about Jerome Kersey's experience in the 32nd Portsmouth Invitational Tournament last week, a suitable title might be: "On The Road To The NBA With Jerome Kersey."

That's right! I said NBA as in National Basketball Association. You know, Dr. J. and Moses and Magic and Kareem.

Yes! We're talking about that same Jerome Kersey of Clarksville, Virginia who played basketball for Division II Longwood College the past four years.

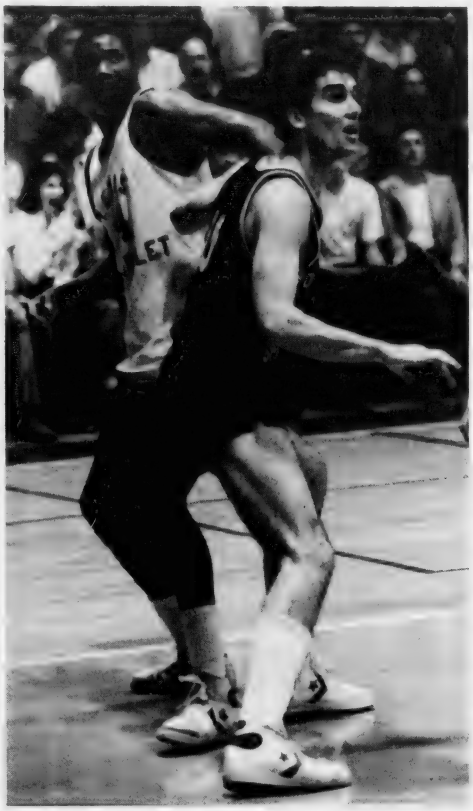
What Kersey did in the Portsmouth Invitational Tournament against Division I players caught the notice of a lot of people, including Mary Blake, NBA Director of Scouting. After seeing Kersey score 18 points and grab 14 rebounds in a Friday night contest, Mr. Blake predicted the 6-7, 220-pounder would be taken in the first three rounds of the NBA Draft.

"He's helped himself as much as anyone in the tournament," said Blake. He's gone from being a guy who had no chance in the eyes of many people, to being a prospect who'll be drafted in the first three rounds."

Kersey scored 46 points and grabbed 38 rebounds in three tournament contests, helping his Bill Lewis Chevrolet team reach the finals Saturday night. One of only three Division II players invited, Kersey was the top rebounder in the event. He averaged 15.3 points and 12.7 rebounds.

He also showcased his all-around skills with steals, blocked shots, dunks and assists. In short, th was THE SURPRISE of the tournament, outplaying such heralded Division I standouts as Matt Doherty of North Carolina.

Doherty was a teammate of Kersey's in games played Friday and Saturday nights. Kersey admitted being "pumped up" for his first test against Division I players.



"The only place I've seen most of these guys before was on TV," said Kersey.

For the record, Kersey scored 14 points and had 10 rebounds in his team's opening 107-94 win Wednesday night. Friday night, in a 119-118 overtime triumph, he had 18 points and 14 rebounds. In Saturday's 106-100 loss in the finals, Jerome had 14 points and 14 rebounds, making eight of nine free throws. He scored eight points in 39 seconds late in the contest to lead a Bill Lewis comeback.

"Playing in the Portsmouth Invitational was a super experience for Jerome," said Lancer coach Cal Luther. "It was great for him to go down there and find out he could play with Division I players. He's got his foot in the door now.

"Several scouts I talked to were impressed with his quickness and defensive ability. He did some things those guys (NBA scouts) are really looking for. They saw his physical skills and that he's a worker. The main criticism of Jerome would be that he wasn't in great shape after a long layoff (Longwood season ended March 2)."

Kersey played center for the Lancers this past season, but ended up at the small forward spot much of the time last week. Luther felt he adjusted pretty well to playing more on the perimeter.

Lancers Winning

Longwood's nationally ranked baseball team continued its record string of victories last week with five wins for a sparkling 20-4 record. The Lancers, with 14 wins in a row, face Division I opponents Virginia Monday and William & Mary Friday in tough tests this week.

In addition to the two Division I tests, Longwood visits Virginia State for two games Tuesday and hosts King Saturday and Bristol Sunday in home twinbills. Next Monday (April 16) Hampden-Sydney visits for two contests.

Last week, Longwood dispatched Virginia State 10-0 and 7-4 Tuesday, St. Paul's 6-3 Friday and Maryland Eastern Shore 22-7 and 16-3 Saturday. The Lancers are now just eight wins away from tying the mark for regular season triumphs (28 set in 1982).

Longwood outscored its opposition 61-17 last week as the Lancers boosted their team batting average to an eye-popping .366. Leading the way was outfielder Mike Haskins who had 11 hits in 14 at-bats for a .786 average for five games. The sophomore tri-captain upped his average for the season to a team best .511.

A singles hitter, Haskins scored 11 runs and drove in three. Batting in the leadoff spot, he had six hits in seven at-bats against Maryland Eastern Shore.

Catcher Jeff Rohm went 4-4 in the opening win over UMES and drove in three runs while Dennis Leftwich had three hits and three RBI's. Third baseman Marty Ford and outfielder James Jackson each drove in four runs in Longwood's 16-3 triumph in the nightcap.

Designated hitter Jeff Mayone had two homers, two doubles, nine RBI's and eight hits in 18 at-bats last week.

Lancer Netters

In men's tennis action last week, Longwood beat Ferrum 8-1 Monday, lost to Hampden-Sydney 9-0 Tuesday and fell to St. Paul's 5-4 in a tough match Saturday afternoon. This week the Lancers play at Lynchburg Monday, host John Jay Thursday and Virginia Wesleyan Friday.

Taking wins for Longwood in Saturday's loss to St. Paul's were: Mark Hogge at No. 4, Tim Colyer at No. 5 and Pete Maxwell at No. 6 singles. Maxwell teamed with Darden Smith for a victory at No. 2 doubles.

Longwood's record is 4-7 heading into this week.

Lancer Golfers

Longwood's men's golf team will take part in the 18-hole VMI and Washington & Lee Invitational Wednesday and the Virginia Intercollegiate Championships Saturday and Sunday in action this week. The VMI and W&L Tourney was slated for last Thursday, but was rained out. Coach Steve Nelson is hoping his team will develop some consistency in the upcoming tournaments.

Longwood's Lynne Gilbert rounds third base on the way to another run. Lady Lancers shut out Roanoke and James Madison.

Softball Team Unbeaten

Off to its best start ever, Longwood's softball team shut-out Roanoke 11-0 and James Madison 5-0 Saturday afternoon for a 4-0 early season record. Coach Nanette Fisher's team has yet to give up a run in its first four games.

Longwood faces doubleheaders at James Madison Tuesday and at Mary Washington Wednesday, before returning home to host Radford Saturday at 1:00.

Pitcher Betsy Armstrong tossed a one-hitter and struck out 15 batters to pace Saturday's 11-0 win over Roanoke. Junior transfer M. J. Campbell hurled her second shutout of the season Saturday, beating James Madison. Campbell has given up just three hits in 14 innings of work.

Top batters for Longwood thus far have been freshman catcher Kathy Guillot with a .600 average, Sharon Sculthorpe .333, four RBI's, and Kay Aultman .333 with six runs scored.

In addition to hurling four shutouts, Longwood pitchers have struck out 33 batters in 26 innings. Armstrong's 15 strikeouts Saturday is a Longwood record.

"The four shutouts reflect on our team defense and the strength of our pitching staff," said Longwood coach Nanette Fisher. "Overall, this year we're doing much better offensively and defensively."

Lacrosse Team

By CINDY CORREL

Longwood's lacrosse team bounced back from two losses to beat Sweet Briar 13-11 Sunday afternoon, bringing its early season mark to 1-2. This week, the Lady Lancers host Lynchburg Tuesday, visit Mary Washington Thursday and host Maryland Baltimore Co. Saturday.

Sophomore All-American Sue Groff scored eight goals and Ann Holland added three as Longwood turned back Sweet Briar. Goalie Lorraine Hall had seven saves in the first period.

Lady Lancer Netters

Getting its spring season off on a positive note, Longwood's women's tennis team shut-out visiting Averett 9-0 Friday. This week coach Carrol Bruce's team plays at Virginia Wesleyan Monday, at William & Mary's juinor varsity Tuesday and then hosts Christopher-Newport Wednesday at 3:00.

Taking singles wins for Longwood Friday were: Stephanie Peters at No. 1, Laura Baines at No. 2, Ann Pitzer at No. 3, Terri Justice at No. 4, Heather Gardner at No. 5 and Penny Powell at No. 6.

Doubles winners included: Peters and Pitzer at No. 1, Baines and Gardner at No. 2 and Powell and Justice at No. 3.

Lady Lancer Golfers

Longwood's women's golf team finished 17th out of 19 predominantly Division I teams in the Peggy Kirk Bell Invitational Sunday through Tuesday in Winter Park, Florida last week. Longwood had scores of 348-350-340 for a total of 1038. South Florida won the title with a 903.

Participating for Longwood were: Lanie Gerken 90-83-76-249, Sue Morgan 82-90-85-257, Carol Rhoades 89-93-92-274, Kim Patterson 87-88-87-262 and Cheryl Dufort 96-89-101-286.

Next up for the Lady Lancer golfers is the Penn State Lady Lioon Invitational Saturday and Sunday in State College, Pennsylvania.

Freedom Summer Campaign

College campuses across the country are the focus of a massive student recruitment drive for an unprecedented voter registration campaign aimed at registering one million low income votes.

The campaign, "Freedom Summer '84," has already gained wide support from campus organizers and leaders including students recently selected as paid coordinators. They will launch a recruitment blitz to enroll 5,000 student volunteers who will register voters at public assistance offices, "cheese lines," health clinics and other social service agencies in 60 cities. The 10-week project, June 1 through August 11, is sponsored by the United States Student Association (USSA), the National Student Educational Fund and Human SERVE (Service Employees Registration Voter Education) Fund.

The drive marks the 20th anniversary of "Mississippi Freedom Summer 1964," a movement which drew students to the deep South. They plaed a major role in mobilizing and registering many disenfranchised Blacks, helping to gain passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1964.

Freedom Summer '84 will involve a broader spectrum of statewide student associations, student governments and campus-based fraternities and sororities. They will be supervised by leading voter registration organizations such as the Voter Education Project, Midwest Voter Registration and Education Project, Southwest Voter Registration and Education Project and Project VOTE! Many students will receive course credit, while more than 40 social work departments are placing students as part of field work programs.

"Freedom Summer '84 will be the most important project that students can commit themselves to this summer. It will be an invaluable learning experience and provide the opportunity to move into the forefront of the political arena," said USSA President Greg Moore. "By November, any lingering doubts about the importance of students in the electoral process should be dispelled."

USSA includes 3.5 million members and affiliates on over 300 campuses. Many of the affiliates have already recruited volunteers and are conducting campus voter registration. Freedom Summer Coordinators, selected from every region, will be paid weekly stipends and will launch campus rallies, teach-ins, classroom speaking and other drives to reach large numbers of students.

Human SERVE Executive Director Hulbert James noted that student participation will give significant momentum to ongoing registration drives at social service agencies. Human

Students Dance For MD

An energetic group of Longwood College students recently danced for 21 hours to raise money in the fight against muscular dystrophy.

The "Super Dance," held in Longwood's lower dining hall, began at 6 p.m. on Friday, April 6, and lasted until 3 o'clock the following afternoon. Thirty-two students participated; all but six danced the entire time, said coordinator Eddie Esatto. Those six people had to limit their dancing for medical reasons.

They raised more than $2,200 for the Muscular Dystrophy Association, Esatto said. Each dancer had received pledges—some per hour, others a total pledge—prior to the dance.

"This year's dance was a rebuilding process," explained Esatto. "We've had Super Dances at Longwood since 1979, but we didn't have one last year. We were trying to acclimate the freshmen and sophomores who didn't know what a Super Dance was."

The dancers took 10-minute breaks every hour, and reserved a half-hour for dinner Friday and a half-hour for breakfast and lunch Saturday. "This was a dance-a-thon, not a dance marathon. But they still danced their hearts out."

Pi Kappa Phi fraternity coordinated the dance, with help from all fraternities and sororities. About 500-600 people attended a mixer Friday evening at the Super Dance. "The mixer helped, because those people saw the dancers and said to themselves, 'Maybe we'll do this next year,'" Esatto said. "We're hoping to have greater participation and raise over $6,000 next year."

Jim Steve and Susan Aasen dance to "Rock of Ages".

Billy Duncan, a disc jockey for Q-94 radio station and a former Longwood student, played music from 6 Friday evening until 1 in the morning. "I can still hear music playing in my head," laughed Esatto, who was in the lower dining hall from early Friday afternoon until a few hours after the dance ended.

Asked if the dancers felt "dead" by Saturday afternoon, Esatto said, "Actually, they were fairly peppy near the end."

LIVE '84 A Success

A funny thing happened — or, rather, didn't happen — during LIVE '84 on Saturday, March 31.

Organizers of LIVE '84, a Longwood College-sponsored volunteer work day in the community, had expected something to eventually go wrong with the first-time event. However, they were pleasantly surprised.

"I thought we'd have some problems at some point in the day, but everything went like clock-work," said coordinator Tom Bailey.

"The volunteers were great," added Bailey, a senior from Richmond. "We never had any complaints. Sign-in wasn't supposed to start until 8:30 — we had people there at 8:15."

About 500 Longwood students, faculty and staff took part in the work day, known as "Longwood Initiates volunteer Energy."

Volunteers performed yardwork at the homes of senior citizens and Longwood's Alumni House; painted windows at the Old Mill; picked up trash along several roads; cleaned the former high school; Scope Senior Citizens Center, and the United Way-Red Cross office; and visited patients at Eldercare and Holly Manor.

"We had doubled the number of workers for each site, thinking some wouldn't show, but just about everybody that we assigned to a work site showed up," Bailey said. "So the jobs got finished a lot quicker than we had anticipated. There were very few no-shows."

The work began around 9:30 in the morning, as the Longwood bus transported workers to their sites. Members of Alpha Chi Rho fraternity and Kappa Delta sorority worked at the former high school. Members of Zeta Tau Alpha sorority worked at the Old Mill, which is now used by the Waterworks Players, and visited at Eldercare. Alpha Gamma Delta sisters picked up trash along Rt. 15 south. Members of Longwood's Institutional Advancement staff worked outside at the Alumni House.

"I talked to guys who were driving the town trucks and they said they had never seen people working so hard," said Bailey. "They picked up 275 bags of grabage."

Traci Goodwyn of Zeta Tau Alpha removes staples from window at the Old Mill.

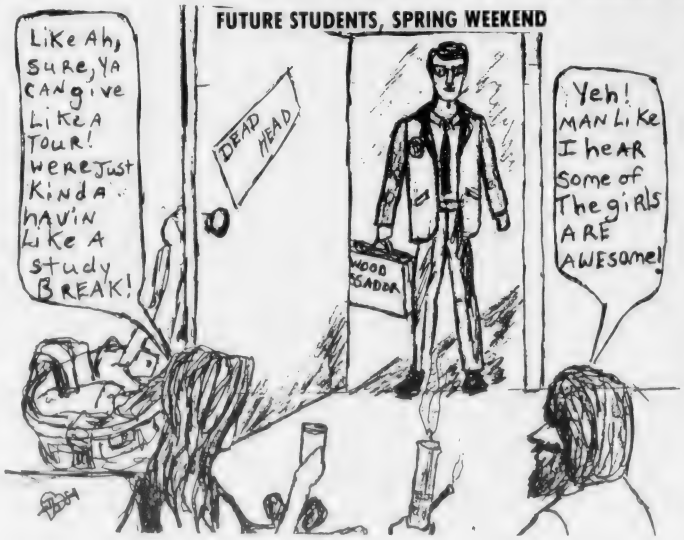
Longwood— The University

Yes, that's right, friends and neighbors, for a nominal fee of twenty-thousand dollars per year your children will be able to follow in your footsteps and graduate from Longwood in the year 2006. Longwood — The University. You heard it right, friends — Longwood University. And they'll have their choice of any one of two-hundred and thirty-seven majors to choose from. Yes, two-hundred and thirty-seven. Majors from kayaking to bricklaying. That's right, Longwood, the Southern Women's College in Farmville, Virginia, is finally growing out of its diapers. There will be no stone left unturned.

The College Board of Visitors met last week and approved an eleven percent hike in tuition and fees for the 1984-85 year. In-State resident students will be paying $4,383 while out-of-state students will pay $5,608. For you English majors, that's a $17,532 per diploma for in-state and $22,432 per diploma for out-of-state students. The Board cited the pursuit of "educational excellence" as reasoning for the increase.



The current increase comes on the heels of another, and, it seems, is part of an endless love of increases. As students, our input into the actual necessity of the increase as well as the budgeting itself, is nill. We are at the mercy of THE BOARD, as it chooses to cite vague reasons for the increase.

Further in the pursuit of "educational excellence", the Board authorized the proposal of additional programs in the Longwood curriculum. These programs may be proposed to the State Council on Higher Education and, if approved, initiated between 1986 and 1993. They include, at the undergraduate level, programs in Actuarial Science, Management Information Systems, Public Justice, Rural Development, Energy Resource Management, Public Administration, and Nursing. At the Graduate level, your kids might be able to pick up an MBA at LU!

The Board of Visitors and others are clearly setting their sights somewhere around Jupiter. It would be ludicrous to establish thirteen new degree programs at a school with 2500 students, and the attempt to do so would only harm the existing programs.

Longwood currently has a vast majority of business majors, and the economics minor was recently dropped from the Business Department. And we're now going to be able to support thirteen new majors? Hardly. The effort is one in a series of such actions which makes some few look very good, while the students of this college only suffer.

Your Turn

To the Editor:

"Unity" may be defined as a group of individuals coming together to achieve a common goal. Now a group of students here, at Longwood College, have put these words into action, by forming Unity. Unity's main objective is to dissolve the silly prejudices that are on Longwood's campus. The group hopes to accomplish their goal by presenting a play entitled "Not You" by Terry McAllister, a member of Unity. This play will have many of the prejudices that blacks and whites feel towards each other.

How did Unity originate? It was Charles Pace's workshop on Sunday, February 5, 1984, that brought together and motivated ten students to form Unity. Pace, through a series of discussion questions, assisted the students in realizing how little black and white students get together, and how usually when they do get together the main goal, of both races, is to party.

Unity realizes that people should be regarded as people rather than by color; therefore, they would like to see black and white students, not only partying together, but going beyond that type of relationship to a group of people with a common goal . . . a Unity.

Dear Sir:

I would like you to put the following article in the next issue of The Rotunda. If there are any problems, please do not hesitate to contact me.

On April 18th, ARA will feature a birthday dinner featuring a variety of French items. This decision to offer French menu items is correlated to the promotion which is entitled "Restore Freedom's Symbol." This promotion revolves around the restoration of the Statue of Liberty which was given to us by the French people in 1886. This restoration which is entirely being funded by public contributions is essential as time and environmental factors have played its toll on the statue. Indeed, without 230 million for restoration the Statue of Liberty will close by the year 1996. For this reason, we are asking that the Longwood community work in conjunction with ARA towards this worthy cause. Contributions need not be large. A mere 50 cents from every dorm student would allow Longwood to contribute close to 900 dollars. Let's all do our share and preserve this symbol of freedom. Donations will be collected on the evening of April 18th. Once again, let's all do our share!

SPRING WEEKEND

Gene Cotton

By EDDIE HOLLANDER

I didn't want to review Gene Cotton's show Thursday night in the Gold Room. One of my favorite artists was here at Langwood, half-way through his performance and I wasn't enjoying it.

The songs were good, naturally. After all, this was Gene Cotton with "Ocean of Life" and "Before My Heart Finds Out," which were both hits in the seventies. His twelve-string guitar-work on "Ocean of Life" was impressive and the crowd was appreciative. Still, we were an hour into this show, and I wasn't excited. It wasn't great' it was just good.

I was worried that this show was going to be the Gene Cotton Top Ten Hits Hour. Fortunately, I soon found that I was wrong. Most of the songs were from Cotton's albums, but played many of his less popular tunes. "Junk Song" was very enjoyable, and Cotton had a good time with it, drawing the audience in to participating. "Cosmic Book of Jokes" was one of the evening's many reversions in to a 1960's spirit, and an example of Cotton's brilliant song-writing. "Yours People" was also very good.

Cotton's twenty minute comedy routine was unnecessary and it wasn't in keeping with the mood of many of the evening's songs. I didn't come to see Gene Cotton the comic, and the routine was not good enough to make me want to see him again in that mode.

Once he was through the comedy, however, I was again impressed with his music. His interpretation — yes, interpretation — of the Beatle's "Eleanor Rigby" was the highlight of the show. It was superb, and it showed the heaviest emphasis on Cotton's soothing voice of any song all night. "Friend of Mine," written on December 9, 1980, was a good follow to "Eleanor Rigby." "Shine On," which may be said to be Cotton's theme song, was also very good. Cotton closed the show with "Circle Song" and a sing-along of "Amazing Grace." Cotton's performance was good, though perhaps not at its best, and I hope to see Gene Cotton at Longwood again.

Snuff A Success

By VINCE DECKER

Snuff played to one of the biggest paid crowds of the year in the lower dining hall Saturday night. No worn out pre-programmed synthesized funk this night — just good ole stompin' music — Southern rock at its best. Their sound, blend of early Eagles with a bit of Charlie Danielsish fiddle thrown in for good measure had the audience out of their chairs and jumping early.

The vocal harmony was reminiscent of Crosby, Stills and Nash. The three guitarists stood there looking and sounding good, but the real visual excitement was provided by violinist Cecil Hooker. Hooker never sang a word, concentrating on his bowwork, going into the audience several times and gyrating to the music with his two feet of hair flying everywhere but into the strings.

The song list included covers and originals but no imitations. Some of the hotter covers included Neil Young's "Ohio," "Longtall Sally" and "Friend of the Devil" by the Grateful Dead. The Southern beat and Hooker's bowwork made me want to square dance to the Dead. Snuff originals like "Boys From Oklahoma," "Night Fighter" and "Definance in the Face of Disaster" got some of the evening's biggest responses.

Lead guitarist-singer Chuck Larson introduced most of the songs and was loaded with humerous little cracks. "This is for all you people who are into farmin' and stuff like that" opened a Bluegrass medly. The introduction to "Awesome Annie" got the most laughter: "I saw her in the corner a couple of minutes ago — she was resting her breasts on the table."

I was expecting to see an Alabama clone and was very pleasantly surprised that I was wrong. Snuff is more of a Rock band than a country band, but that blend made for some real fine hodown rock and roll.

Cecil Hooker appeared with Snuff Saturday night.

STATES

In another Student Union's freebie, The States were a resounding success for the third year in a row. But that was no surprise. With the best combined drumming, bass and vocals of any Longwood-caliber band there was no chance that The States were going to be anything but a great time. And if that show was any indication of where they are going in the future, it's right back here next year, instead of on to bigger things where a band of their ability should be.

One could see it in the air about the band that they have settled into touring either as a warm-up for other bands or in such lucrative places as Longwood's lower dining hall. They played their songs with definite ease, an ease that indicated not only a lot of familiarity with the songs, but the sheer fact that most of the newer songs they were playing were easy.

Like many bands today, The States have shifted their style enough to be considered another of the syntho-pop bands that are turning up all over the country. Certainly The States figured that their talent would go over big when offered to the same audience that bought up the second British Invasion. But the problem is that this new movement has no requirement of talent. Appearance is the gimmick that these bands go on. Transvestites and nearly bald women in tacky smoking jackets are ruling the charts with music that a twelve year old could perform on his Apple. And when the audience saw such things as the drum solo, the Romantics older hit when they were playing real new wave and The Trogs' Wild Thing for an encore, they showed by their responses that The States are a rock-and-roll band. And unless they start wearing their hair like 80's Osmond Brothers or something, there's no other way that they are going to get where they want to be.

The band played excellent rock and roll. But the newer tunes were mediocre and they even looked bored playing them. No more Prince. Please, no more Prince! The States are vastly talented. And any time that they decide to ditch that synthesizer and play what they should be playing they may never have to see another cafeteria again.

—Mike Lynch

DJ For A Day

On Friday morning, two Longwood students, Tami Whitley and Kim Evoy joined the WRVQ (Richmond) radio station staff as guest D.J.'s on the "Q Morning Zoo". Tami, a junior from Newport News, and Kim, a sophomore from New Jersey, won the guest D.J. spot after sending a poem which they had written on the back of a Cumbey's Jeweler (of Farmville) bag.

Kim and Tami entered the contest just to try something new and just to have fun, which they did. For the three hours that they were on the air (from 6-9 a.m.) their jobs included the early morning wake-up call, the "horrible" scope, and reading the time and the weather. In addition, Tami and Kim "ad-libed" with the regular Q-morning D.J.'s and operated the sound effects instruments which have become a regular part of the Q Morning Zoo.

When asked what it was like, they replied, "the D.J.'s made it easy. They made fun of our mistakes and kept it so light-hearted that you didn't even realize you were on the air . . . It was an experience we'll never forget." For having worked as guest D.J.'s, Tami and Kim both received a Q-94 T-shirt and a one dollar check from WRVQ -94 in Richmond.

States appeared in the Lower Dining Hall on Sunday.

Summer Campaign

SERVE is a clearinghouse for agency-based registration within the human service community.

Agency-based registration gives new dimension to the 1964 Mississippi Freedom Summer Campaign. That era marked a peak in student activism fueled by the civil rights movement and anti-war protests. Unlike the 1964 campaign, concentrated in the rural deep South, the 1984 effort will be launched in large urban centers and industrial states where millions are unregistered.

Freedom Summer Registration sites include: California, Connecticute, Colorado, Georgia, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia. For more information on volunteer registration, contact: USSA-NSEF 202-775-8943, 202-785-1856 or Human SERVE 212-280-4053.

Ashby, Lancers Are On A Roll

By RONNIE BROWN

Todd Ashby and the Longwood College baseball team are on a roll. Before Friday's loss to William & Mary, the Lancers boasted a 21-4 record, 15 straight wins and 12th place national ranking in NCAA Division II. One of the big contributors to Longwood's season is Ashby, a graduate of Buffalo Gap High School. The sophomore pitcher has a 5-1 record and a 3.44 earned run average, while walking just 10 batters to 39 innings.

Just last Monday Ashby, a Churchville native, picked up credit for the win as Longwood knocked off Virginia 2-1, handing the Cavaliers their first loss outside the Atlantic Coast Conference. The lefthander pitched seven and two-thirds innings, scattered seven hits and gave up only one run.

Ashby is one of the leaders of Longwood's young pitching staff.

"Scott Mills and I are the upperclassmen on the pitching staff and that has inspired us to bring out our talents," explained Ashby. "Coach told Scott and me that he would count on us to pitch the big games. That puts pressure on me, but it's a constructive pressure to do my best."

Longwood Coach Buddy Bolding, who was a pitcher in his college days, respects Ashby's ability to pitch the big games.

"I took to Todd as a leader on the team," says Bolding. "He pitches well under pressure and holds runners on. He can also be used as a relief pitcher in a jam. Todd is continuing to develop into a fine pitcher."

Ashby graduated from Buffalo Gap in 1981 and made a stop at Blue Ridge Community College where he improved his study habits for Longwood. Todd has not only worked hard on his studies, but also on his pitching and physical conditioning.

Pitchers must keep up a year-round program of running and weight training to be effective in the spring and Ashby is no exception.

"You have to dedicate yourself to baseball year-round," said Ashby. "At the beginning of the season Coach can tell if you haven't been in shape. Getting my legs in shape has helped my arms because it takes the pressure off."

In coaching Ashby and the other Lancer hurlers, Bolding stresses the idea of throwing the ball over the plate and forcing the hitter to make the mistakes rather than the pitcher.

"By throwing early strikes, I can dictate what the batter hits," explained Ashby. "I've developed good control and I'm not scared to throw a 3-1 curveball. Coach Bolding's emphasis on throwing early strikes has helped me improve my control."

Ashby was privileged to play under another former pitcher at Buffalo Gap in Coach Dave Lineweaver.

"My high school coach was a pitcher and he knew the fundamentals which helped me develop my curveball. A lot of high school pitching is just blowing the ball past the hitter," explained Ashby.

Ashby has received some good advice over the years and now he passes on what he has learned to his teammates.

"In practice we all get together on how to throw a certain pitch," he explained. "My teammates have helped me with my screwball. The rest of the staff gives me encouragement. We support each other."

Ashby and the other Longwood pitchers have gotten solid support both on defense and at the plate. The Lancers have a team fielding percentage of .962 and a team batting average of .354. Longwood is averaging nine runs per game to the opposition's four.

In 1982 Longwood received a bid to the South Atlantic Region Tournament in Valdosta, Georgia and advanced all the way to the Division II World Series in Riverside, California.

Ashby and his teammates feel they can qualify for another trip to the playoffs.

"I think we can go back to Valdosta," says Todd. "Every person on the team knows his job and if we all contribute, we will have a chance of making it again."

Golfers Finish Third

Despite a final day letdown, Longwood's women's golf team managed a tie for 6th place out of 12 teams in the Penn State Lady Lion Invitational Golf Tournament Saturday and Sunday at the Penn State Blue Course in State College, Pennsylvania.

While Division I power Ohio State won the crown with a 918, Longwood put together rounds of 328-334-354 for a 1016 total and a tie with Bowling Green (OH) for sixth place.

The team finish went as follows: Ohio State 918, Minnesota 927, Penn State Blue 975, James Madison 987, William & Mary 1000, Longwood 1016, Bowling Green 1016, Dartmouth 1029, Amherst 1042, Rutgers 1099, Penn State White 1141 and Yale 1352. The tournament consisted of 36 holes Saturday and 18 Sunday in an endurance-testing format.

Lanie Gerken topped Longwood with an 83-77-85-245 while Sue Morgan shot 83-84-86-253, Kim Patterson 81-87-89-257, Carol Rhoades 81-86-94-261 and Leslie Oscovitch 93-95-97-285.

Final regular season tournament for the Lady Lancers will be this weekend in the North Carolina-Wilmington Invitational.

Lacrosse Team Suffers Loss

Longwood lost its second lacrosse game in three days during the last minute of play Saturday as visiting Maryland Baltimore County scored late to take an 8-7 win, dropping the Lady Lancers to 1-5 on the season.

This week Longwood plays at Randolph-Macon Woman's College Tuesday, at Hollins Thursday and hosts Bridgewater Saturday.

In action last week Coach Mary Willson Schill's squad fell to Lynchburg 7-3 Tuesday, lost to Mary Washington 9-8 Thursday and then suffered another one-goal loss Saturday.

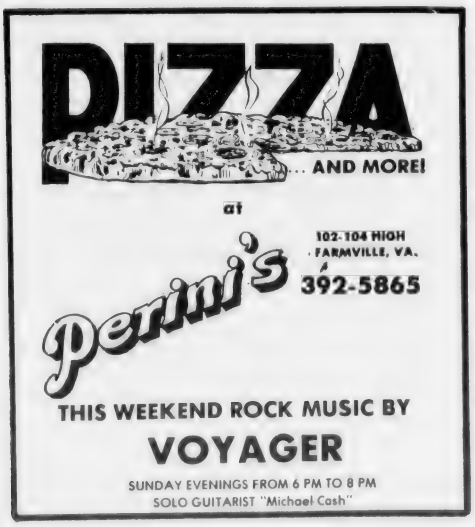
Longwood played well against UMBC despite the absence of starters Sue Groff and Ellen Cykowski. Mariana Johnson scored four goals and goalie Lorraine Hall had 10 saves in the first period.

Groff (knee) and Cykowski (ribs) were both injured in the Mary Washington contest, but hope to be back in action this week. Groff had four goals, Cykowski three and Johnson one in the loss to Mary Washington.

Coach Schill felt Longwood played much better against the Blue Tide than it had in Tuesday's 7-3 loss to Lynchburg.

The Longwood junior varsity team beat Lynchburg 5-4 to even its record at 1-1.

LC Reserve High Point



CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA. — Longwood's 1983-84 riding team finished as Reserve High Point College of the Year in Region VII and three Lancer riders placed in the Region VII Finals of the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association Monday, April 9 at The Barracks.

In addition, Lancer team member Lea Anne Lawson won the walk-trot division at regionals and will represent Longwood in the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association Nationals May 5-6 in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

Competing for Coach Mary Whitlock's squad in the Region VII Finals were Lawson, Lisa Nelson and Kristen Birath.

Nelson finished 4th in novice on-the-flat and novice over-fences while Birath was 3rd in intermediate on-the-flat and 5th in intermediate over-fences.

Regional High Point College of the Year was the University of Virginia. Also competing in the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association were: Christopher-Newport, Lynchburg, Mary-Washington, Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Sweet Briar and William & Mary.

Longwood's Lisa Selvold (33) fights for possession of ball in Saturday's lacross game with UMBC.

Softball Team Wins Three

Sparked by the hitting of Debby Garcia and Judy White, Longwood's women's softball team won three of four games last week, splitting a twin bill at James Madison Tuesday and sweeping a pair of games from Mary Washington Wednesday.

Coach Nanette Fisher's team, now 7-1, plays at Liberty Baptist Monday, hosts VCU Tuesday at 3:30 and travels to Radford Thursday in games this week.

White and Garcia used the long ball to pace a strong Longwood hitting attack in last week's action. Wednesday, White clouted two homers and drove in 8 runs as Longwood belted Mary Washington 13-1 and 22-5. While the Lady Lancers dropped a 3-2 decision in Tuesday's opener at James Madison, Garcia ripped two 3-run homes in the nightcap to pace a 13-1 win.

In the first game over Mary Washington, Longwood got 11 of its 18 hits in the top of the 7th, erupting for 12 runs to end a game which had been tied 1-1 through six innings. Lynne Gilbert had three hits and an RBI and Kay Aultman went 3-4 with 2 RBI's. White had a two-run homer in the seventh.

In the nightcap White hit a grand slam homer and drove in six runs as Longwood took the 22-5 victory. Pitcher M. J. Campbell ran her record to 4-0 with a two-hitter. Campbell has an astounding 0.00 earned run average in 26 innings of work.

New Cheerleaders

Tryouts for next year's men's varsity cheerleaders were held on Monday, April 9. Returning members to the squad are: Lydia Brumfield, Ralph Linkous, Gary Jones, Michael Steiger, Tom Lackey, and Aaron Alexander. The new cheerleaders are: Kurt Peters, Janet Robertson, Brenda Mangum, Daniel Lecuyer, Stephanie Horn, and Connie Bradsher. Alternates are: Virginia Richardson, Rico Criner (both returning), and Cheryl Gluck.

Tryouts for the women's varsity will be held in the fall, for more information contact Coach Joyce Phillips (392-9323).

Special Olympics

By KELLY SICKLER

On Tuesday morning, Iler field was graced with the presence of athletes of every size, age, and background. The purest kind of athlete. Athletes whose determination and stamina helped them to overcome even the greatest of handicaps.

The 4th Annual Special Olympic games began at 9 a.m. with a parade consisting of kazoo players, clowns, athletes and their sponsors. In all, there were approximately 75 athletes participating in events such as the softball throw, the 50 yard dash and the broad jump. There were even special activities for the severely handicapped who for some reason were unable to participate in the regular activities. One new event that turned out to be especially successful was a dance held inside Iler gym in which everyone participated.

Tuesday was cold and overcast, but the Olympics were a success, thanks to the Therapeutic Recreation Organization, who sponsored the Olympics. Also deserving recognition were the individual sponsors, who helped the athletes, and to the many area stores and businesses who donated so much.

The participants came from the Sheltered Workshop, Charter Oaks in Blackstone (a training center for the handicapped), and area elementary and middle school special education classes.

The mood was not "win" but instead "do your best, give it your all." And even though ribbons were given for 1st, 2nd, and 3rd place, everyone that participated was a winner.

Students In Accident

By JERRY DAGENHART

Longwood Students: Matthew John Balmforth and Carlos Alverez, were in an automobile accident on Wednesday, April 18, that nearly cost them their lives. A third student, Lyle Vick, escaped with minor contusions and abrasions. Matt was thrown 17 feet from the vehicle and received extensive injuries to his head. Carlos was thrown 49 feet and received injuries to his pelvis and hip. Both of the students were flown to MCV Hospital where they are now receiving treatment.

Carlos will be in traction for 4-6 weeks. Although he passed through a critical stage, Chico has completely stabilized. Aside from the discomfort of traction and the revolving bed which regulates his body fluids, Chico is in great spirits. The doctors are expecting a full recovery for Chico and visitors are encouraged.

Matt, unfortunately, is still quite critical. He has never regained consciousness, however, his vital signs have stabilized. Despite Matt's unconsciousness, he has shown some motor movement in his left hand. Matt's major medical concern is the pressure on his brain. He has undergone brain surgery three times and is on paralyzing drugs, but his doctors say they are optomistic for his recovery.

LC Students To Study In France

A group of Longwood College students will study for three weeks this summer at the University of Toulouse in France.

Known as the Summer Study Abroad Program in France, it is part of Longwood's emphasis on "world consciousness," one of 14 new student-development goals at the College. From June 17-July 7, the students will take a language and culture class — worth three credits — at the University's Foreign Language Institute. Seven students will be going, said Dr. Jill Kelly, assistant professor of French at Longwood.

They are: Joanne Akers of Richmond, Theresa Alford of Meherrin, Alicia Ashton of Winchester, Vicki Edwards of Richmond, Joanne Harwell of Waverly, Patricia Moore of McLean, and Jane Wimbish of Stuart.

Some students also will arrange independent study in their major. The participants represent a variety of majors and minors, Kelly said.

The average level of French proficiency for the students is the fourth semester. Five of the students are scheduled to take an intensive, all-day French course early this summer before leaving for Toulouse, said Kelly.

The students will live in the University's residence halls and eat in the dining hall, which will provide contact with French students. There will be side trips on the weekends, including a visit to Paris. During their stay, the students will travel as a group.

The University of Toulouse, which has an enrollment of about 10,000, is noted for its business and law schools. It dates from 1229 and is located in southwestern France, not far from the Pyrenees mountains that border Spain. Several top administrators from the University visited Longwood last September for consultation about academic exchanges.

520 To Graduate

Jones To Speak At Graduation

Dr. Gary L. Jones, Under Secretary of Education, U. S. Department of Education, will speak at Longwood College's commencement on Saturday, May 19, at 9 a.m. on Wheeler Mall. This is Longwood's 100th commencement as a "teacher-education" institution, and the speaker is the number two official in the U. S. Department of Education.

Some 520 degrees will be awarded, including 479 baccalaureate degrees and 41 master's degrees.

Several prizes and awards will be presented during ceremonies. The Sally Barksdale Hargrett Prize, a $2,000 cash award, will be given to the graduate with the highest grade point average. Two outstanding members of the faculty will be honored with the Maria Bristow Starke Award and the Faculty Recognition Award (the recipient chosen by a student committee).

Twenty graduates who participated in Longwood's ROTC program will be commissioned as second lieutenants in the U. S. Army.

Dr. Jones was nominated as Under Secretary of Education by President Reagan on May 4, 1982, confirmed by the Senate on October 6, 1982, and sworn in by Secretary T. H. Bell the following day.

As chief operating officer of the Department of Education, he manages an organization of 5,300 employees with an operating budget of $290 million and a program budget of more than $15 billion. In addition, he is the principal political adviser on education and related issues to the Secretary of Education and, with the Secretary, to the President and White House staff.

Before going to the Department of Education, Dr. Jones was vice president of the MacArthur Foundation in Chicago and directed its general grants program. For six years, he was vice president of the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research. He also has been executive assistant to U. S. Senator Robert Griffin of Michigan.

A resident of Fairfax, Dr. Jones held an at-large appointment to the Fairfax County School Board for four years. He was responsible for initiating Board action that increased graduation requirements, changed the grading policy, and created a new political science curriculum in Fairfax County schools.

LC And UVA To Cooperate In New Program

Longwood College and the University of Virginia have announced a cooperative "Physicist to Electrical Engineer" program that makes it possible for a student to earn a bachelor's degree in physics and a master's degree in electrical engineering in five years.

The "3 + 2" dual-degree program begins with three years plus one summer of study at Longwood to complete general education and major requirements for the physics degree.

During the summer prior to the fourth year, the student enrolls in the Physicist to Electrical Engineer Summer Program at the University of Virginia, a nine-week program that carries 12 hours of academic credit.

Upon satisfactory completion of the summer program, the student will have fulfilled all of Longwood's requirements for the B.S. or B.A. degree in physics and will be ready to follow a regular electrical engineering graduate program at U.Va., leading to either the Master of Engineering or the Master of Science in electrical engineering.

The graduate portion of the program will require from 15 to 24 months to complete, depending upon which master's degree is sought.

Dr. Edmond Conway, dean of the faculty at Longwood, said that the agreement between the two institutions will provide "a valuable new educational opportunity, using the existing facilities of Longwood and the electrical engineering department of the University of Virginia."

To be admitted into U. Va.'s Physicist to Electrical Engineer Summer Program, the Longwood physics major must maintain an overall B average and a B+ average in the major requirements.

The new 3 + 2 program is Longwood's third dual-degree opportunity but the first to offer a master's degree. The college also has cooperative arrangements with the Georgia Institute of Technology and Old Dominion University which permit a student to earn a bachelor's degree in physics from Longwood and a second bachelor's degree in engineering from the partner institution.

Faculty Salaries Increase

By VINCE DECKER

Faculty salaries went up again this year, but not as fast as in the past, a new survey of the college teaching faculty has found.

The average faculty salary has gone up 5.7 percent since the 1982-83 school year, the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) found in preliminary results from its annual study of how much college teachers make. But faculty salaries went up 7.9 percent in 1982-83, and 9.9 percent in 1981-82.

The slowing rate of increases is due to the declining amounts of money state legislatures are giving to colleges. Over the last two years, administrators have said the major reason they had to raise tuition much faster than the inflation rate is because they must pay faculty members more. Ironically, as student tuition is being raised in order to pay faculty members more, faculty salary increases continue to slow down.

Faculty members at private colleges did slightly better than those at public campuses. Independent college teachers got average raises of 7.6 percent. Their colleagues on public campuses got average five percent increases. Longwood faculty received considerably less, with about a 2.3 percent increase in 1983.

In general, assistant professors got raises about one percent higher than what full professors

SGA Improving?

In January, the Student Government Association set up a list of ten goals for 1984. Early this month, they reported progress on the goals to the Board of Visitors. The SGA isn't exactly storming the campus to meet it's goals, but it is taking strong steps in the right direction, steps to strengthen itself and it's relations with both the student body and the College administration.

For the average student, the SGA has been rather useless in the past couple of years. Occasionally, she might get to vote in an election (for people she didn't know), or go to an Open Forum, but the average student was usually passed over by a cliquish group of SGA leaders. The current leaders seem to be trying to change all of that.

Of the ten goals for this year, four are directly aimed at increasing the Association's representation of students: to "represent students' needs and desires" in the area of academic affairs, to "channel student concerns" in reestablishing the dining hall committee, to "take firm stands on student issues" (this is a bit too vague), and to "organize monthly open forums about relevant issues". These four goals are reflective of normal SGA functions at most schools across the nation, but their establishment at Longwood is a positive move to let the SGA operate not as the project of a few students but as the voice of the student body. The SGA and its leaders are to be commended for the establishment of such goals and encouraged as they strive to fulfill them.

Another goal of the SGA is to motivate students to participate in their own governing body, not an easy task at Longwood. "For the administration to listen to us," notes SGA President Randy Chittum, "we must be more representative of the student body, but I don't know how to motivate people here." The steps being taken in that direction should make the Association more accessible to the students, and with some effort, get them involved.

The ten goals, along with the SGA's new attitude, indicate that our student body will have a better opportunity to govern itself. Such a change, if it is possible here, would greatly improve the College as a whole.

Your Turn

To the Editor:

As Art's Editor of The Rotunda, I feel it is my duty to express that Mr. Johnson's review of Hedda Gabler is a gross injustice to the realm of art, dramatic and otherwise. Johnson may feel he has the perfect literary definition of tragedy, however, it is obvious that he knows very little about clothing in the 1890's, or furnishings of the same period. If he had read Hedda Gabler recently, he would have known that the play took place in the 1890's. He would have also seen Ibsen's specific instructions for Brack to wear a monocle.

The costume designs were researched from European drawings of the era and were historically correct. Not only did aristocratic Scandinavian women wear gowns that exposed their shoulders and cleavage, but it is also certain that one such as Hedda, (who had just returned from her honeymoon) would be wearing one. As for Thea Elvsted's blue and gold costume, she could have just "stepped out of the 1890's" (that was the era of the play). However, I find it hard to believe anyone would have worn such a conservative dress in a saloon. As to the colors blue and gold, any derivative of blue and amber is the most commonly used coloring in stage lighting. It is for this reason that those colors were chosen for Thea's dress. Ibsen's Thea is illuminate and to quote Lovborg, "lovely to look at". Therefore, it makes perfect artistic sense to place Hedda's contrasting character in a conservative blue and gold dress. Johnson's comments were not all unfounded. Some of the men's clothing was in need of further alteration and obviously not as aesthetically attractive as the other costumes.

To address the supposedly anachronistic piano stool, I guess an 1895 wooden piano stool can look like a modern, metallic one from the audience.

It infuriates me to no end to see someone critique art when they do not understand the "genre" if it is literary, the period, or style, if it is visual, and the dramaturgy, if it is dramatic.

I feel that a reviewer should first reread the script carefully, and then research the artistic style of the scenery and costumes before he criticizes them. If Johnson had been as careful in his artistic criticism as he was in his criticism of tragedy, the review would have been correct and ideal, whether it was complimentary or not would not have mattered in that case.

Sincerely,
Jerry L. Dagenhart

Cartoon Was "Tactless"

To the Editor:

This letter is concerning the cartoon in the April 10th Rotunda. It was a very distasteful cartoon putting down the Education Majors at Longwood. It was also very tactless to print it the week before the student teachers returned to Longwood. The student teachers have not been out "playing and partying" for the past ten weeks. They have been paying money, not for beer, but for 14 hours of hard work a day, unlike other majors who get paid for doing their internship. This work begins at 7:30 in the morning, and from the time the students get there at 8:30 until they leave at 3:00, the teachers

Exhibit Features Indian Artifacts

Relics left by the Indians who inhabited the Virginia Piedmont long before the advent of the first European explorers are featured in a special exhibition which opened April 20 in the Bedford Gallery at Longwood College.

The exhibit, entitled "Stones, Bones and Clay: An Archeological View of the Indians of the Virginia Piedmont," is sponsored by Longwood's Field School in Archeology and the Department of Art. It is supported in part by a grant from the Virginia Foundation for the Humanities and Public Policy.

Some 200 prehistoric archeological artifacts will be included in the exhibit. The "stones, bones, and clay" artifacts have been identified as parts of the day-to-day tool kit which would have been used by Indians before European contact. They date from 300 to 3,000 years ago.

Most of the artifacts were unearthed by Field School students at three dig sites in the local area — the Anna's Ridge site in the Cumberland State Forest, the rock shelter site on Willis Mountain, and the Smith-Taylor Mound site on the Appomattox River near Farmville. A few of the artifacts are on loan from the private collections of area residents.

Barbara Bishop, director of the Bedford Gallery, is displaying the artifacts in about 30 groupings. With each group are "eyewitness accounts on how Indians in Virginia were seen using such tools." These accounts were written by early explorers and travelers in the area.

In the center of the gallery there is a plexiglass box, about eight by 10 feet and two-and-a-half feet deep, filled with dirt. "The viewer will be able to see what a slice of an archeological excavation site looks like," Dr. Jordan said. "Artifacts will be visible at different depths in the dirt, just as they would be found in a real dig."

The Stones, Bones and Clay exhibit will remain in the Bedford Gallery through July 27. Gallery hours through the end of the spring semester (May 6) will be Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to 12 noon and 1 to 5 p.m.; Saturday, 2 to 5 p.m.; and Sunday, 5 to 9 p.m. After the close of the spring semester, the exhibit will not be open on Saturday and Sunday.

Dr. Jordan prepares artifacts for the "Stones, Bones, and Clay" exhibit.

Alums Offer Career Tips

Getting along with people is vital to a successful career, stressed several Longwood College graduates who returned to campus recently for a career-guidance program.

"When I was a student here, I was involved in several organizations, and that helps me deal with people," said Karen Kelsey, co-manager of a Wendy's in Richmond. "Sometimes you have to stand there and grin while a customer is cussing you out."

Kelsey, a marketing-management major ('83), was one of five graduates who participated in an Alumni Symposium and Career Day on April 12. Activities included a reception at Longwood House, a dinner in the Prince Edward Room, and a "Career Fair" in Lankford. The program was sponsored by the Office of Career Planning and Placement, and the Alumni Association.

The alumni informally discussed their careers, their job search and Longwood's strengths with students.

"I just got lucky and created my own interview," explained Randy Johnson, a special projects technician for Philip Morris in Richmond. "I kept calling (Philip Morris) until I got the right number. They gave me an interview, but said they weren't hiring at that time. But two weeks later they called me back and hired me on a temporary basis."

Johnson, a business administration major ('83), was later made a permanent employee. "I think being personable helped me get my job. My experience as an R.A. here helped me get along with people. If you're personable, people will remember you."

Martha Burton, administrative assistant for the Crater Planning District Commission in Petersburg, told how her previous experience as a grocery store clerk later proved valuable — she was able to discuss the potential effects of a pending bill with state legislators.

"Any work experience is significant, especially if it's working with the public," said Burton, a government major ('76). "You learn how to relate with all kinds of people, and you learn how to be pleasant."

Sharon Harrup is center coordinator of Charter Oak II, a day care center in Blackstone for mentally retarded adults. Longwood's degree program in therapeutic recreation helped her land the position.

"The thereapeutic recreation faculty here are superior to any faculty (of their kind) in the state," said Harrup. "The accomplishments of Longwood graduates reflect on the quality of the faculty."

Kelsey, who already has been promoted twice, said she didn't expect to have a career in the fast-food business. "People look at fast-food restaurants and say 'How can you do that?' But there's so much to do. In my position, you do everything from hiring to firing to cleaning the bathrooms. I thoroughly enjoy it."

Johnson offered advice for future job-seekers: "Don't leave any stone unturned. Try all outlets; anything might help you. And realize that you can't start out at the top."

1983 graduate Karen Kelsey stands behind her company's slogan.

HOW TO REGISTER FOR SUMMER SCHOOL

There are two ways to register for Summer School — by mail and in person.

To register by mail complete the registration form on Page 2 of LONGWOOD SUMMER '84 and bring it to the Information Office in the Rotunda. Your registration will be acknowledged.

You may register in person on May 1 between 12 noon and 4:30 p.m. in the FINANCIAL AID DATA ENTRY OFFICE and on the opening day of any session.

Session Five — add French 220 Intensive Conversation, 3 credits, May 22-June 8, Kelly

An intensive program to provide practice in speaking and understanding spoken French in a variety of simulated everyday situations. Classes in the morning; activities in French afternoons and evenings (weekends free). Students will be housed together in a special wing of the dormitory and will be encouraged to speak French in the dorm and at meals as well as during activities. (NOTE: Because of the nature of this course, students should not plan to take other summer school courses during this 3-week period.)

Prerequisite: C or better in French 110 or the equivalent. More advanced students are welcome.

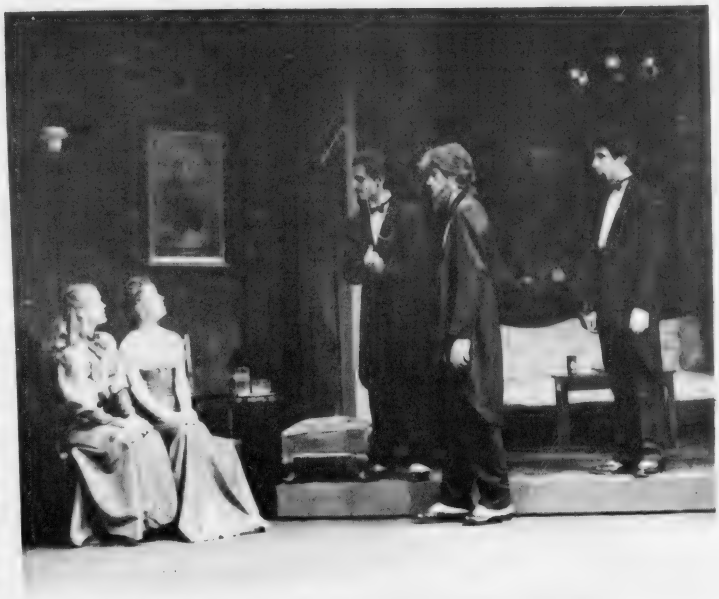
Hedda Gabler A Review By Joe Johnson

EDITOR'S NOTE: The following is a review of Ibsen's HEDDA GABLER by Joe Johnson, last year's ROTUNDA editor. Mr. Johnson reviewed the play because of the obvious biases of our staff.

CAST



Hedda Gabler — Connie Watkins
Jurgen Tesman — Anthony Russo
Appraiser Brack — Vince Decker
Ejlert Lovborg — Jeff Abernathy
Thea Elvestead — Alyssa Abbey
Aunt Julia — Donna Baldwin
Berta — Jenny Johnson
Directed by Patton Lockwood
Set Design by A. Moffatt Evans
Costumes by Jerry Dagenhart

Tragedy is, by its nature, the most difficult theatrical genre. A comedy may fall flat because the best lines are delivered to dead ears but there is always a unique situation or character to redeem its performance. Tragedy, however, particularly a fairly modern realistic tragedy, requires an audience's immersion into the characters' lives and parts. The stage has to come alive and seem real for it to be effective. Whether this happened in the Longwood Players' presentation of Henrik Ibsen's Hedda Gabler remains debatable. Certainly it was not as Henry James wrote in reviewing the first English performance of Ibsen's now famous play, a picture of "a state of nerves as well as of soul, a state temper of health, of chagrin, of despair." There was too little control and too much dead wood on stage for the performance to approach the tension necessary to "pull off" James' picture. The drama, which was presented on Jarman's stage April 17-20 was less a state of Nerves" and more a state of tepidity — lukewarm at best.

Jenny Johnson, who played Berta, the maid, needs to stop acting like a college student acting like a maid. It is apparent that she hasn't been on stage for sometime and her inexperience shows. Her timing is off; gestures are mismatched with words. She's still spouting lines without believing in them or in herself.

Anthony Russo's interpretation or the director's interpretation of the character of Jurgen Tesman nearly turns a tragedy into a farce. Russo is far too animated and far too lively for a tithering academic like Tesman, whose specialty is putting other people's papers into order. He should be more reticent and abstract, more concerned with propriety than waving his hands about like a blustering old maid. Tesman is, after all, one of the characters who adheres to Appraiser Brack's last line — "people don't do such things."

Vince Decker, as Appraiser Brack, seems to have also interpreted his character curiously. Why is he wearing a monocle with which he fiddles throughout his performance? Why does he leer when a subtle smile or even nod would do? Why must he present himself in a way which immediately forces the audience to think they are witnessing the performance of a "camp" villain and not a realistic character with more than one dimension? Decker, it must be admitted, is wonderful at camp and that is no doubt the reason he won the Longwood Players' best actor award, but still one has to ask the inevitable — what is camp doing in tragedy?

Alyssa Abbey, Connie Watkins, Vince Decker, Jeff Abernathy, Anthony Russo

Connie Watkins and Vince Decker

Certainly Ibsen intended for these characters to provide the play with a degree of comic relief. But his intentions weren't for the comic elements of the play to overpower the tragic and that is nearly what happens on Jarman's stage. The result is a loss of tension and realism on stage which forces the audience to wonder whether they are witnessing a realistic tragedy or a poorly timed battle of the wits. The director would have taken more control in the performances of Decker and Russo and pointed out the weaknesses in their interpretations. He apparently didn't.

The director could have also sparked Jeff Abernathy's portrayal of Ejlert Lovborg into a semblance of vitality. Abernathy should have been loosened up a little; he should have been forced to breathe some energy into his act. Lovborg is presumably the genius who has just completed a book on the future workings of society. He is the wild Bacchanalian who had provoked an astonished Hedda Gabler with his escapades, yet Abernathy's performance is paralytic. He's the one thing Lovborg would probably never be — self-conscious.

The most difficult role of the evening was, of course, Hedda Gabler's, the enigmatic woman at the center of this drama. She is part femme fatale and part victim. One imagines that her character would be fastidiously concerned with the beautiful, with an idealistic sense of elegance in one's behavior and in one's environment. What she would abhor most is mediocrity. In short, she would be an aristocrat caught and tormented in a stuffy provincial middle class society.

I'm not certain if this is what we get in Connie Watkins' portrayal of Hedda Gabler. She does huff and puff a lot, but the actions seem to be characteristic of a bitchy southern belle, rather than a Norwegian aristocrat. Her performance does achieve the demonic element inherent in Hedda's character, but they almost eliminate the other "parts" of her which have to come through for the audience to appreciate the tragedy. Her sense of refinement is completely missing. Her role as victim, as a person trapped in a stultifying environment, is lacking or altogether absent which leaves the audience less than sympathetic. Her suicide at the end of the fourth act seems to be merely a circumstance on stage; one in a long line of circumstances that didn't have the emotional impact they should have had, because of poor characterization and acting.

In the areas of costuming and set, the less said the better. Jeff Abernathy ought to learn to wear a belt or should have his trousers hemmed up to his knees. The 20th century metal piano stool on stage as a prop is as noticeable an anachronism as the dress that Alyssa Abbey wears during Act II and III of her performance as Thea Elvsted. Did she arrive straight from a hot saloon in California or perhaps it's a Victorian version of the Dallas Cowboy cheerleaders' uniforms? The bright pastels don't seem any more appropriate than the off-the-shoulder dress that Connie Watkins wore at one point during the play. (One hardly thinks of an aristocrat as having slumped shoulders.) Finally, though, one good point — the lighting of the portrait of General Gabler at the end of the performance was well done and quite effective.

Overall, for a college presentation, it was adequate, if not entertaining. For the Longwood Players, it was probably their best performance of the semester. For a world class drama however, it had quite a few shortcomings.

Presidents Want To Quit

(CPS) — Despite what students, faculty, and administrators might think, college presidents don't have it made in their life at the top, at least according to a still-to-be-released study by the Association of Governing Boards of Universities and Colleges.

On the contrary, college presidents' jobs are filled with stress, long hours, few payoffs, and a feeling of isolation — factors which cause one out of four to teeter on the edge of resigning, according to Marian Gade, one of the researchers working on the report, "Strengthening Presidential Leadership."

Gade and her fellow researchers have interviewed more than 800 college presidents, their spouses, and other top university officials for the study.

While three of four of the presidents say they like their jobs, one out of four would like to resign at the first opportunity, the study has found.

Only 25 percent of the presidents say they thoroughly enjoy their jobs, the researchers report.

Half say they like their jobs more than they dislike them.

The rest are more or less disillusioned and burned out, ready to leave office for another position, the study shows.

The stress, loneliness of the job, and long hours required of college presidents are the main reasons for the widespread dissatisfaction, Gade says.

"Few people really know what a complex job the presidency is, even at a small institution," she points out. "The causes of stress are those of financial pressures, working full-time, seven days a week, 24 hours a day, of dealing with collective bargaining, and more and more state and federal controls."

Presidents are also a lonely lot, she says, who don't identify with faculty, are politically separated from administrators, and typically not appreciated by their boards of trustees.

Indeed, turnover among college presidents in the last year seems to confirm the study's early findings.

Smith College President Jill Conway, for instance, announced her resignation last month, saying she needed more time with her family and had had enough for the pressures and strains of her 10-year tenure.

In February, Walter Leonard, president of embattled Fisk University — a predominantly-black college on the financial skids — said he was so drained by the constant presures that he wanted to quit before his planned retirement this coming December.

And Cecil Mackey, five-year president of once-beleaguered Michigan State, recently announced he will leave his office in June 1985, under pressure from the board of trustees.

Among other things, the board was upset with Mackey's hiring of head football coach George Perles in 1982.

Physical Fitness Workshop

On Thursday, April 25, Lancer Gym held a two-hour "Physical Fitness and Aerobic Exercise Workshop" for Longwood College and the Farmville community. The program, designed by senior physical education majors Ronnie Reese and Rodney Cullen, was intended to give members of the Farmville community "an opportunity to be tested in various levels of physical fitness, and see where you (the individual) rank physically with the national averages". In addition, it provided participants an opportunity to "make available some aerobic exercises and aerobic dancing that can be used in developing a physical fitness program" and to introduce to them aerobics programs available through the college.

The program, which had a good overall turnout, consisted of each participant keeping an individual score sheet of a series of tests and comparing them to national averages.

All tests were compiled by Ronnie and Rodney and included a step test, a flexibility test, a grip strength test, skinfold measurements, an abdominal strengths test, and a vital capacity test.

Aerobics are an integral part of a good physical fitness program, however, there are several precautions one should take before beginning such a program, such as a complete medical checkup. For more information on aerobics or a complete physical fitness program contact Ronnie Reese in 256 Main Cunningham.

IAA News

Superstars finished last week with the final event. The overall winners are: Men — first, Arjun Rish; second, Jeff Pace; third, Steve Bianco and Paul Sidhu. Women — first, Carmel Keilty; second, Terry Audi and Karen Garrett. Congratulations to all the winners!

Tennis doubles is still going on for the men. The women have finished and the winners are: first, Sue Haverty and Karen Garrett; second, Winona Bayne and Evelyn Grangnani.

Frisbee golf was played last week with the men finishing up and the women have finished. The winners for the women are: first, Diane Crandall; second, Holly Hearne; third, Tammy Driscoll.

does not sit down or go to the bathroom. Elementary teachers do not even get a lunch break because they must be with the students at all times. After the students leave, the real wok begins: lesson plans must be written, tests graded, activities and visual aids prepared . . . for the next day.

Education classes do not begin the junior year — they begin freshman year in order to get in the 80-85 credit hours of major requirements needed to graduate as an education major. Most education majors also do not have money for beer or parties because it is all spent on books, contact paper, duplicating costs, and the other materials needed for the many projects and average of 10 term papers written during the four years' time. After all this work comes the NTE's — yes, National Teacher's Exam — which costs $75 to take and in which Education Majors must make cut-off scores in order to be able to teach in the state of Virginia. Also eight hours of sitting in one room taking four tests is no easy task. Even after the cut-off scores are met, $25 more must be paid to even receive the teacher's certificate which has already been earned by the time of graduation. Until this is paid, a teaching position cannot be obtained. There are no other graduating majors from Longwood who are required to do this. Anyone who believes this cartoon is challenged to take at least one education methods course at Longwood and see how easy it really is.

LANCER SPORTS

Third Ranked Lancers

Longwood's baseball team bounced back after four disappointing losses, taking four wins over the weekend, and established a new record for wins in the regular season. Now 29-9, Coach Buddy Bolding's 1984 edition bettered the regular season mark set by the 1982 region champs — 28-7-1.

The Lancers, who close out the regular season Wednesday at Virginia State (doubleheader starts at 12:30), would appear to be in line for their second bid to the South Atlantic Region Tournament in the past three seasons. Coach Bolding, a member of the regional selection committee, says Longwood should know about the playoffs by Sunday.

Longwood fell to Division I's Virginia Tech and James Madison and NAIA power Norfolk State last week before coming back to beat St. Mary's and Bowie State in four games. The Lancers lost at VPI 6-3, dropped a twinbill to 17th ranked Norfolk St. 11-8 and 14-7 Wednesday and fell to a James Madison rally 16-12 Friday.

Saturday Longwood whipped St. Mary's 22-2 and 13-0 and Bowie State 11-1 and 15-3 Sunday at home. Longwood got complete game performances from pitchers Mike Buttler, Tommy Walsh, Tony Browning and Scott Mills over the weekend.

Most impressive of the pitchers was Browning, a freshman righthander. In Sunday's 11-1 win over Bowie, he hurled a four-hitter and walked just one batter. Browning has issued only nine free passes in 43.6 innings this spring.

With seven players batting .371 or higher, it's no surprise that Longwood has an eye-popping .364 team batting average. The Lancers haven't been shut-out in 69 games over a two year period.

The Lancers out-hit homestanding JMU, ranked 24th in Division I, 16-13 Friday. Longwood led 6-1 after three and one-half innings, but the Dukes rallied with the help of an uncharacteristic 11 walks given up by Lancer pitchers.

Third baseman Marty Ford had four hits with a two-run homer and a double against JMU while Jeff Mayone, Todd Thompson and Tom Klatt had three hits apiece.

Longwood hitting leader John Sullivan went 3-3 with a double, triple and five RBI's in Saturday's opening win over St. Mary's. Sonny Bolton added four RBI's with a two-run homer.

Morgan Is Player Of The Week

Senior golfer Sue Morgan led Longwood to a second place finish in the UNC-Wilmington Invitational Tournament April 20-21 and for her performance, Morgan has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period April 20-27.

Morgan, the team captain, had rounds of 79-78-77 for a 234 total in the Wilmington tournament. Her score was good for a third place tie among 25 individual golfers, and was the top performance by a member of the women's golf team this spring.

In the fall season she placed third in the Longwood Invitational with a 73-83-74-230, just one stroke off the school record for 54 holes.

She earned a scholarship with her improved play last season, and has been nominated for Academic All-America.

Women Golfers In Nationals

Longwood College will be one of 10 schools playing in the first women's Small College National Golf Championship Monday through Wednesday at Florida State's Seminole Golf Course in Tallahassee. The 54-hole event will feature the top Division II and III women's golf teams in the country.

Longwood finished second in the UNC-Wilmington Invitational April 21 with rounds of 337-322-320 — 979. Senior captain Sue Morgan, who had an eagle-two on the final hole, shot 79-78-77-234 to tie for third place in the individual race.

Morgan, Lanie Gerken, Carol Rhoades, Kim Patterson and Mary Semones will be representing Longwood in the Small College tournament.

Based on average scores from fall play, Longwood ranks seventh among the small college teams in the tournament. Average fall scores were as follows: Troy State 321, Central Florida 322, Weber State 324, Rollins 328, Florida Atlantic 328, Meredith 331 and Longwood 335.

Also expected to compete at Tallahassee are Mankato State, Amherst and Nebraska Wesleyan.

While the winner of the tournament will not receive an automatic berth to the NCAA Women's Golf Championship, the top performers in the tourney may receive consideration for a bid. Either one team and two individuals or nine individuals will be chosen to compete in the Division I NCAA Championship.

Longwood Baseball Highlights

— Sullivan has set all kinds of records while enjoying a banner senior season. The shortstop is hitting .439 with school records for RBI's (49), runs (52) and homers (11) in a season. He also leads the team in walks (30) and assists (95).

— Hottest Lancer batters lately have been Dennis Leftwich and second baseman Todd Thompson. Leftwich, who has stolen an amazing 38 bases in 38 attempts, is hitting .415 with 31 RBI's and 42 runs scored. Thompson boosted his average from .330 to .371 last week and now has 23 RBI's and 38 runs.

—Right fielder Mike Haskins is hitting .416 with 31 runs and 22 RBI's while designated hitter Jeff Mayone is batting .371 with 44 RBI's and eight homers. Catcher Jeff Rohm, a graduate of Western Albemarle High, is batting .374 with 6 homers, 6 doubles and 27 RBI's.

— Third baseman Marty Ford ranks second to Sullivan in runs with 44 and hits with 48. The freshman is hitting .372 with 28 RBI's.

Kersey, Turner, Duncan, Bolding Win Major Awards At Longwood Banquet

JEROME KERSEY

VALERIE TURNER

SHIRLEY DUNCAN

BUDDY BOLDING

Basketball players Jerome Kersey and Valerie Turner, women's basketball coach Shirley Duncan and baseball coach Charles "Buddy" Bolding won the major awards Monday night as Longwood College held its sixth Athletic Banquet.

A senior All-American, Kersey was named Male Athlete of the Year. The Clarksville, Virginia native is the leading scorer (1,756 points) and rebounder (1,162) in Longwood history. Projected as at least a third round choice in the upcoming NBA Draft, Kersey had been named Player of the Year in the state and the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference in March.

Kersey was also named Male Athlete of the Year in 1982-83. This year's basketball MVP, the 6-7, 220-pound center also had his number 54 jersey formally retired in special ceremonies Monday night.

Valerie Turner, a Richmond, Virginia native and graduate of Marshall-Walker High School, was named Female Athlete of the Year. The 5-8 forward averaged 18.4 points and 14.5 rebounds while leading Longwood's women's basketball team to its best record (16-10) in history. The state's top rebounder and one of the best in the nation, Turner was named Virginia College Division Player of the Year and Kodak All-District III. She was also chosen women's basketball MVP.

Shirley Duncan was voted Female Coach of the Year after leading Longwood to its first winning season in six years. The Kentucky native began her duties in early October and led the Lady Lancers to their best record in history. She was named College Division Coach of the Year in Virginia women's basketball.

Buddy Bolding won the Male Coach of the Year honor for the third time in four years. The Bedford, Virginia native has led Longwood to a 29-9 record and third place national ranking this season.

Bolding, one of the winningest coaches in Longwood history, has guided Longwood baseball teams to a record of 141-64-1 in six years. His 1982 squad advanced all the way to the Division II World Series and this year's squad stands a good chance of qualifying for post season play as well.

Recipients of the Henry I. Willet Scholar-Athlete Awards were Sue Morgan, a standout on the women's golf team, and soccer star Bill Foster. The two seniors compiled 3.0+ academic averages while also making major contributions to their respective teams. Morgan has been one of Longwood's top golfers the past two seasons after making tremendous improvement in her game. She is the 1983-84 team MVP as well.

Foster has helped Longwood's soccer team compile a 38-10-8 record over the past three seasons. He has been named All-State four years and All-Region two years.

Winning the Freshman Athlete of the Year awards were baseball player Jeff Mayone and gymnast Kelly Strayer. A designated hitter, Mayone batted .367 and drove in 41 runs with eight homers through 36 games for the Longwood baseball team. Strayer broke several school gymnastics records and qualified for the NCAA Division II Gymnastics Championships in floor exercise, finishing 11th out of over 50 competitors. She was also chosen gymnastics MVP for 1983-84.

The Sports Editor and the ROTUNDA staff would like to convey a special thanks to Hoke Currie and the Sports Information Office for all of their help during the previous school year.

Softball Team Compiles Best Record

Winning three of its final four games, Longwood's women's softball team rang up an 11-5 record this spring, the best mark since the college began playing softball in 1981.

Longwood dispatched Liberty Baptist 1-0 and 6-0 Tuesday and split a twinbill with VCU Wednesday in Richmond, losing the first contest 9-2, but bouncing back to take the second game 7-4.

M. J. Campbell pitched a two-hit shutout in the opener and Bridget Terry came back with a three-hit shutout in the nightcap in Tuesday's sweep of the Lady Flames. Lynne Gilbert scored the winning run in the opener while Betsy Armstrong had two RBI's and Campbell and Kathy Guillot, one each in the second contest.

Wednesday in Richmond, VCU collected 13 hits to win the opener 9-2 as Campbell ended up with a 5-3 mound mark. In the second contest Terry tossed a five-hitter to finish at 4-1. Kay Aultman, Sharon Sculthorpe and Kim Stover had two hits apiece to lead Longwood's 11-hit attack.

Leading hitter for Longwood was Aultman with a .370 batting average. Sculthorpe hit .364, Christy Rymer .304 and Guillot .302. Judy White led the team in RBI's with 11.

The Class Of '88

As the Class of 1988 enters Longwood College, formal education in the United States is among the last of pathways leading from oppression to freedom, from ignorance to enlightenment. Education alone can offer solutions to the social problems which face our society and which threaten to tear it apart. Never before has formal education held such a precarious yet crucial role in society. Precarious because its base, students across the nation, appear not to desire any position of social responsibility. Crucial because they must assume such a position if our society is to rid itself of the threats against it. Our society must come to see higher education as a step in the process of maturity which teaches us not merely task performance but also social responsibility. The latter has become the most critical factor in education today.

As the rhetoric of world leaders sounds increasingly offensive and decreasingly defensive, as ignorance continues to progress prejudice, and as extreme materialism and greed are looked upon with favor, education has become our last line of defense. Only through education can poverty be checked. Only through education can the military threats to our globe be overcome. And only through education can our white dove finally "sleep in the sand". Education, then, is severely lacking when it encourages the individual to be concerned solely with personal needs. There are far more important social objectives.

This does not, however, place the total burden on faculty and student development staffs alone. It is their charge to encourage a sense of social consciousness. It is ours, as students, to accept and build this sense.

Two decades ago, feelings of social consciousness among students were gathering a force which would change a nation. In 1984, students have become lackadaisical in their concern for society. Personal needs have replaced the importance societal needs once held among students in this nation. Voter registration is down severely. In Connecticut, a group of students recently held a sit-down strike. Their demands? only one: that the dining hall serve Froot Loops for breakfast. Ah, vanity. Vanity born of ego.

This egotism seems common today among all of us as students. In 1984, we are first concerned with ourselves: what major will turn the biggest profit for us as individuals, what activities will "look good" on a resume. Neither of these is in itself socially irresponsible, but they do reflect a turn inward in our principles. We have seemingly rejected the very ideals which gave students the most power they ever held: ideals of social responsibility and common cause. In the Vietnam years, colleges and universities were the pulse and conscience of a nation. Today, if anything, we are the appendix, of that same nation, undesired and unnecessary.

Such is the state of the student body of this and all-to-many other colleges in the United States today. We accept social injustice and incomprehensible military spending without a word.

We see strong parallels between Central America and Southeast Asia, and, as the dove sails pensively over head, we stand shouting on the beach. When the generation to take power in the decades to come fails to voice its interest in society, it has voluntarily abandoned that very society. It has failed. This failure could easily become our own as students in today's society. If so, failure can be blamed on our complacency within the college environment. These fouryears of college can be so secure for us that we refuse to acknowledge any threat to that security; effectively locking our doors and closing our minds to all that happens around us.

Complacency, however, is far from the only alternative for students to choose. We are able to observe, evaluate, and participate in society from a different perspective as students than we will be able to ever again, perhaps a much clearer perspective. Abandoning this opportunity, we are tied to a system already laid out for us. Utilizing it, the choices are all our own.

Ego may well motivate the student of 1984, perhaps much more so than it did the student of 1971. Yet they are much the same animal, and, in time, a sense of consciousness may return to students in the eighties. We must strive, however, to assure that it does not return too late.

Farmville A Social Commentary

By ERIC T. HOUSEKNECHT, ESQ.

According to our own Office of Public Affairs, Longwood has received a record number of applications for admission to the fall 1984 semester. The 2,711 applications received represent a 3.7 percent increase over last year's record-breaking total. As each new school year brings more applications and, inevitably, a larger enrollment, the student body sees a greater sampling of neophyte scholars from all over the country and even abroad. To what do we owe this deluge of worldwide requests for admission to Farmville's academic community? Looking far beyond the usual unwarranted notions about the grandeur of studying at a small southern institution, I sense an incipient trend amongst the truly cosmopolitan, an educational vogue for intellectual and social interaction with Farmville's unique population.

How, you may ask, does one go about meeting and mingling with this isolated social set whose company is currently in such great demand? The Farmvillite is a genuinely unique individual and traditional avenues of acquaintance may prove unsuccessful in gaining his friendship. Chances are the Farmvillite did not prep with your brother, start a thoroughbred syndicate with your broker, or share a box with your parents for the summer orchestral season at Saratoga. He probably does not share your interest in pre-Columbian jewelry nor can he identify with your childhood passion for teasing the cook. Thus I offer the following solution for befriending the Farmvillite:

One must begin by loitering about the proper establishments and meeting grounds. The Farmville Shopping Center, a small conglomerate of retail proprietors, is the very backbone of the local assemblage. One need not patronize these paltry shops in order to make the initial contact which is so vital to our purpose. Indeed, some of Farmville's most prominent residents can be seen propping themselves against a post in front of Safeway and remaining there for hours. Rumor has it that many of these societal pillars have yet to venture off the curbs and into the provincial emporiums.

Having located the Farmvillite, one must now attempt to establish some sort of rapport. Farmvillites often

Your Turn

A Welcome From

Orientation Chairman

Dear Freshmen and Transfers:

Hello! As the Orientation Chairman of 1984, I would like to welcome you to Longwood College. Some of you are scared of making new friends, some of you are homesick, and some of you are so happy to be here and away from home that you will convert those who aren't. The purpose of this orientation is to help you get better acquainted with the college and the way its student body works. I am a senior and a Math major (this semester). When I was a Freshman at Longwood I received so much caring and attention by my Orientation Leader and the people here that it turned me loose — yes, I was shy no more. I began working on activities and specializing projects for the school, some of which required administration assistance. I did all this because of my interest in people and eagerness to gain experience by having some responsibility. What I got back? The best friend I'll ever have. That alone to me is worth everything I have worked for at Longwood. I also gained experience in dealing with people and organizing new ideas, as well as adding to or improving old ones. What I am trying to say is that in less than four years I have set myself up for the outside world and I did it by myself. If you want to get something out of college life you're going to have to put something into it. Longwood offers something for everyone. Don't complain about not liking it if you don't do something about it. I hope that all of you get involved in something, even if it's always the party next door — I would just like for you to be happy, and learn a few things while you're at it. God bless you.

Welcome From

SGA President

Dear Student:

There are opportunities at Longwood for involvement in many areas. None of these can be more important or have further reaching implications than Student Government. We are the voice of the students! We are constantly making or helping make policy decisions which affect you! We are elected by and serve for the student body.

One of my personal commitments to SGA this year is to get more students involved in the decision making process. It is of vital importance that we be a representative voice. So, when you see that survey or someone stops you on the street to ask your opinion, take it seriously! That is one opportunity for you to directly influence your future at Longwood.

I can't stress enough the importance of you staying informed, (read and listen), and using that information to state your opinion. You have the power to keep Longwood improving, I hope you do not waste that opportunity. There is a special way for you to get started now. Petitions are being accepted for Freshman Class Officers and Honor Board members, (available in the Information Office). They are due Sunday, September 2, to room 123, South Cunningham. Elections are on Tuesday, September 4 (Be sure to vote!). Run for these positions. come to SGA meetings (Thursdays, 6:00 in the Honors Council room in Lankford), and stay informed on what's going on. It's your school now too! My door is always open in 222 South Cunningham and the SGA Office in Lankford, PLEASE come by.

display the jovial sense of camaraderie seen amongst those who frequent bus stops and subway stations in more metropolitan environments, and while the banter is often frivolous, the dialect can prove perplexing. The novice is well advised to spend several minutes carefully listening before making his play at entering a conversation. The Farmvillite exists in unparalleled stream of social consciousness and thus certain key phrases should be avoided such as:

"I'll call you at noon. Will you be up?"

"In the end it's always the major stockholders who take the blame."

For the sake of simplicity, I'll offer here a much more immediate solution to the problem of establishing social contacts in Farmville. Buy the Farmvillite a luxurious gift. Purchase for him a tastefully chosen item which is unavailable at the local marketplace. A box of Godiva chocolates, a Tiffany lamp, or an Italian sports car may be appropriate. The Farmvillite will appreciate your gesture. He will like you for this, if not for an extended period of time, then at least long enough to chat.

KANSAS BOYCOTTS SOUTH AFRICA. The KU Student Senate Executive Committee passed a resolution forbidding Student Senate from doing business with any companies with subsidiaries in South Africa. The student newspaper editorialized against the move, saying history proves economic and political isolation are always counter-revolutionary.

ALLEGEDLY RACIST ACTS AT AN AIR JAM CONCERT prompted an investigation at the U. of California-Santa Barbara. The ad-hoc committee formed to examine the incident ultimately asked for apologies from the students involved, and from the Associated Students, which sponsored the event. At issue were stereotypical imitators of black performers by white students. UCSB Chancellor Robert Huttenback also issued a statement calling for greater understanding of minority student issues.

FLORIDA LEGISLATORS face a tough choice, with the passage of the recent national drinking age law, says Forbes Magazine. They can refuse to raise the drinking age to 21, and lose some federal highway money; or raise the drinking age and risk losing more than $130 million spent each spring by vacationing college students.

THE NEW DRINKING AGE LAW is receiving a decidedly mixed reaction on campus nationwide. Although administrators have long been involved in efforts to reduce irresponsible student drinking, many believe the new national drinking age of 21 will simply encourage more off-campus drinking and partying, rather than eliminating alcohol consumption among 18-, 19- and 20-year-olds. Also looming in the fall are potential discipline problems when administrators try to enforce the new laws in residence halls and at campuswide functions.

IN CLASS

GRADING STUDENTS ON GROUP PROJECTS poses knotty problems, and a report from a subcommittee of the U. of Pittsburgh's Senate Council Educational Policies Committee recommended halting use of team projects unless faculty devise methods to monitor students' individual contributions to the group. Too often, lazy group members are judged on work done by others.

HAVERFORD COLLEGE ADDED A "THIRD WOLRD" REQUIREMENT for freshmen entering this fall. Students must take either a course in the history or culture of non-Western peoples, U.S. minorities, or women's studies, or a course on the history of prejudice. Most colleges recommend such courses, but Haverford is one of the few to require them.

Noise is pollution, too.

What ARE You Doing Here, Anyway?

By BILL MOORE

Have you ever stopped to think what you're doing in college? Sure, you say — I'm taking a few classes, going to some parties, uh, you know, having a good time. Yes, but what are you doing here? Hey, it's not important; I've got to experience the present, the future will take care of itself.

Would you say that? Perhaps not; but I see a lot of people who seem to be acting on those assumptions, and I'd like to explore an alternative: we shape the future by what we do in the present, and in clarifying our present we can improve our future. Let me explain.

A number of times I have talked to graduating seniors and heard the line, I haven't done much of anything, how can I write any kind of resume? They know that they took some classes, and yes, by golly, they will have a degree in whatever, but they are stumped when asked about their skills — what they've learned in four years of "higher education." Most students are not accustomed to thinking in terms of building skills; it is much more common to only think of college as a place where KNOWLEDGE is driven-infused into your brain. Certainly that element is there, and not to be denied. Yet through your experiences both in and out of class you are developing a set of skills which will prove useful in the "real world." I'm not talking about specific job skills, either; those skills are almost always taught on-the-job and not before. I'm talking about basic qualities that are necessary for most jobs — the ability to think, to raise questions about issues and problems, to communicate both in written and oral form, to relate to people. These are the qualities, believe it or not, that can be the difference between getting or not getting the job you want, that can determine how satisfied you are with your job and how long you stay there. And you can gain these skills in a variety of ways in your years in college.

Which brings me back to my original point — if you do not think about what you're doing in the present, then you are missing an opportunity to fully benefit from your college experience and construct the resume you'll write when you graduate. Fortunately for you, Longwood is making a major effort to help you do that through the Goals Project you'll hear much more about later. The goals you'll be introduced to give you a clear idea about what your time here in college can be all about. Just in case somebody asks you, what are you doing here?

Wrestling Squad Strong

Longwood should field its strongest wrestling squad in history in the upcoming season, says Lancer Coach Steve Nelson. Coach Nelson has guided the Lancers to records of 9-9, 7-6-1 and 6-9, "Eight of last year's squad should be back and we have the best crop of recruits since I have been here."

Coach Nelson has national Qualifier Tim Fitzgerald at 150 pounds. Fitzgerald became the first Lancer Grappler to compete in a national championship when he placed in the top 12 in last year's NCAA Division II National Tournament. Longwood's MVP, he wound up with a 19-11-1 record at 118 pounds.

Senior Charles Campbell at 150 and sophomore Billy Howard at 167 are his top returning veterans. Top recruits include state champs Scott McGowan (126), Kenny Lewis (177), David Taylor (177-190) and Jesus Strauss (heavyweight). Also included are transfers Chris Viar (158) and Mike Black (167). "This team will have the potential to win more matches than any squad in school history," says Nelson.

LANCER SPORTS

Longwood's record-setting baseball team, which finished 32-11 in May, ranks among the leaders in NCAA Division II statistics in three team and three individual categories, according to figures released in the July 18 edition of The NCAA News.

Leading the Lancer statistical showing was senior All-American shortstop John Sullivan who ranked 18th in batting with a .424 average and 11th in runs-batted-in with 51 in 42 games for an average of 1.21 per game. Freshman designated hitter Jeff Mayone ranked seventh in RBI's with 52 in 38 games for an average of 1.37.

Rising senior Dennis Leftwich had the highest national ranking with a third place in stolen bases. Leftwich stole 43 bases in 44 attempts for an average of 1.05 stolen bases per contest.

On a team basis the offensive-minded Lancers rated in batting average (6th) and scoring (3rd) as well as in fielding (13th in fielding percentage). Longwood had a team batting average of .352 while scoring 419 runs in 43 games (9.7 runs per game).

Coach Buddy Bolding's squad set a new school record in fielding percentage with a .956.

Longwood, which ended up third in the South Atlantic Regional Tournament in May, has an outstanding 85-30-1 record over the past three seasons under the direction of Coach Buddy Bolding. At least 15 of last season's 18 squad members should be back for the 1985 season next spring.

New prospects include shortstop Kelvin Davis, a key performer with State AAA champ Halifax County High School.

Davis, from Nathalie, Virginia, hit .454 for the State champs of Coach Frosty Owens. He's expected to move into the Longwood line-up at shortstop, filling the void left by the graduation of All-American John Sullivan.

Bolding lists pitchers Steve Ayres and Dale Weaver and outfielder Bill Conroy as his other top signees.

Ayres compiled a 10-2 record for Buckingham Co. High in 1984 and was named Seminole District Player of the Year. Weaver, at 6-4, 215, has more size than any pitcher in Longwood history. He notched a 4-2 mark for Lord Botetourt High School and possesses an excellent fastball.

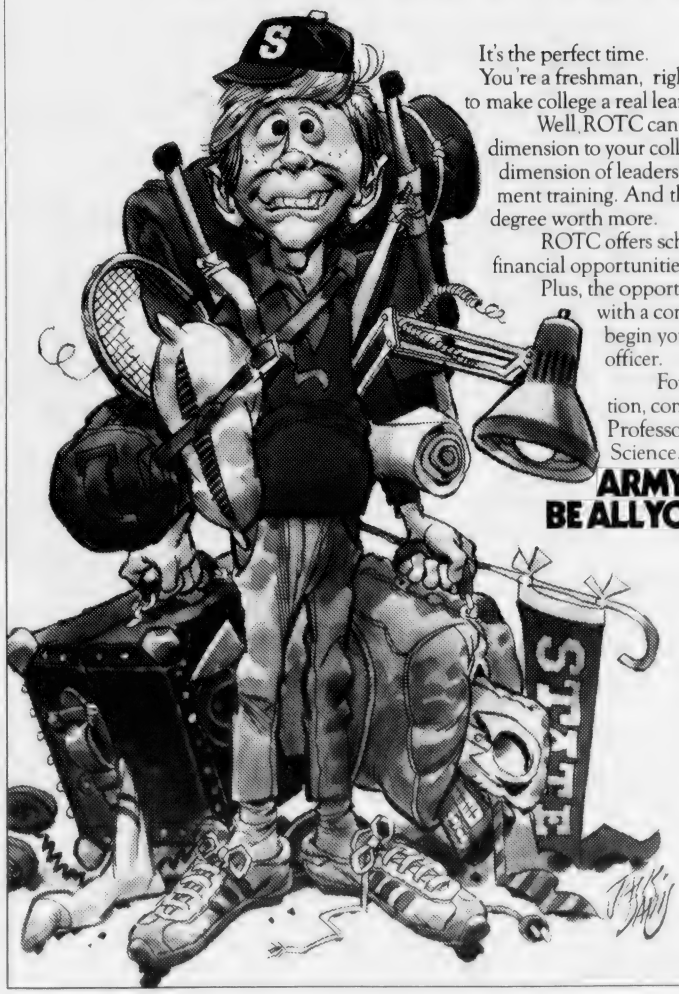
Other incoming players with potential include: outfielder Tommy Belcher of Woodbridge High School, pitcher Mike Dye of Amelia Co. High School, pitcher Tony Beverly of Parry McClure High School and infielder Mark Walsh of Lee Davis High School and brother of current Lancer Tommy Walsh.

Longwood, which has advanced to the NCAA Division II Playoffs two of the past three seasons, has had an 85-30-1 record over the past three seasons.

PORTLAND PICKS KERSEY . .

Former Longwood College basketball standout Jerome Kersey was chosen by the Portland Trailblazers in the second round of the 1984 National Basketball Association Draft June 19 in New York.

The 46th player picked overall, Kersey was the second college player from Virginia to be drafted behind former Virginia star Othell Wilson, who was chosen 35th by the Golden State Warriors.



The first player in Longwood's eight-year men's basketball history to be drafted, Kersey was only the second Division II cager chosen.

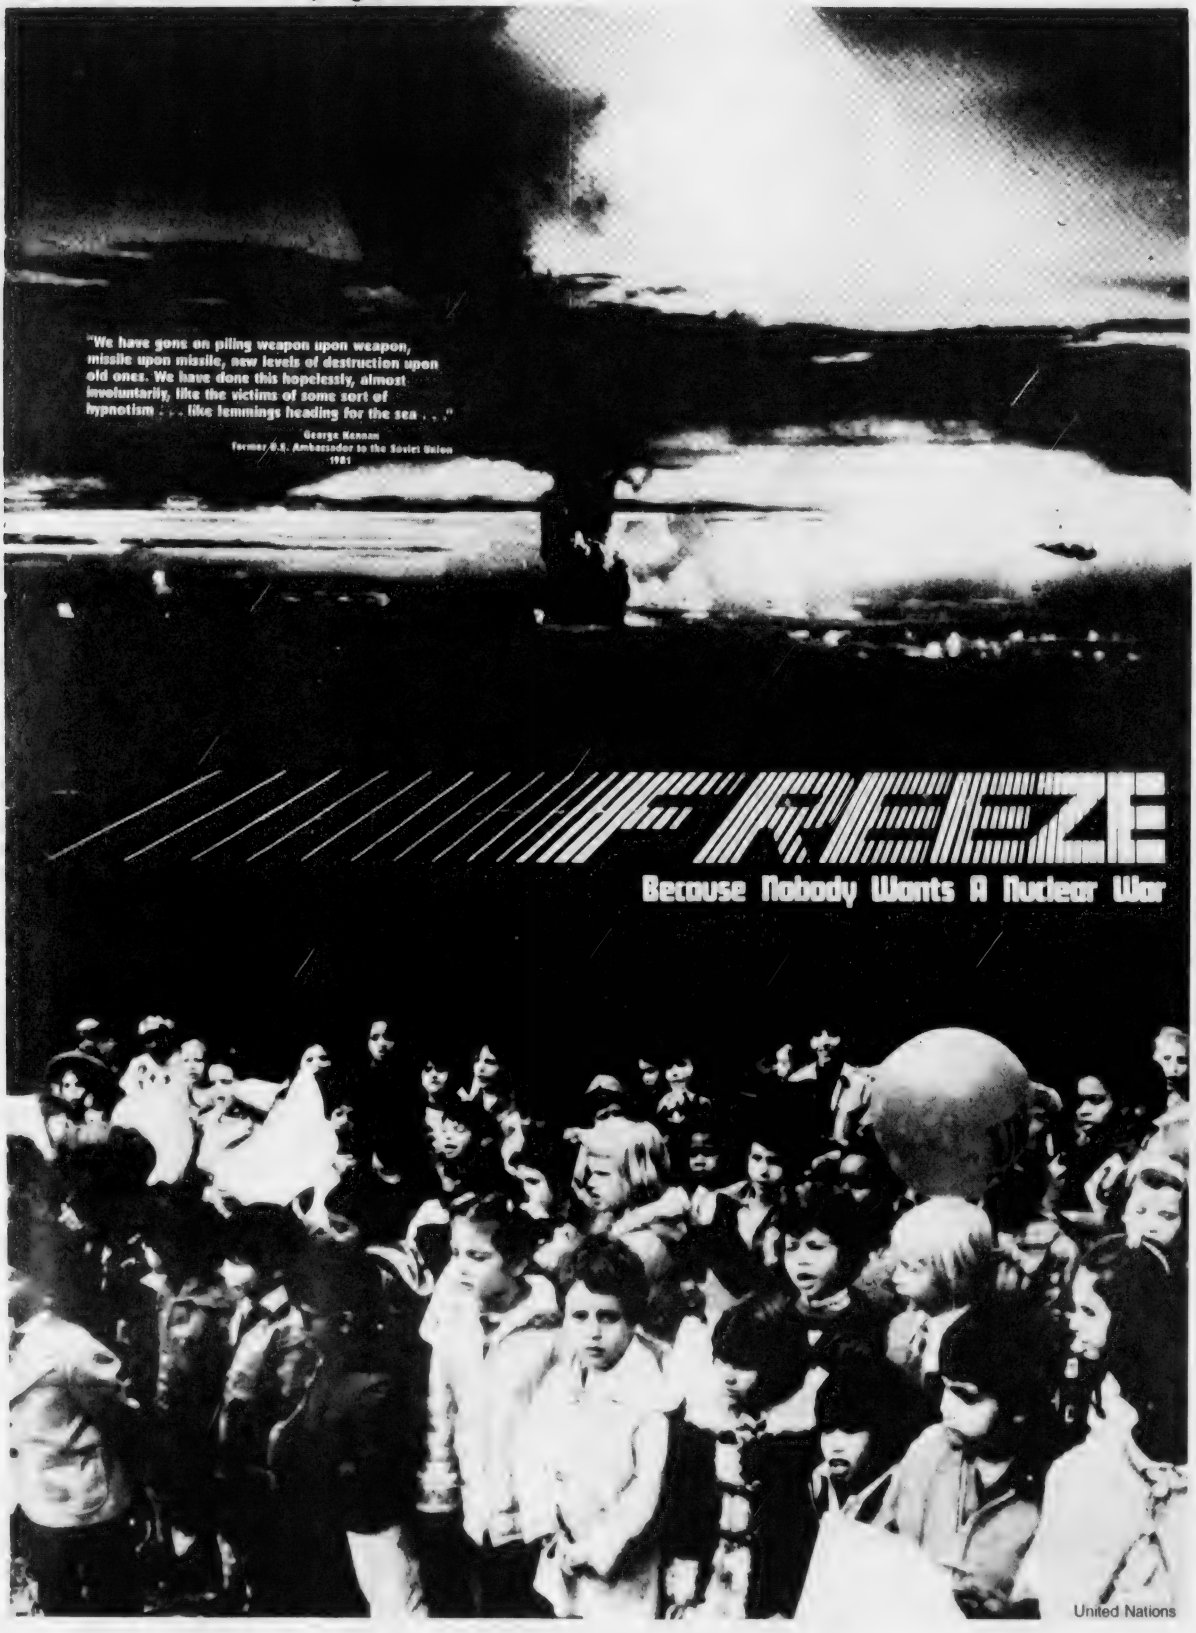
IS THIS ANY TIME TO THINK ABOUT ARMY ROTC?

It's the perfect time.

You're a freshman, right? And you want to make college a real learning experience?



Well, ROTC can add a valuable dimension to your college education. A dimension of leadership and management training. And that'll make your degree worth more.

ROTC offers scholarship and financial opportunities, too.

Plus, the opportunity to graduate with a commission and begin your future as an officer.

For more information, contact your Professor of Military Science.

ARMY ROTC. BE ALL YOU CAN BE.

VOL. LXIV LONGWOOD COLLEGE, FARMVILLE, VIRGINIA TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1984 NO. 2

Summer Brings Many Changes

By VINCE DECKER

Since last May there have been several faculty and staff changes. Among those who have gone on to pursue other personal goals are Student Affairs Director I. B. Dent and Dean of Students Dr. Wendall Ogrosky.

Dr. Ogrosky has been replaced by Dr. Bill Latta.

Dr. Latta comes to Longwood from Michigan State University where he was assistant director of the housing program. His responsibilities included administration of the student affairs program for a residence hall complex housing 2,800 students. He has held several other positions in the housing-student affairs areas at Michigan State. He also served for two years as a rehabilitation counselor for the Michigan Vocational Rehabilitation Services.

An active member of the American College Personnel Association, he has presented convention programs on community development in a residence hall, alcohol use and misuse, staff and individual development plans, and residence hall environments.

Dr. Latta's academic credentials are all from Michigan State University; they are the B.A., with honors, the M.A. in rehabilitation counseling, and the Ph.D. in administration and higher education.

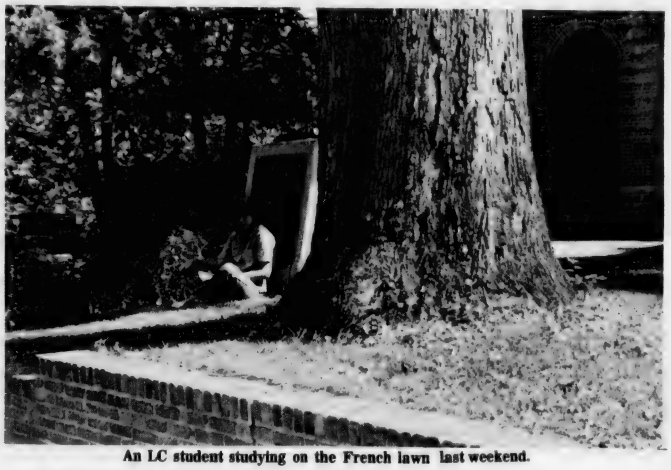
Dr. Charles B. Vail, former academic dean at Hampden-Sydney College and president of Winthrop College in South Carolina for nine years, will serve as Interim Vice President for Academic Affairs at Longwood.

He replaces Dr. Michael H. Haltzel who left Longwood to accept a position as senior vice president at the International Management and Development Institute in Washington, DC.

Dr. Vail will be Longwood's top academic administrator until a new Vice President for Academic Affairs is on board full time. Dr. Vail is prepared to stay the length of time necessary to complete a nationwide search, which could be until July, 1985. He will be operating with full authority as Interim Vice President for Academic Affairs.

President Janet Greenwood said that Longwood is "fortunate in having Dr. Vail fill this important position."

Luck '84 A Success



On Monday, August 27, at 8:00 the Lankford Student Union was open to all students. Luck '84 was the reason. Meredith Strohm originated the idea to have a Casino Night and presented it to Barb Gorski. Gorski decided to take a shot at making this event happen.

This was the first campus-wide event to take place in which the work of SUN, the R.A.'s, ARA, Administration and Faculty together was needed in order to pull it off.

Downstairs in Lankford students were invited to play video games, to bowl and to play ping pong and pool all free of charge. In the white and green rooms one could satisfy hunger with ice cream, cake and punch provided by ARA.

Silent movies were shown in the red room. Music and dancing were still other free attractions. The Resident Hall Staffs provided Casino games in the Gold Room. Faculty and Campus Ministers served as guest dealers and seemed to have as much fun as the students The emphasis on this night of free fun was non-alcoholic, something that we will be seeing more of as the drinking age goes up in VA.

From the turnout which was approximately 900, and the enthusiasm the night seemed to be a success. Perhaps the criteria for a Longwood party can change.

Job Outlook Forecasts Growth

Employment in the Third Quarter 1984 will continue to grow at the rapid pace set earlier in the year, according to new survey figures from Manpower, Inc.'s quarterly Employment Outlook Survey.

In the survey of more than 11,700 U. S. business firms, 31 percent of the respondents said they will increase their workforce in the coming quarter while only six percent plan staff reductions. The anticipated increases are essentially the same as those projected in the last quarter and are higher than the 27 percent figure posted for the same quarter last year.

"The current hiring projections are among the highest recorded over the eight years of the survey's existence and provide a strong indication that the present economic expansion will continue through the summer and early fall periods," said Manpower President Mitchell S. Fromstein. He said only slight geographic differences were noted in the survey results, with weaker growth indicated in the South and stronger projections indicated in the Midwest and Western regions. "These variations were expected," Fromstein commented, "as the Southern region has shown strong and continuing growth in the early recovery period while the Midwest recovered later and from lower recession levels.

Commenting on the survey results, Fromstein said, "The hiring outlook continues to be very optimistic with healthy workforce increases planned across all geographic areas and in most industries; however, a cautionary pause in employment growth seems to be present in the hiring outlook for Durable Goods Manufacturers and Construction firms. The firms which will add workers outnumber those which will reduce their workforce by 5 to 1. This compares to a ratio of only 1.4 to 1 in the 3rd Quarter of 1982 and 3.4 to 1 last year. The strength of current hiring plans indicates that there is still underemployment compared to the degree of economic growth in the post-recession period."

Note: The annual trend line represents net employment expectations for the current quarter in relation to the same periods of previous years. These figures are not adjusted for seasonal variations.

Fromstein said that labor shortages of skilled white-collar workers were beginning to develop in major cities of the U. S. "Orders for our temporary office workers are running 60 percent ahead of last year," he said. "This developing shortage of office workers is being accelerated by the rapidly growing installation of new office systems for which trained or experienced operators do not yet exist."

Variations in employment plans by industry sector indicate that hiring in the Construction Manufacturing sectors will be curtailed slightly from the last quarter highs but will remain comfortably above last year's levels.

And here we go. It's off to the races for some 950 plus brand new students at Longwood. Just as President Janet Greenwood's first freshman class at Longwood, the class of 1985, prepares to graduate, yet another record-breaking num ber of applicants were accepted to join in the crowd here in Farmville. Or rather, "given the opportunity to gain an education at Longwood," as is fashionable to say of late.

True, it took a good number of shoe horns to squeeze them all in, but they're here. In "expanded" rooms, residence hall kitchens, the Farmville Motel, and the Longwood Alumni House, they were fit in. It's the LC Admissions Telethon — fighting for "Gary's kids" as one distinquished senior observer viewed Director of Admissions Gary Groneweg's record acceptances — passing out "educational opportunities" right up to the beginning of classes; their checks are signed and they are here.

Granted, Longwood students can take pride in the fact that more people wish to attend the College. Too, this can largely be attributed to this Administration's ability to project a good image of Longwood. Appealing slide shows and attractive, if limited, promo pamphlets have a way of promoting this positive image. Yet that image, widespread as it has become, is a fragile one — resting on a less steady base. It is the base which needs restructuring, before the monument itself, and not the reverse.

Introducing nearly 1000 students to Longwood is a marked achievement for the College. A big gold star for the administration. But introducing nearly 500 of them to so-called "expanded rooms" will quickly sour the introduction. Further, over-crowding classrooms can hardly promote the advantages a small college can ably offer its students: person-to-person relationships with professors as well as learning in a more intimate environment. The record acceptances can be largely attributed, say senior members of the administration, to our 30 percent attrition rate; how likely, however, is that rate to go down with the situation on campus such as it is? A positive residence hall experience for freshmen is critical if those freshmen are to remain at Longwood. How positive will that experience be this year? It seems we have an infinite supply of Band-Aids for the monument while the base grows steadily weaker.

The conjunction 'however' is now used neither as a apology nor a concession. The problems we face as an institution now are many, and the band-aid repairs now being made have implications which will affect Longwood years after the current administration has left Southside Virginia. However, Student Affairs has recently begun an innovative program which is a strong step toward repairing the base of the institution. The Community Design & Development Workshop which freshmen participated in a week ago is unquestionably, in my opinion, the best program our progressive Student Affairs staff has yet directed. Though the final results of the workshops are yet to be seen, the partial results evident now are refreshing and inspiring. The program drew enthusiastic support from freshmen, faculty, the Student Affairs staff, and RA's alike.

Devised by Vice-President Phyllis Mable, Student Development Educator Barbara Gorski; and Dr. J. Cox of Counseling Services, the program encourages students to actively participate in the development of their floor and residence hall community. The program specifically promoted four of the fourteen goals for Longwood students: those of critical thinking, effective communication, interpersonal skills, and a sense of awakening.

Clearly, the workshops were able to accomplish their purpose. They were held on each freshman floor on campus, and one faculty member, one student affairs staff member, and the Resident Assistant on the floor led the groups. This combination promoted communication and a sense of responsibility in the three group leaders and likely will do much to bring about more faculty involvement in residence life.

The Workshops were impressive — Longwood needs such programs to improve campus life as well as academic excellence. Nothing could be better for Longwood College than more strong programs of this sort. . .and fewer band-aids.

'Time To Face The Strange...?'

COMMUNITY DESIGN AND DEVELOPMENT

Longwood saw slight changes this semester . . . and some interesting alternatives?

Mondale's Honesty Is Working

Editor's Note: Following is the first of a number of election-oriented articles to be run in "The Rotunda" this fall. Morton Kondracke is executive editor of "The New Republic." His syndicated column, along with those of other "op-ed" journalists, will appear intermittently in "The Rotunda" this year.

By MORTON KONDRACKE

So far, Walter Mondale's daring promise to raise taxes has worked brilliantly at the tactical political level. But will it work at the strategic level and at the level of actual government policy? That remains to be seen.

By all conventional political wisdom, promising to raise taxes is death in an election year. No one knows that better than Rep. Daniel Rostenkowski of Illinois, chairman of tax-writing House Ways and Means committee.

It happens I had the honor of informing Rostenkowski the evening of July 19 on the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco that Mondale planned to announce a proposal to raise taxes in his acceptance speech that night.

Marvel of marvels, however, Mondale is not getting clobbered for speaking the unpleasant truth — so far. To the contrary, President Reagan and Vice President Bush have so mangled the issue politically that it's a net plus for Mondale.

Asked at a recent press conference whether he planned to raise taxes as Mondale charged, the president said resolutely: "No." And then he said, "Maybe."

He said in a radio broadcast he would not raise individual income taxes, opening speculation that he would raise sales taxes — either directly or through a complicated system known as the "value-added tax." Both schemes are terribly regressive, forcing the poor to bear a greater tax burden than the rich.

Then out at his California ranch the president again said no tax increases. But Bush, after having lunch with the president, said maybe.

Mondale obviously had poked an ice pick into a chink in the administration's solidarity.

Many of the president's advisers know full well a tax increase will be necessary next year. The president doesn't want to admit it and may even believe economic growth and cuts will reduce the deficit without any new taxes. But growth cannot be sustained at levels necessary to cut the deficit significantly, and so Mondale and the president's advisers undoubtedly are correct.

In Mondale's acceptance speech, however, he promised no major corporate income taxes and no major defense cuts. And lately, Mondale has said his individual income tax increase will not affect "the average American family."

There is simply no way for him to do all this at once — any more than there was for Reagan to balance the budget, increase defense spending and cut taxes as he promised in 1980.

Reagan got away with this stunt four years ago, but he is a much better tall-storyteller than Mondale.

From a strategic political standpoint and for the sake of good governance, Mondale's best out would be to scale back his budget-balancing promises to a realistic level and offer a reasonable tax program to match it.

Transfer To LC?

Editor's Note: Frank Raio is a transfer student from both George Mason University and Virginia Wesleyan College. This article is a look at Longwood in comparison with these two schools.

By FRANK RAIO

Money, or the lack of it, dictated my transfer from Virginia Wesleyan College to George Mason University. The foreign language requirement, among other things at G.M.U. forced my migration to Farmville. And at Longwood I will stay until my sentence behind the desk begins, pushing papers fifty weeks a year and earning my share to pay off the federal deficit.

Between now and then I seem to have some spare time, so I thought I might share the insights of a veteran transfer student.

First and foremost, in the true "Go for the Goals" spirit, the educational aspect: although tempted, I will pass up this golden opportunity for brownie points by not mentioning each of my professors and citing their excellence, I will say though one class I find particularly challenging is taught by a fine man and a pillar of society, Doctor . . .nah, I cannot stoop that low.

One cannot make general statements about an institution's faculty. Each professor must be judged individually. Granted many of my professors at G.M.U. were at the top of their field and had credentials out the wahzoo, but some of them couldn't explain the function of a traffic light. Tiny, obscure Virginia Wesleyan College is home for two of the toughest political science teachers you'd ever meet. I'd ask for an extension or argue a grade with the entire G.M.U. faculty before I'd ask permission to go to the bathroom from those Wesleyan jokers.

The point is that although you might think larger schools have more bait to attract better professors, there seem to be plenty of good ones to torture students at places like V.W.C. and Longwood. And there are big enough cracks in the larger schools' hiring policies to allow some bonehead teachers to fall through; so don't hang your head or mumble about a tough course when talking to your old high school friends now at UVA.

I said not to be worried about transferring due to a tougher curriculum, but you should be weary of ending up in a social wasteland like George Mason. G.M.U. enrollment approaches 14,000, of which 10-12,000 are commuters. Nearly 10 percent of these commuters are over 30 years old and are more into fine wines and romance novels than a case of cheap brew and ultimate frisbee. It is said that Longwood is a "suitcase college", but hey, they don't even pack a bag at G.M.U. B-grade bands are not unaccustomed to playing their last set for a sleepy crowd of fifteen at G.M.U.'s Student Union.

Longwood is a comfortable medium between V.W.C.'s "Hi, how are you?" every time you pass and G.M.U.'s walking with your head down, social security number on hand, ready to validate your existence. I saw three girls that I knew from high school at Ocean City this summer. I found out that they were at G.M.U. with me for two years and we never crossed paths. One was even in a "concert-hall economics class" with me and we never saw each other once.

We have heard this all too often, but you really do get back only what you invest and this holds true in all aspects of college life, whether it be gaining knowledge or winning a chugging contest. Longwood College is as good a place as any other to invest in.

Your Wine List Please?

By ERIC HOUSEKNECHT

Let it not be said that we, the student population, by choosing to reside in Farmville, have thrust ourselves into a cultural abyss, destined to fall eternally from the plateau of social legitimacy. For there are those of us who opt to cling to the scrawny vines and branches protruding from the sleek sides of Farmville's aristocratic cliff. Having grasped for, and found, social stability, some have become so bold as to inch their way up towards the top in an effort to understand and ultimately act within the peculiar civilization existing around them. Such was the case when myself and entourage of would-be connoisseurs made a pilgrimage to a local convenience store with only one thing in mind. Our purpose: to sample and become familiar with the wines common to the local coterie.

Our group of eminently qualified vinophiles included Rob, a member of Delta Sigma Phi Fraternity, Mark, who had previously tasted wines at both the Brandermill Country Club and Big Star, Randy, whose impeccable taste was evidenced by his reluctance to turn off the Jerry Lewis Telehton during our tasting, myself, and Tony, an artist. Our task proved an arduous one and even finding the wine amidst the multitudes of beer and Cheese Whiz in the cavernous refrigerated section of the store was quite difficult. While many dilettantes would be shocked by the indiscriminate placing of all wines in cold storage, I saw, in this practice, a seasonal ploy on the part of the proprietor to emulate the archaic French practice of chilling both white and red wines during the hot summer months. Our inspiration heightened by this touch of continental flair, we chose five appropriate wines from the bottom shelf and headed home for the tasting.

The first wine to be sampled was Strawberry Coconetta, a pale pink combination of natural and artificial flavors produced by Manischewitz of New York. Tony was the first to comment as his sharp artist's eye correctly ascertained that this wine indeed "looks kinda like gasoline." However, it took Mark's experience and expertise to qualify both the character and potency of this wine by stating, "It tastes like cough syrup, it'll probably put you on the floor. Ironically, Strawberry Coconetta, which is produced under strict Rabbinical supervision, was the perfect complement to the deep-fried pork rinds, which all vinophiles swear by for cleairng the palate.

The next bottle tasted was a statistical best seller but certainly not a favorite within our circle of experts. Labeled as a combination of fine Perry Wine and natural pure flavors, Thunderbird had a murky color and an ammonia-like character that left us breathless. Randy aptly described it as having an "industrial bouquet," which, Mark added, was "reminiscent of a locker room."

Moving on to the second of three California wines featured in our sampling, H.M.S. Frost appeared much clearer than the Thunderbird and while Tony called it "strange," Rob went so far as to compare it to fermented prune juice. But once again it was Mark who hit the nail on the head by stating, "It smells like a swimming pool and was probably made from raisins instead of grapes."

Our fourth wine, (the last of the Californians) was an obvious favorite and the only one which was willingly quaffed by the entire group. T. J. Swann's Stepping Out consisted of Apple Wine and natural flavors and while its pale red color and strikingly familiar character reminded many of Dr. Pepper, Debbie (a newcomer to wine tasting but nonetheless a valuable resource) thought it tasted like a Charms Blow-pop.

Big John "Home Style" wine rounded out the sampling and even though the first four offerings had caused the original group of fire to dwindle down to three members, this unusual ruby red elixier prompted such comments as, "This is an American wine?" and "God!" Not only is Big John an American wine but it's a Virginian wine as well, coming fresh from Petersburg on a monthly basis. Mark, who at this point established himself as the indisputable master taster, called it "damn good."

While all of these wines are different they also all feature similar conveniences not found elsewhere. For the novice, serving instructions are featured prominently on all labels (ranging from "serve chilled" to "serve cold") and amateurs and experts alike will love the twist off caps which not only allow for easy opening but also give the option of serving the same bottle of wine on several occasions, Awareness of advances such as these is truly what separates the aristocrat from the social clod and gives him the toehold he so desperately needs as he scales the palisades of social ranking.

LC Players To Open With Three-Penny

The Longwood Players will open their 84-85 season with Bertolt Brecht's The Three Penny Opera. The play has already been cast and is now in production.

The cast, being directed by Patton Lockwood, includes many newcomers along with some familiar faces. The lead role of Mecheath, "Mack the Knife," is being played by last year's winner of the Longwood Players' Best Actor Award, Vince Decker. The role of Miss Polly Peachum, one of Mack's many wives, is being played by Sophia Paullete. Sophia has been very active with the Longwood Players since coming to Longwood, but the role of Polly marks her first leading role at Longwood.

The senior leads, Mr. and Mrs. Peachum, are being portrayed by veteran Jerry Dagenhart and newcomer Laura Coombs.

Rounding out the list of leads is music major Natalie Thompson as Lucy Lockett (another of Mack's wives), and N. C. State transfer Jeff Fleming in the role of the corrupt police officer Brown.

The production dates have been set for October 10 13. Crew positions for technical work are still open for anyone with a particular skill or a more than passing interest. Those interested should contact A. Moffet Evans, or David Miller.

After the foreseen success of The Three Penny Opera the Longwood Players plan on providing three more main stage productions: Alan Ackbourn's Bedroom Farce, Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, and Jean Genet's The Balcony. The Players are also planning on a series of one acts and studio theatre productions.

The new chairhead of the Department of Speech and Dramatic Arts, who is also the advisor of the players, Dr. Douglas Young is looking to a successful season and promises a year of quality entertainment.

U.S. Campus Events

CAMPUS NUCLEAR FREEZE PROTESTS have dropped off markedly this year. Participation in "Firebreaks," a nuclear war simulation game invented by Ground Zero, fell from 3000 last year to 1200 this year — a drop some attributed to student apathy. National spokespersons for the Freeze movement say the absence of large protests only reflects the fact that it's a mature issue now.

STUDENTS OBJECT TO CHEATING but won't turn each other in, according to an informal poll of U. of Alabama-Huntsville students. Of the 222 people queried by Omicron Delta Kappa, the leadership honor society, 200 said cheating of any kind is always or usually wrong, but 168 said they wouldn't turn in a fellow student they knew was cheating. About the same number said they had, in fact, seen other students cheating, but only one had reported the event.

THROUGH PLEA BARGAINING all but one of the 19 Cornell U. students forcibly removed from a protest against CIA recruiting avoided campus judicial charges. They agreed instead to do 25 hours of community service.

GENTLE THURSDAY WAS REVIVED this year on the Penn State U. campus to give students a few hours for quiet interaction with other people. Students were invited to bring musical instruments, flying discs, or hackey-sacks down to a campus lawn for spontaneous sharing. Gentle Thursday began in 1970, a turbulent time on campus, and was cancelled in 1980, because of drug and alcohol problems. The students who revived it this year say their peers need to escape job and grade pressures for one afternoon.

THE UNIVERSITY SHOULD ACCEPT SOME LIABILITY for open fraternity parties at which alcohol is served, reported a Northwestern U. Interfraternity Council-Panhellenic committee. Under current rules, Greek groups can't advertise parties and must check for Northwestern ID's. All parties must be pre-approved by the administration. The Greek groups want to advertise parties, and to get a quarterly permission form, in which the university accepts some liability.

Speaking of conservative student newspapers, the U. of Georgia is hosting the latest entry, the Campus Sentinel. Its editors promise to present a more positive view of campus than the existing paper, the Red and Black. The two papers have already had their first disagreement, after the Red and Black used an editorial welcomign its competition to point out the Sentinel editors' affiliation with the College Republicans.

A U. OF VIRGINIA GROUP called the Students Together Against Racial Separatism disbanded recently, after its leadership said neither black nor white students would cooperate in promoting greater racial unity. While some members protested the decision to disband, others said the group's approach was too idealistic, and didn't deal with the reality of racial separatism on campus.

Can Johnny (& Jane) Think?

By BILL MOORE

In the recent uproar about the "rising tide of mediocrity" in American public education, one of the standard lines has been "Why Can't Johnny Read?" For those of you into rock music, former Eagle Don Henley even wrote a song about it — "Johnny Can't Read." The concern for basic skills has been an appropriate one, and there are already signs that progress has been made in that area. However, since we are an institution of higher education, we should be concerned about somewhat loftier goals; the question for us (in a non-sexist form) becomes, can Johnny & Jane think? Since critical thinking is one of the Longwood goals, it seems a particularly appropriate question.

The Richmond News-Leader (8-28-84) carried a wire service article on this topic, citing studies which reflect significant declines over the past decade of the reasoning and analytic abilities of national samples of 13- and 17-year-olds. There seems to be a nationwide surge of interest in the issue; conferences on thinking, writing and the improvement of reasoning skills have become quite popular, and some schools (19 of the California state universities, for example) require a course in critical thinking for students to graduate. Alverno College in Milwaukee, the site of one of (if not the) best competency-based college curricula in the country, demands that its graduates demonstrate a mastery of critical thinking skills.

So what, you say? What's the big deal about thinking, anyway? As Don Stuart, the current English Department head, said to the freshmen during orientation this past week in essence, you're going to be faced with lots of questions that have no clear right or wrong answers — and you'll need to make some judgments. In last week's Rotunda editorial notions of social responsibility were discussed; to deal with such crucial issues, you have to sift through lots of information, separate the relevant from the irrelevant, and decide for yourself what you think. Without an ability to think critically, you're doomed to blind, narrow approaches to the practical problems facing you (& all of us) in today's complex world. Who will you vote for in November — and why? How does one define a strong national defense? Is deterrence a meaningful strategy for the United States to follow? Who do you believe about Nicaragua — and why? Closer to home, perhaps, for some of you: is raising the drinking age to 21 really the best, or even a good way to deal with drunk driving? Why or why not? The list is practically endless — and you'll face many of them every day, in class and out of class, if you take your head out of the sand and look around. There are opportunities all around you at Longwood to hone your critical thinking abilities, and you'll see some of them on the opportunity maps available later in September. What's the payoff? Well, apart from your being able to carry on a reasonably informed and intelligent discussion of important issues, research has shown that critical thinking abilities translate to success in the workplace, since in most jobs you'll be confronted with problems you'll have to analyze and address. Can you think? Think about it.

Register Vehicles

All students must register their vehicles with the Campus Police and be issued a decal to park in designated student areas. This must be done by September 3, 1984. On September 3, 1984 all unregistered vehicles must be removed from campus or risk being cited. Full ticketing for violations of the college parking regulations goes into effect on September 3, 1984.

Attention Liberal Arts Majors

On Wednesday, November 14, Longwood College, along with eight other colleges, will sponsor Challenge '85, a career fair for liberal arts majors. Challenge '85 will be held at Lynchburg's new Radisson Hotel and will give liberal arts seniors a chance to receive information from and interview with approximately 35 employers. The fair will also allow for students to interact and make valuable contacts as they prepare to enter the work force.

The day will consist of student visits and interviews with employers, concurrent fashion informational sessions, employer luncheon and a dress for success fashion show. The OCPP will provide transportation. Students will pay a $5.00 registration fee which will cover lunch. (Liberal Arts majors received information about this program this summer.)

In order to register for the program, students will need a resume and will have to attend an interviewing skills seminar. All liberal arts seniors are encouraged to come to the OCPP office by September 20 to register and to receive detailed information on the employers that will be in attendance.

Net Classic Crowns Champs

It was out with the old and in with the new in the 1984 Longwood Southside Tennis Classic Sunday afternoon as new champions were crowned in three of the four dividions.

Of last year's winners only Mary Willson Schill, now teamed with Liz Wyeth, was able to repeat her title-winning performance of last year in women's doubles. Schill and Wyeth beat Longwood students Stephanie Peters and Karen Watson 6-0, 6-1 in the championship match.

Hampden-Sydney sophomore Harry Thompson beat a tired Bill Moore 6-3, 6-2 to win the men's open singles crown. In men's doubles Murrie Bates and Jerry Cole dispatches defending champs John Todd and Paige Tilghman 6-4, 6-4.

Al Yoder won the junior vet (35 & over) men's singles title with a 6-0, 6-1 victory over Howard Estes.

The surprise of the tournament was Moore, a Student Development Educator at Longwood. Though unseeded, Moore advanced to the finals in singles and the semi-finals in doubles. He numbered defending champ John Todd (6-3, 7-6) among his victims in singles.

In doubles, Moore teamed with Monroe Preston to reach the semis before falling to Todd & Tilgham 6-3, 7-6 Sunday afternoon. Moore played a singles match at 9:00 and a doubles match at 1:00 before squaring off against Thompson at 3:30. Thompson beat last year's runner-up Scott Willett 6-1, 2-6, 6-4 Sunday morning to reach the finals.

This year's event marked the end of Todd's reign in singles and doubles. A 1983 graduate of Longwood, he had won the men's singles title in 1982 and 1983 and the doubles all three years the tournament was held, each time with a different partner.

Tournament Director Dr. Carolyn Hodges, Longwood Athletic Director, felt the tournament went well.

"We had some excellent tennis and a record number of participants," said Dr. Hodges. "Longwood was proud to host the tournament for the fourth year."

RESULTS

Men's Singles — Finals — Thompson d. Moore 6-3, 6-2.

Semi-Finals — Thompson d. Willett 6-1, 2-6, 6-4; Moore d. Hughes 6-4, 1-6, 7-6 (7-3 tb).

Men's Doubles — Finals — Bates-Cole d. Todd-Tilghman 6-4, 6-4.

Semi-Finals — Bates-Cole d. Casstevens-Hackett 6-2, 6-1; Todd-Tilghman d. Moore-Preston 6-4, 6-7 (8-6 tb), 6-4.

Women's Doubles — Finals — Schill-Wyeth d. Peters-Watson 6-0, 6-1.

Semi-Finals — Peters-Watson d. Arehart-O'Connor 7-5, 6-2; Schill-Wyeth d. Coppedge-Tipton 6-1, 6-1.

Semi-Finals — Estes d. Heineman 6-3, 6-4; Yoder d. Egbert 6-0, 6-0.

IAA UPDATE

The Intramural Activities Association begins their school year this week with entry blanks for men's flag football and women's team bowling (5 persons to a team) due Wednesday, Sept. 5. There will be a mandatory captains' meeting Wednesday night at 6:30 in the new IAA offices located adjacent to the Gold Room in the Student Union Building. Teams should sign up for practice on the IAA bulletin board located in the lobby of Iler Gym. Play begins Monday, Sept. 10.

Also, all interested students are encouraged to attend the IAA general meetings which will be held from 6:30-7:00 on every other Thursday in the IAA Room, Lankford. Each residence hall, sorority, and fraternity should have a representative since these meetings help to determine IAA activities.

Any further questions about sign up or IAA activities should be directed to the Intramural Office at 392-9367 from 9-11 a.m., Monday through Friday, and 3:30-4:30 p.m., Monday through Thursday.

Baseball Team Sweeps VMI

Longwood's baseball team, opening its season of fall scrimmages, took both ends of a doubleheader from visiting Virginia Military Institute Sunday afternoon, 9-3 in the opener and 7-6 in the nightcap.

Ripping homers for Longwood were Jeff Mayone, Allen Lawter and Marty Ford. Freshman shortstop Kelvin Davis had a pair of 2-run doubles and also played well defensively. Veteran catcher Jeff Rohm drove in the winning run as Longwoood edged the Keydets 7-6 in the second game.

In games this weekend, Longwood hosts Lynchburg Saturday at 1:00 and Virginia Sunday at 1:00.

Booters Open Saturday

The 1984 version of Longwood soccer will debut Saturday in the Southside Virginia Soccer Classic. Coach Rich Posipanko's booters will once again be chasing a berth in the NCAA Playoffs, a goal which has proved to be somewhat elusive over the past three seasons.

The Lancers face Slippery Rock Saturday afternoon at 2:00 on First Avenue Field after Division III's Hampden-Sydney and Wilkes kick-off the tournament at 12 noon. The championship game will be 2:00 Sunday and the consolation at 12 Noon. Hampden-Sydney and Longwood are co-hosting the Southside Classic, which is being held in place of the Longwood Invitational.

Saturday's game will match Lancer coach Rich Posipanko against his college coach, Jim Egli of Slippery Rock. The Rock ended up 17-1-1 in Posipanko's senior year, finishing 8th in the nation.

Longwood has turned in records of 11-4-3, 15-4-1 and 12-2-4 over the past three seasons, making its mark in the Mid-Atlantic Region. The Lancers, fourth ranked among Mid-Atlantic Division II teams last season, have yet to receive a bid to the NCAA Playoffs.

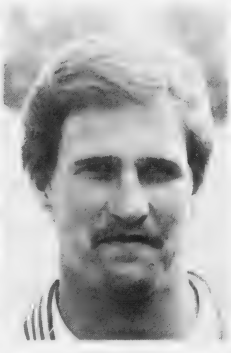
With seven starters back from last season, plus six solid newcomers, the 1984 edition of Longwood soccer is aiming for a first-ever NCAA bid and another outstanding season.

"I'm confident we will have another strong team," says Posipanko, 51-27-9 in five seasons at Longwood. "Our defense will be outstanding once again, but we need to increase our offensive efficiency. We scored 61 goals in 1982, but only 35 last season."

Leading the Lancer defense will be three-time All-American Darryl Case, All-Region choice Dan Bunis, All-Conference goalie Brian Sprinkle and veteran back Scott Thoden.

Case, Thoden and Sprinkle are seniors while Bubnis is a junior. Bubnis suffered a broken nose in last week's scrimmage at Randolph-Macon and is doubtful for Saturday's opener.

At midfield, Posipanko can count on vetrans Mark McArdle and Clay Mullican. McArdle, an All-State choice, scored four goals and had two assists in 1983 while Mullican notched three goals and five assists. McArdle may be the best 5-3 soccer player in the college game.



Other returning veterans include midfielder Craig Reid, back John Anderson, goalie Rob Liessem and forward Scott Gittman.

Also on the Lancer squad are freshmen Ricky Arnold and Paul Dzierski and sophomore Jim DiModica. Dzierski is a goalkeeper, Arnold plays back and DiModica midfield.

Posipanko expects to start either Sprinkle or Liessem at goalie; Karn, Anderson, Thoden and Case at back; Kyoud, McArdle and Mullican at midfield; and Kennen, Kremen and either Ford or Gittman at forward.

McArdle, Bubnis and Case will serve as tri-captains for the 1984 squad.

New Coaches Join LC Staff

Longwood College has hired new coaches for women's tennis and volleyball and an interim coach for women's gymnastics. Bill Moore will be coaching the Lady Lancer netters, Bonnie Lipscomb (Longwood '84) will lead the volleyball squad and - Debby Whorley is interim coach of the Lancer gymnasts.

Moore, a native of Dallas, Texas, has been working at Longwood the past year as a Student Development Educator out of the Office for Student Affairs. He is a graduate of the University of Texas at Austin with a B.S. in Psychology and an M.A. in Counseling Psychology.

A veteran club and tournament player, Moore stresses the mental aspect of tennis. "Tennis is a thinking game," he says. "I want us to be competitive and have fun also." Moore replaces Carrol Bruce, who resigned her post last spring. He has worked with the Longwood team on a part-time basis.

Lipscomb returns to coach the Longwood spikers after graduating with a B.S. in Physical Education in May. A standout on the Lady Lancer squad four years, she is a native of Brookneal, Virginia and a graduate of William Campbell High School.

She takes over for Sherry Will (Longwood '80) who left her coaching post to attend graduate school at the University of Maryland.

Debby Whorley, a native of Elkton, Virginia, will be working with the Longwood gymnasts while Coach Ruth Budd spends a semester in Finland as part of a faculty exchange program. Budd will resume her duties in January when the competitive season begins.

Whorley is well-qualified to work with the Longwood gymnasts. She has prior experience as a performing gymnast, a successful coach and a recognized gymnastics judge.

Chemistry Department Gains New Professor

By ERIC HOUSEKNECHT

The latest addition to the dedicated team of professors in our natural sciences department is Dr. William R. Stagg of Lynchburg. Filling the void left by Dr. Patrick Barker (who has taken a year's sabbatical in order to study at the Langley Research Center in Hampton). Dr. Stagg says he's "excited about teaching again" after a seven-year absence from the ever-intriguing world of state supported academia.

A native of Lexington, Kentucky, Dr. Stagg attended the U. of K. as an undergraduate and then continued his studies of chemistry at Iowa State, where he eventually earned his Ph.D. Gainful employment was then procured with the F.M.C. corporation of Princeton, N.J. but this capitalistic state of bliss was all too soon obliterated by a two-year stint in the U.S. Army. After the novelty of creamed chipped beef and calisthenics at dawn had worn off, Dr. Stagg went on to the University of Illinois as a post-doctoral associate.

His prior experiences as an educator include professorships at Colgate University and Randolph-Macon Woman's College. Dr. Stagg is currently employed as a senior research chemist at Babcock and Wilcox in Lynchburg, where his duties include teaching an "industrial short course." The course consists of 36 hours of lecture plus lab time crammed into a two-week period and deals with the chemical particularities of running a power plant.

Here at Longwood, Dr. Stagg pontificates on the particulars of physical chemistry, a field in which his experience is extensive. The collegiate environment seems to appeal to him and he feels much more relaxed now that he and his students have a bit more "think time" between lectures. Dr. Stagg's easy-going attitude is evident in the classroom where he lectures and fields questions with a cool professionalism, even as volatile intellectual banter flares up around him. Without a doubt, Longwood's latest faculty acquisition is an exceptional one, and well worth hanging onto.

Longwood Students Travel To France

By ALICIA ASHTON

This summer, six Longwood students studied, as part of their major or minor in France. The trip was arranged by Dr. Jill Kelly, French professor at Longwood and was offered to those students who were majoring or minoring in French. Some were also able to do individual study and earn more credits toward their major.

Those who went were: Joanne Harwell, JoAnne Akers, Jane Wimbish, Alicia Ashton, Patricia Moore, and Theresa Alford.

It was a four week adventure starting on June 14th. The trip entailed a three day visit to the French capitol: Paris. The group was free to roam the streets of Paris. JoAnne Akers stated that, "Paris at night is gorgeous!" After walking miles to sightsee and using lots of film, the group moved on to Toulouse, a town in southwest France. There we met up with sixteen students from Kenesaw, Georgia who were to study with us.

Classes started June 20th. It was a 2½ week intensive study of grammar and oral interpretation. The course counted as three college credits and was designed to help the student better understand the language.

Along with classes, the agenda included week end excursions to the Mediterranean Sea, and the Pyrenees. JoAnne Akers remembers the Pyrenees as being one of the most beautiful sights. We also visited Luchon, a town famous for their Roman baths whose temperatures reach over 100 degrees F.

Even though we were studying the language, we got most of our experience from actual contact with the people of Toulouse. We learned quickly how to cope with everyday situations. These situations included making telephone calls, asking for bread, ordering dinner, and asking questions such as "Where am I?" and "What is that?"

The French fashion was cropped pants, Mickey Mouse paraphernalia, layered clothes, short skirts, and bondage sandles. You couldn't go anywhere without seeing beggars, dogs, or sidewalk musicians. And naturally the McDonald's served beer. Movies like "Footloose" and "Raiders of the Lost Ark" were shown (in French no less). As far as transportation, the taxi drivers drove like they were in the Grand Prix, only you were in the back seat!

The students replied when asked, that food was one of their most memorable experiences. Restaurants and cafes were everywhere. JoAnne Akers commented that she never got up enough nerve to try the horse hamburgers.

The Fourth of July was celebrated by the students and faculty as America's day of independence and the last day of school.

The majority of students returned on July 13th, but some had returned earlier and others continued to travel. All in all, the trip was very successful and very beneficial to all who went. After I returned to the U. S., I realized how many little things we (Americans) take so much for granted in the U. S. Things like ice cubes, soda other than Coca-Cola, bathtubs, and ice tea are in short supply in France. Mon Dieu, it would have been great to have soft toilet paper!

Men's Awareness Is Focus Of Program

Men's Awareness Night, a program developed by Student Development Intern Randy Chittum, will begin at 5:30 Thursday, September 20, in the Virginia Room. The evening will focus on men's concerns and will highlight speakers on men's awareness.

Following a keynote address, participants will transfer to the Lankford Building where workshops will be held on the following issues, which Longwood males indicated they were most interested in this summer on a survey conducted by Chittum:

Career Planning, Dress for Success, Relationships and Relationship Abuse, Sexuality and Birth Control, Personal Finances, and Leadership at Longwood. After the workshops, there will be a social for all those who took part in the evening's activities.

Chittum stated that participating "men will become more aware of national trends affecting them" and that they will become "more aware of how the male role has changed in the past ten years" in this country.

Invitations for the evening will be sent to all Longwood males this week.

Student Development Intern Randy Chittum developed Men's Awareness Program for Longwood.

Students Needed For Advisory Service

Mark turned an uncertain face toward the members of the Judicial Board. Suddenly his heart raced. He had been informed of the charges that he was still confused. He had been a little drunk. What had he said? What had he done? He still wasn't sure. He hadn't even known he had broken a rule and now here he was waiting for the penalty. He was alone and regretted not bringing someone along. He was confused and a little scared.

Mark might be feeling more certain of his position if he had had someone to talk through the case with him, someone to give him support and advice, or to be with him at his hearing.

A group is now forming to provide just this service for students, like Mark, who are up for Judicial and Honor Board hearings. This group will make up the Student Advisory Service and will be knowledgeable of Longwood's rules, regulations, and procedures. They will not give legal advice but will simply be there to make sure that due process goes smoothly for the student. They will be sympathetic and impartial, talking over the case with the student, advising him of procedures, or accompanying him to the hearing.

The Student Advisory Service is in the planning stages and will be holding an organizational meeting on Wednesday, September 12, at 6 p.m., in Grainger 206. Any student who is interested in joining the group is encouraged to attend. The group will be advised by Dr. James Crowl.

Educators Give Reagan Low Marks

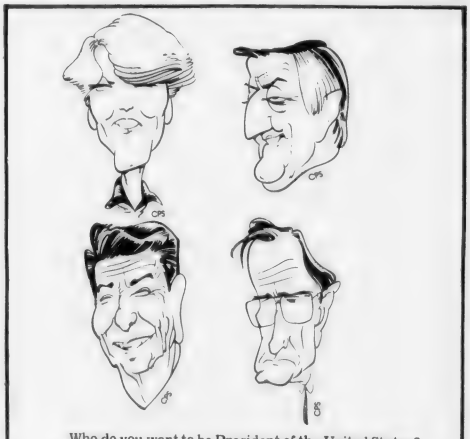
By DAVID GAEDE

(CPS) — As the campaign begins in earnest, President Ronald Reagan is not getting any higher marks from the nation's education community than he has during the last four years, various higher education experts say.

To assess the president's impact on colleges, College Press Service asked a cross section of officials and experts a variation of the same question President Reagan posed to voters in 1980: Are you and your campus better off not than you were four years ago?

Pointing to Reagan's attempts to gut federal financial aid programs, soft enforcements of campus civil rights laws, and a general "lack of interest" in higher education, some concluded Reagan has one of the worst higher education track records of any president in recent history.

"We are certainly not better off than we were four years ago," says Shawne Murphy, president of the National Caolition of Independent College and University Students (COPUS) and a student at St. Olaf College in Minnesota.



"We've been fighting a continual uphill battle against the Reagan budget cuts," she laments. "He's tried to take a big chunk out of education for the last four years, but fortunately Congress has come up with compromises that didn't make the cuts as bad as they could have been."

Indeed, during his first three years in office Reagan proposed cutting financial aid funding from 30 to 50 percent, sending shock waves through the higher education community.

Among other things, Reagan proposed eliminating some financial aid programs — student Social Security benefits, Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants (SEOG) and State Student Incentive Grants (SSIG) among them — and restricting other programs.

"It's been clear since the 1980-81 school year that overall student aid has decreased by 20 percent, even with the rejection of Reagan's drastic proposed cuts," observes Kathy Ozer, legislative liaison for the United States Student Association (USSA) in Washington, D.C.

"The administration's policies regarding regulations, court decisions, and funding has clearly not been in the best interest of most students," she asserts.

Concert & Jazz Bands Have New Director

Greater visibility on and off campus, music to challenge and to excite students, and a commitment to excellence are the goals of the students and the new director of the Longwood College Jazz Ensemble and Concert Band.

"We want to involve Longwood students who were in high school bands in our ensembles. We believe there is the potential at Longwood to build a first class band and jazz ensemble," said Ralph Mohr, the band director. "Longwood students will find membership in these groups will be a wise investment of their time. The returns of excellence, musical fulfillment, and enhanced social contacts will be worth their while."

Plans for this year's concert band and jazz ensemble include more performances on campus and trips to campus in Richmond and Lynchburg. At the present time both ensembles are expanding their music libraries. The groups will perform a variety of styles ranging from serious concert band literature, light classics, pop, and jazz.

The concert band meets on Mondays and Wednesdays from 2:30 to 3:45 p.m. in room 104 Wygal Hall. There is a sectional on every other Friday from 2:30 to 3:45 p.m. The jazz ensemble meets on Mondays and Wednesdays from 4:00 to 5:15 p.m.

Anyone wanting further information or wanting to join these organizations should contact Ralph Mohr through the Music Department at 392-9368.

will be holding a brief staff meeting for all students interested in reporting, photography, business, or advertising positions on the newspaper Wednesday, September 12 at 6:00 in Lankford's Gold Room. Please attend.

Roommate Relations

By FRANK RAIO

Now that the lofts are completed, stereos have replaced hammers and saws as the primary decibal producers in the dorms of Longwood. The "designated phone answerer" positions are now filled on the various halls. People are generally settled in, or at least comfortable enough with their surroundings to leave them in favor of the preppies at U. Va. for the weekend (and let's be sure to tell them that they missed some good parties here this weekend).

Anyway, as I was assuming the position to accommodate my low shower-head, poised to leap from the spray which turns scaldingly hot every time someone in the building flushes a toilet, I found myself pondering dorm life and the challenges we residents face on a daily basis.

We who find ourselves with new roommates are only beginning to discover the various character defects which will emerge slowly at first, then faster as our roomies get more secure. Some problems are already out in the open. Those of you who were assigned roommates with "Schmidt's Stinky-foot Syndrome", for example, are surely aware of this and by now should have remedied the situation (Lysol, and heremticly-sealed bags for sock storage. Others have found that fate has dealt them roomies who cannot handle their liquor. The signs of this problem are tell-tale indeed and are not easily hidden. A large pot or trash pail next to the bed should normalize this defect. If not, try rolling up the carpet on weekends, easier clean up will result.

When I was a freshman, there was a guy on my hall who was blessed with Don Juan as his roommate. It seems that Don Juan used to bolt-lock the door and put his roommate's pillow and blanket out in the hallway. Leaving "Poor Mike" (as he came to be known) to sleep in the lounge, while Don Juan played backgammon in private with his latest conquest. This could not possibly happen at Longwood, as visitation regulations prohibit it. But if your roommate is obsessed with playing private backgammon games and the like, put your foot down. Saltpeter, found at your local pharmacy, is inexpensive and may be easily sprinkled on your roommate's fried bologna while his or her attention is diverted by a prospective opponent. If this does not deter your roommate's love for the game, try spreading rumors that he/she has contracted a boardgame-transmitted disease and is transferring to Maryland U. to be closer to the Johns Hopkins' treatment center.

We have all been told of the "seven-year-itch" by Dr. Joyce Brothers. In five weeks or so the average roommate will encounter the less publicized "seven-week-bitch" that inevitably occurs as character defect realization comes to a boil. During this period, roommates will have had enough and find that they cannot hold back the complaints any longer. In extreme cases, this turbulent exchange of feelings has led to stabbings or even gunshots.

For the most part, the seven-week-bitch is no more than simple communication between roommates. It is quite healthy and often results in a more harmonious relationship. Students skilled in the art of communication have a better time of it in the dorms, make acquaintances swiftly, and ultimately have an easier time locating backgammon partners.

SPORTS

LC Hockey Has High Hopes

If a couple of things fall into place, Longwood could have its strongest field hockey team since 1975 when the Lady Lancers ended up in sixth place at the national tournament.

Coach Bette Harris' team opens play Tuesday, hosting Randolph-Macon at 3:00. Wednesday, the Lady Lancers visit Eastern Mennonite and Friday and Saturday they'll be in Boone, N.C. to take on Appalachian State and High Point.

"This is the strongest group of hockey players I've had since I came here in 1979," said Dr. Harris, 38-40-21 in five years. "The team has a lot of skill, and depth at each position. It's going to be very difficult to pick a starting lineup."

Longwood has 11 returning veterans with considerable experience. Included in that group are five of last year's top six scorers. Defensively, the Lady Lancers should also be strong, but a pair of freshmen goalkeepers will have to mature in a hurry if the team is to reach its potential.

Becky Hardin and Haidee Shiflet are contending for the starting goalkeeper position, vacated by 1983 Most Valuable Player Terry Chumley. Coach Harris says she has confidence in both.

A major rules change in NCAA field hockey will put more pressure on the young goalies and the Longwood defense. This season goals can be scored from anywhere on the field. No longer will shots have to be taken from inside the circle which has a 16-yard radius from each goal. The end result will be to change hockey to more of an "offensive game."

Heading up the returning veterans from last season are seniors Pam Esworthy, Colleen Stiles, Mary Garrison and Lisa Seivold. Esworthy had four goals and three assists last season while Garrison added four goals and one assist. Stiles and Seivold are defensive standouts.

Six members of a strong junior class will be counted on for their experience. Sue Groff, Mary Dey, Sharon Bruce, Karen Garrett, Leslie Rapoza and Tammy Marshall were either starters or top reserves last season.

Lancer Golfers

By JIM WINKLER

Under the direction of Head Coach Steve Nelson the Longwood men's golf team will open its 1984-85 season Thursday in the Greensboro College Tournament in North Carolina. Longwood will be joined by 18 schools in the Tournament including UNC-Charlotte, Bluefield, Guilford and Christopher Newport.

The Lancers return five members from last year, but only one, Punkaj Rishi played in the top six positions. Rishi, a two-year letterman, could be the team's top performer. Also returning are Kevin Brush, Danny Hughes, David Mattes and Eric Nelson.

Newcomers Charles Hungerford, Lance Reynolds, Mike Passarell, Pat Shultz and Ron Hatch round out this year's edition of the Longwood golf team. Hungerford has looked the best among the freshmen and could play in the No. 2 spot. He has shot in the high 70's and the low 80's in qualifying rounds.

Head coach Steve Nelson sees the fall season as a chance for his young team to gain some experience and to better prepare themselves for the spring. "We're very young and inexperienced," said Nelson. "We're not playing well as a team. We have been very inconsistent and are trying to develop some consistency." The Longwood coach does feel his golfers can improve their scores as "they have a good team attitude and are working hard."

Lancer Baseball

Longwood's baseball team split a twinbill with the University of Virginia in fall scrimmage action Sunday afternoon, edging the Cavs 3-2 in the opener and falling in the second contest 8-6.

In the opener junior pitcher Scott Mills had a shutout going until the top of the 7th when UVA rallied for two runs. Mills limited Virginia to four hits, according to coach Buddy Bolding.

Hitting standouts for Longwood, now 3-1 in fall action, included Dennis Leftwich with four hits in six trips, Kelvin Davis with a triple in the second game and Tom Klatt with a two-run double in the nightcap.

This week Longwood plays at Lynchburg Saturday and at William & Mary Sunday.

IAA Update

The intramural season began this week with men's flag football and women's team bowling leading off the events. This year's participation is already seeing an increase from last year with a total of 20 men's football teams, up from 14 last year, and 21 women's bowling teams, an increase from 11 last year.

This week brings three man-woman basketball entry blanks due on Thursday, Sept. 13, and the first coed softball tournament being held this weekend. Entry blanks may be picked up in the lobby of Iler.

LANCER SPORTS

Longwood 1-1 In Weekend Tourney

By MARK HOLLAND

The 1984 Longwood Lancer soccer team opened its season Saturday as host of the Southside Virginia Soccer Tournament.

This year's team has perhaps the best chance of any previous Longwood team of earning an invitation to the post season NCAA tournament. With 12 veterans and only six freshmen, the Lancers are fielding a more experienced team than last year. Along with more experience, there is also a noticeable change in attitude on the field with tri-captains Dan Bubnis, Mark McArdle and Daryl Case, providing much-needed leadership on the field.

Opening against Slippery Rock on Saturday the Lancers started off fast and showed their individual superiority. McArdle took charge early, scoring with a solid headball from freshman Tim Ford. The score was called back because of a questionable offsides call.

A report of the play in the opening half reads like an honor roll. Rob Liessem dominating the net, three time All-American Case taking the ball past any and everyone, veterans John Kennen and Scott Thoden staking out the right side of the field. Newcomers Erick Karn and Mahfoud "Foo" Kyoud were furhter testament to Posipanko's recruiting genius. Karn, teaming with Bubnis, effectively sealed off the area in front of the net while Kyoud showed he had the lightest touch on the field with his pinpoint passing. The goal-oriented play of veterans Clay Mullican and Mark Kremmen foreshadowed a high scoring left side this year. Evidence, though, will have to wait as Kremmen was ejected from the game.

Longwood had to play the rest of the game a man short.

Posipanko at this point substituted Craig Reid and Scott Gittman for the overworked Ford and Mullican who were desperately missing their forward. Although playing at an advantage, Slippery Rock just could not penetrate the Longwood defense. There were moments of high tension but Bubnis and Case were still on the field and Liessem was always behind them.

The second half started with a handball in front of the net which gave Slippery Rock a penalty kick. Liessem made an extraordinary save to get Longwood out of trouble only to have the referee call it back. On Slippery Rock's next shot, which went in, the referee called a Slippery Rock player on encrochment and awarded a third shot. A shell shocked Liessem could not stop the ball and The Rock had a 1-0 lead.

Things got worse from there. The one man disadvantage was starting to catch up to the Lancers and the officiating kept getting worse. There were eight yellow cards issued, a fact that Posipanko called "ridiculous," and then Gittman got Longwood's second red card. The nine on eleven game ended with Slippery Rock victorious 4-0.

The Lancers were more composed on Sunday against Hampden-Sydney. They had 33 shots on goal Freshman Mike Harris, in for the ineligible Kremmen, had an astounding 35 yard full volley from Thoden's throw-in to score. Kyoud and Kennen added the second and third goals respectively.

Posipanko, satisfied with the play of his veterans, started to substitute freely. The eligible reserves played Hampden-Sydney even and the game ended 3-0.

Following the game Mark McArdle and Mahfoud Kyoud were named to the All Tournament team.

HEAD BATTLE — Lancer Mike Harris (14) won this head battle against Hampden-Sydney Sunday.

THE ROTUNDA

VOL. LXIV LONGWOOD COLLEGE, FARMVILLE, VIRGINIA TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1984 NO. 4

Gay/Lesbian Students To Join Together

By JEFF ABERNATHY

Two years ago this November, Longwood's campus was buzzing with news of a gay student's attempt to form a "Discreet Gay Society." An interview with the student in The Rotunda entitled "Running Scared" caused an uproar on campus. Moralizing letters were sent to the newspaper, and the student was soon "discovered" and harassed by numerous other students unmercifully. The reasoning for such treatment? Presumably, the student had committed a grievous sin; he had been brave enough to be frank about his sexuality if only to encourage others to do the same. The result? He and other gays and lesbians on campus were effectively shoved back into the closet. Unpermissive Longwood had does the shoving, and homosexuals on campus have literally been forced to stay "in hiding" ever since.

This fall, however, the subject of homosexuality will appear on campus again. Student Development Educator Barbara Gorski has been talking to gays and lesbians on campus in an effort to help them feel more accepted at Longwood. A dinner is being planned for mid-October, and an effort will be made to show homosexuals that they have the support of the students, administrators and faculty at Longwood.

"A lot of our gay and lesbian students choose to meet off campus, but unless you're already involved in that group, you can't get involved," says Gorski. Thus many freshmen who are homosexuals are limited in their socializing. Gorski and other administrators are "aiming to put on a dinner for anyone who is supportive of freedom of lifestyle choices," she says. "Hopefully, it will be an environment where people will say 'Hey, these students have the right to choose.' "

The dinner is to be the highlight of various activities on campus which will focus on gay and lesbian rights. The activities are to be "low risk," allowing homosexuals some degree of privacy in an environment supportive of free choice of sexuality.

One sophomore male who is gay spent his freshman year at Longwood in "a state of fear. I had no idea who to turn to. I couldn't go to the RA, and I didn't know anyone here who would listen to me after I told them that I was gay."

Although he still lives with one foot in the closet door, the student is now becoming more open about his sexuality and somewhat distressed at the situation at Longwood.

"We have a lot of needs and rights just like any other students," he says. "Why can't we have a Gay Student Union and separate housing so that we can live together openly? Why can't we meet and date one another without stealing around in shadows? We're pretty goddamned tired of lurking around like criminals. If students at Longwood are so backward that they cannot accept reality, then they should have stayed back home on the farm, chewing their tobacco and driving their Jeep CJs. We're fed up, we're gay, and we're staying."

Gorski recognizes the need for a sense of belonging on the part of Longwood's homosexual community. She noted that "gay and lesbian students are looking for a sense of culture — including religion. Their choice becomes 'less risky' for them if the Longwood community is permissive of alternate life styles."

The question of religion often enters in discussions of homosexuality. Many Jews and Christians claim to oppose gay and lesbian rights because of various passages in the Old Testament. Gorski notes, however, that these very same people rarely adhere strictly to other passages in the Bible such as that forbidding intercourse while a woman is infertile or that forbidding premarital sex. Adherence, it seems, is only for those who deviate "too far" from the norm.

Gorski realizes that not all Longwood students will be wholly permissive. However, she adds, "I also know that there are some people on campus who are willing to say to gay and lesbian students 'you're O.K.'"

The Rotunda Interviews: Horace Scruggs

On Tuesday, September 11, Geist's annual Oktoberfest tapping was held. As usher after usher was joyously brought up to the Jarman stage, as the 1984 Mittenmeister and Festmeisters were named, one group of four students sat sullenly amid the melee. Among them was Senior Horace Scruggs, who was to be named to the position of Geistmaster at the conclusion of the ceremony. Scruggs, however, chose to refuse the position in a protest of Geist, saying "I'd like to thank everyone who feels that - I'm worthy to receive this position, but I can't see myself running around in a clown outfit . . . I care too much about the rest of the world."

In the first of the 1984-85 series of Rotunda interviews, Scruggs explains the protest and the motivations behind it.

ROTUNDA: Obviously, the primary question on the minds of the ra-ras and a few other "traditionalists" on campus is "Why?" What was the reasoning behind the action?

SCRUGGS: The comment was made simply in protest of all the energy that's put into such childish antics while little attention is given to the issues that really concern each and every student at Longwood - rather than a select few.

ROTUNDA: What are your feelings in general towards Geist?

SCRUGGS: I feel that it's o.k. . . . if students want to spend their time holding on to high school. But at the same time there should be twice as much effort put into becoming responsible, thinking adults; this is an effort which I and several others see lacking here at Longwood.

ROTUNDA: So the protest was, in part at least, an effort to overcome this failing?

SCRUGGS: What I really would like is for people to sit down and talk . . . that is what it was done for: to say 'let's talk about it.'

ROTUNDA: Are the members of Geist truly campus leaders?

SCRUGGS: There are many other people on this campus who give to much more worthwhile things: within their departments as well as on the campus as a whole. These people are giving, yet it's the ra-ras that get picked for Geist, and, consequently, noticed and rewarded by the administration.

ROTUNDA: So, is Geist detrimental to the campus community?

SCRUGGS: Yes, very much so because it's prolonging a high school attitude which does nothing for any graduating senior or incoming freshman because it doesn't afford them the opportunity to see what is real in the world.

ROTUNDA: Were last Tuesday's action effective? Did anyone care?

SCRUGGS: What the action did was, number one, let Geist know that there are some who refuse to go along with these childish games, and, number two, it opened up an avenue of protest which seemed to be closed in the past.

ROTUNDA: You said that you turned down the position because you "care too much about the world." Would you elaborate on that?

SCRUGGS: That was a statement which came from the group I was with, David Areford, Laura Cullinan and Theresa John, which simply means that we refuse to be content with our own satisfactions. We strive to see that all students' needs are met and that their opinions are voiced.

ROTUNDA: Is Geist an exclusive, say elitist if you will, organization?

SCRUGGS: I would say they're happy with the way their lives, particularly with the prestige that they have. They're living in a closed world. I mean, showing a slide show of yourself certainly shows a certain amount of egotism. They're short-sighted . . . they can't see the needs of students because they're dealing with only a handful of students, and that handful happens to be the ra-ras.

ROTUNDA: How would you define the typical ra-ra?

SCRUGGS: One who is much caught up in the "spirit" of Longwood but who fails to see the actual needs of the students here. By needs I mean the ability to think about those outside of one's self and see the rights and wrongs of our society. There is also the willingness to take a stand on beliefs which are true.

ROTUNDA: What would you propose that Geist do in order to be more sensitive to the needs of the average student?

Number One, stop basing its requirements for entrance on deeds done in the interests of Geist itself or in the interests of the ra-ras. Secondly, spend more time building a thinking and socially-aware Longwood rather

I had an editorial to be printed in this space. I really did. It was a verbose piece of writing on the sorority and fraternity system here at Longwood. My editorial line was something like 'give independence a chance before you run off to join the Greeks.' I did have that. Now I don't.

The Farmville Herald refused to print my editorial. Too freeking verbose is what they thought. In the eyes of the printer, my article was either "obscene, immoral, or illegal." I was a bad boy. I used harsh language. One shouldn't use harsh language in this town, you know. For this is not the real world, this is Farmville. Rather than consider a viewpoint, it is thought proper in Farmville to refuse to examine the view.

I can hardly agree with this mentality. In this world, there is no room for a closed mind. Yet because I must abide by the whims of those who print this journal, for now I must allow myself and my beliefs to be pushed around in the interests of the students at Longwood. At some point, however, we students will grow tired of being shoved back from awareness. I hope that point is around the corner, for I certainly cannot see it now.

Rather than print a watered-down version of my work, which I refuse to do, I will not run this week's editorial. Not again, however, and I refer you to the thirty-third line in Mr. e. e. Cumming's poem, "I Sing of Olaf." Naturally, I am unable to print the line. It is "illegal, immoral," or possibly, in the tainted view of my printer, "obscene."

Censorship in a free society... a frightening reality which is all too close at hand.

Geist Recognizes Scruggs

To the Editor:

As many of your readers are undoubtedly aware, this year's Oktoberfest Tapping was marked by a somewhat unexpected occurrence, namely the public refusal by Mr. Horace Scruggs to accept a position as this year's Geistmeister. Traditionally, Geist has reserved this prestigious position for the senior who most aptly represents the ideals of service to one's class and school spirit.

We, the members of Geist, would like to take this opportunity to thank Mr. Scruggs for honestly expressing his opinion. We are both understanding of and sympathetic towards his feelings and are quite willing to accept his decision. Despite Horace's refusal, Geist would like to recognize him for the services he has rendered to Longwood College. While the hard work of many students goes unnoticed, Geist prides itself in recognizing the accomplishments of these individuals, regardless of their personal opinions toward our organization.

Parking Thievery?

To the Editor:

On Friday, September 14, I went to use my car which I had parked in Lancer lot five days before, and it was gone. I contacted campus police and found it had been towed without any notification to me. The officer informed me that my car was at Lawson Ford about two miles down on Main Street. When I asked him to take me there his attitude was reluctantly helpful.

Once at Lawson Ford I found that the towing charge was $30.00 and storage was $3.00 a day for everyday they had my car without my knowledge (two days). My car was also ticketed twice at $6.00 a ticket, bringing the grand total to $48.00 for five days of parking at Longwood College.

I was under the impression that when any police officer authorized personal property to be moved they were to contact the owner. Since campus police took the time to write two tickets and call for a tow truck they could have at least notified me too!

Saturday when I went to my mailbox I found a letter from Meredith Strohm, about Important Changes in Campus Parking. This notice doesn't mention towing for cars parked in the faded blue section of Lancer lot.

As an independent student I find it hard to deal with $48.00 - worth of unexpected parking costs in five days. I'm sure every student knows how dear $48.00 is to them, and can think of many better ways to use it than paying for parking. I feel my expenditure was unnecessary.

Longtime Dying

By RICHARD D. LAMM

Late one March afternoon, I happened to remark, in the course of a talk to a small group of health lawyers and one reporter, that "we all have a duty to die." The next day, all hell broke loose.

The headline in The Denver Post announced: "The Elderly Terminally Ill 'Have a Duty to Die,' Lamm Says." The appalled health lawyers hastily called a press conference to try to correct the Post's version, pointing out what I had actually said: that the terminally ill should be permitted to die with dignity instead of being hooked up to life-support machines long after consciousness has faded and after there is no longer any hope of recovery.

Following the story, I received close to 3,000 letters. Despite the distortions, the vast majority of those who wrote agreed with the gift of what I had said. The response showed clearly that many people have come to believe that medical technology has run amok.

It would seem that a new liberation movement is forming, a movement for liberation from our machines when they are used not to prolong living but to prolong dying.

But there is a relentless kind of technological imperative, particularly in the medical field: If we invent a machine we have a duty to use it. In an article in Nursing magazine a nurse writes that we "can't shut our eyes" to the fact that resuscitation machinery is very expensive, and that "if the equipment is not used, there is no return on the investment."

Last year health care nationwide cost $355 billion — $45 million an hour, 24 hours a day, every day of the year. The time is not far off when there will be a direct conflict between the health of the individual and the health of the society. We cannot afford all the medical miracles that the profession stands ready to give, and choices will have to be made about the distribution of limited medical resources. Technological immortality is running into fiscal reality.

A large proportion of our health-care bill already goes for the care of patients who have no chance of recovery. We spend 28 percent of Medicare funds on the 6 percent of Medicare patients who die each year. In other words, we spend our time as much on those patients who die as we do on other Medicare patients.

Many high-tech procedures and machines are so expensive they interfere with our ability to pay for other medical procedures. The cost of high technology is one of the main factors cited by health care analysts for the decline in funds for prenatal care and health care for the elderly.

The easiest issue both politically and morally is the "right-to-die" issue, and it is here that the new liberation movement is being felt. California passed the first right-to-die law in 1976, and 19 other states and the District of Columbia have passed similar or identical laws. Such legislation gives doctors and hospitals immunity from civil or criminal prosecution if they have acted according to a "living will." The heart of a living will is simple:

If a person should have an injury, disease or illness regarded by his physician as incurable and terminal, and if the physician determines that the application of life-sustaining procedures would serve only to prolong artificially the dying process, the patient directs that such procedures be withdrawn and that he be permitted to die.

The courts have recognized three main criteria to guide medical professions in ambiguous situations. First, if a patient is brain dead the medical professional can declare him dead, even though his body functions. Second, physicians do not have to treat a "hopeless" patient. Third, treatment can be discontinued if there is "no reasonable possibility of a patient returning to a cognitive, sapient state."

But these guidelines are minimal, and even the most fundamental question, "Is a person dead," differs from state to state. Twelve states have not adopted the so-called uniform brain death law.

Whatever the ultimate standard, it is clear that most people recognize that at some point treatment becomes both counterproductive and cruel. Pope John Paul II stated in 1980 that the refusal of treatment "is not the equivalent of suicide; on the contrary it should be considered as an acceptance of the human condition."

The movement to reaffirm the dignity of human life and death in the face of possible technological immortality is growing slowly. People who do not want to be placed on life-support systems are exploring options, in addition to the living will, for determining the conditions for treatment or nontreatment of injury or illness. California and Colorado have passed bills allowing patients to appoint attorneys to represent them in medical areas.

But the best option currently available to the terminally ill is to arrange for hospice care. The philosophy of hospices is to ease the dying process by providing whatever pain medication or psychological support is needed. Hospices give terminally ill patients and their families choices about their care, including such extreme choices as refusing nutrition and fluids when death is imminent.

Medicaid and Medicare should pay for hospice care as an alternative to hospital care for the dying, because the cost is lower and the quality of care is higher. Some hospitals, like the Veteran's Administration Hospital in Denver, are beginning to allocate a few beds to hospice care for the dying.

However, these changes are occurring very slowly. In the meantime, countless human beings are hooked to the miracles of modern medicine, machines which too often offer them not recovery, but a living death.

(Richard D. Lamm is governor of Colorado)

Florida Moves To Ban Overnight Guests

GAINESVILLE, FL (CPS) — University of Florida students soon may find their indoor nocturnal activities curtailed by a ban on members of the opposite sex spending the night with them in residence halls and fraternity houses.

And if Florida and other colleges are any indication, students everywhere may soon be facing tough new restrictions on what they can do in campus housing.

Florida decided to think seriously about joining the growing number of colleges that restrict visiting hours when a university task force suggested the changes in July.

Student reaction was mixed.

The 13-member task force, made up of faculty, students and community representatives, was reacting to an alleged rape at a fraternity house and a campus hearing into a student's complaint about being disturbed by late-night visitors, says Hugh Cunningham, director of university information.

"Currently, overnight visitation is not permitted," Cunningham notes. "But 24-hour visitation is, so obviously overnight visitation probably exists."

Among the suggestions were in-house monitoring by students and staff of individual residence halls, and live-in adult supervision in fraternity houses.

Most fraternity members reacted "very well" to the recommendations, reports Tom Dougan, campus fraternity advisor, though many feel they have been singled out because of the alleged rape this spring.

"In the coming year we'll start staffing the fraternities with grad students or house mothers," Dougan says. "But most fraternity members don't feel the presence of a house mother would have prevented what allegedly occurred."

Last week, a 16-year-old girl visiting UF claimed she was raped at a pre-rush party at Sigma Alpha Epsilon, which does not have a resident adult supervisor.

UF police are still investigating the incident.

Some fraternity members also say they can't afford the $15,000 a year to hire a house mother.

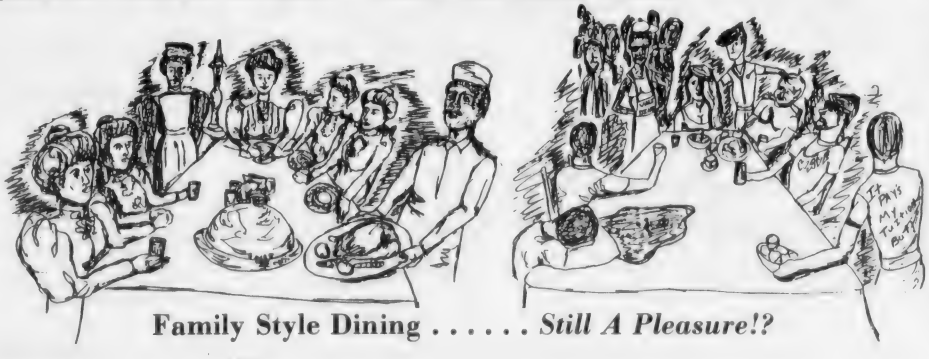
Student reaction to the suggestions was minimal because of the summer release of the task force's report, but Cunningham expects more feedback as students return to campus this fall.

Florida is one of a number of colleges that have changed overnight visitor policies recently. While sign in-sign out sheets and curfews are outdated, restricted guest hours are replacing the more liberal policies promoted in the sixties and seventies on many campuses.

In 1980, the University of Pittsburgh revised its 24-hour visitation policy and now restricts overnight guests to the same sex. Kent State, Kansas and Alabama, among others, soon followed suit.

The changes at Pitt and Kent State were prompted by dormitory murders.

Administrators there and at other schools cite security as the reason for the changes.



Students themselves are the ones asking for the stricter housing policies, claims Paul Jahr, research committee chairman of the American Association of College and University Housing Officers (ACUHO).

"The nature of college students in general is changing," he explains. "They are making an economic decision to go to college and they want to make the best use of their time."

Dorm visiting policies were a question "way back when," Jahr adds, but as society has changed in the past two decades, so have students.

"Most students now were born after Kennedy was assassinated," he says. "They've grown up in a more permissive society and the question of visitation hours just isn't that big an issue to them."

Some students, however, are unhappy with college administrators' attempts to regulate visiting hours regardless of security or social reasons.

Family Style Dining . . . . . Still A Pleasure!?

than a school which is based on "good times" and self-interest.

ROTUNDA: Do you see Longwood students in general as primarily self-oriented?

SCRUGGS: Yes. There are many things happening in the world around us which Longwood just seems to take in stride.

ROTUNDA: Such as?

SCRUGGS: Such as prejudice in the surrounding area and nuclear proliferation.

The heavy use of alcohol and the general idea that we all must conform in order to be liked . . . These things are certainly detrimental to Longwood, and, as we grow instead of wiser, detrimental to the society as well.

ROTUNDA: Would you say that the image of Snoopy, dancing on top of the dog house for everyone to see, fits a large number of people on this campus?

SCRUGGS: There are a number of people who seem to fit that description, and, sadly enough, their weekend dances seem to start every Wednesday night.

ROTUNDA: So you see alcohol as a large problem on campus?

SCRUGGS: Yes. It seems to perpetuate several idas, one being comformity. Another-uhh-mindlessness and irresponsibility.

ROTUNDA: So there is a poliarzation on campus, with the ra-ras on one end and the apathetic students on the other?

SCRUGGS: The polarization is that you have the ra-ras here (on one end), a thinking group of students on the other end and a mass of students who are apathetic about things which directly affect them.

ROTUNDA: How do you bring the opposite ends together, and at the same time, bring about a positive attitude from the "don't give a damn" students?

SCRUGGS: By transferring the love-of-self to the love-of-others. That's the basic idea, and this idea includes making all students socially aware. In doing this, we'll get students to voice their opinions and obtain a society where all people count and not just an elite few.

ROTUNDA: This is still somewhat vague. How do leaders of a community bring about this social awareness?

SCRUGGS: By asking "why?" and not going along with tradition. By finding out how the community feels — educating on issues which affect that community.

ROTUNDA: We're talking about issues very close to racism. Would you say that groups such as Geist promote stereotyping?

SCRUGGS: No — not intentionally. I don't think that they promote stereotyping. They promote an exaggerated view of one's self which makes people not listen to others. Therefore, opinions of others are often based on one's own ideas.

ROTUNDA: Is Geist a nonessential part of campus life?

SCRUGGS: Well, I'm quite sure that Longwood could carry on as well — if not better — without it.

Music Department Sponsors Trip

By NATALIE THOMPSON

Every two or three years Dr. Egbert, Chairman of Longwood's Department of Music, attempts to organize enough students for a European tour. This year a two week trip to London has been set to begin December 27 and conclude January 7th or 8th. The cost of this trip is a very reasonable $993.48 and there are quite a few spaces still open. Dr. Egbert will be directing a choral group during this tour and encourages anyone interested to audition. It is not necessary, however, to be a part of this group to make the trip. A deposit of $50 is due October 1, therefore, Dr. Egbert would like to encourage everyone interested to contact the music department as soon as possible.

The Learning World

By Dr. RICHARD MEISLER

The function of grades is revealed by using a little imagination. Imagine that the grading system was abolished today. If you are a teacher, are you sure that the students would come to class, laugh at your jokes and treat you with respect? If you are a student, would you do what the teachers want?

I recently talked about education with a group of college students. They felt that the pressures of term papers and examinations left them no time to really absorb their subjects or even think about them. There was one exception. He was a young Vietnam veteran who was badly injured in combat. He received a government disability pension. He lived frugally, and his pension met his forseeable financial needs.

The veteran handled college very differently from the other students. He concentrated on the classes from which he learned and didn't worry about the others. He got some low grades, but didn't let them bother him. He went to school to learn, not to get good grades.

The other students in the group wishes they could follow his example. None of them dared. They feared that low grades might damage their future employment possibilities. I have never seen a better illustration of the nature of grading, which has more to do with money and power, than with learning.

The grading system gives power to teachers over students. The main function of grades is to punish the student for not doing what their teachers want them to do. Students and parents are terrorized by the way a teacher can harm a student's future prospects.

Grades teach people to rely on the judgements of others about their learning. Students do not learn to evaluate their own learning, a skill they will need in almost anything they do. Students are taught by the grading system to obey instead of learning to learn. Years later they find that they don't know where to begin the process of learning something new unless there is a teacher to tell them.

Teachers believe that grades are necessary to help students learn. Grades tell students how well or poorly they are doing. If this is their function, why do they have to be recorded on permanent records where they can cause so much damage? Most students, however, will tell you that their grades don't reflect their learning. Students receive good grades when they give teachers what they want, which means they usually learn less.

Learning needs to be evaluated in many settings and for many purposes. Graduate and professional schools need to assess a student's previous learning. Employers and licensing agencies need to do the same. Let them do it. It is not necessary that the lower-level schools and the teachers do it for them. Let somebody else do the judging. For when teachers judge instead of teach, a wedge of power is driven between the teacher and the student. They are no longer on the same side. That gap has been there for most of us for so long we don't even notice it.

Alcohol Center Gearing Up

By MICHELE WILLIAMS

Friday, the 14th of September, marked the reopening of the Alcohol care center located in the student union's off-campus lounge. The alcohol center's new hours this semester are 9 p.m. to 12 a.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Before you begin to turn the page and sigh, "Oh no, - not another anti-alcohol campaign," please read on. "The alcohol care center is in no way suggesting the student not drink but, merely that he or she drink responsibly,'' stated Administrator Barbara Gorski.

Dr. Anderson, Janette Shoeder, and Ms. Gorski, the Interim Director of the Student Union, established the alcohol care center last spring, with an overwhelming response from the student body.

The Alcohol Education Committee found that it was necessary to provide a service for students so that drunk-in-public arrests in the Farmville area would decrease. The unpleasant experience involved with being "taken in" would also be reduced. The care center therefore could safely retain intoxicated students, and observe them until they were sober. "The center is strictly confidential and no effort is made towards disciplinary actions," Gorski said.

The center is not, however, utilized as much as it was originally intended to be. However, "many students do call the Center for advice and inquiries," said Gorski.

The volunteers are trained by Gorski, Shoeder, and Anderson before they are permitted to work in the center. Ms. Gorski said the student volunteers were taught "how to deal with a drunk individual in an adult manner."

LC Players To Produce Threepenny

By DIAHN SIMONINI

On October 11th through 13th at 8:00 p.m., the Jarman Hall curtain will rise on Bertolt Brecht's "The Threepenny Opera," a delightful musical romp through the slum and waterfront sections of Victorian England. No prim and proper England here; instead the stage abounds with delightful rogues, - the most villainous of whom is the notorious Macheath (alias Mack the Knife), portrayed in the Longwood production by Vince Decker. This 1920's "mafia forerunner" has his fingers on the criminal pulse of London and is head of as colorful a gang of thieves, liars, and cutthroats as has ever been portrayed onstage. No wonder, then, that Mr. and Mrs. Jonathan Peachum, played by Jerry Dagenhart and Laura Coombs, are appalled when their daughter, Polly, (Sophia Paulette) is smitten with the handsome stranger. Matters deteriorate when the lovestruck Polly actually dares to commit the "immoral act" of marrying him! Such happiness, of course, - cannot last. Waiting in the wings are two of Macheath's "formers" — a rejected mistress named Jenny (Connie Watkins) with bitter dreams of revenge, and Lucy the mistress of Newgate Prison (Natalie Thompson) who willingly adds to Macheath's difficulties with the law in hopes of rekindling the "old flame." Inevitably, Macheath is captured and is led to the gallows — but will he hang?

Seated: Sophia Paulette
Standing: Laura Coombs, Jerry Dagenhart

A strong cast of supporting actors aid in determining his fate. They include Jeff Fleming as Tiger Brown, Andrew Murtaugh as Jake, Travis Corker as Matt, Lewis "Spike" Newby Jr. as Walt, Glenn Gilmer as Filch and Rob Robertson as Bob.

Rounding out the cast are David Turk as Smith, Toby Emert as the constable, Leon Young as Kimbel, Patty Piedmont as Betty, Kathryn Harshberger as Dolly, Cassandra Wallace as Molly, Martha Pollard as Coaxer, Dave Miller as the constable, Michele Watson as the beggar and Wanda Carter, Ann Lawson, Joyce Rollandini and Robin Falkenstein as the beggars' chorus.

Tickets for "Threepenny Opera" are available at the door. For further information, call 392-9361.

Students Recover Past With Modern Technology

Longwood College archeology students used 19th-century mining technology to learn about prehistoric Virginia Indians this summer.

During the rainy month of July, students in Longwood's Summer Field School in Archeology faced an unusual dilemma. They had to sift through dirt from a four-stepped trench that had just been dug. Normally, the soil is dry and sandy, making it easy to shake it through a screen to recover artifacts.

But the rains had changed the dirt into mud. The essential screening of the mud would have been wastefully time-consuming and difficult, said Dr. James Jordan, field school director.

When Hicksie Wells, Longwood's grounds foreman, was helping in the digging of the step-trench, he suggested that a pump and a firehose would enable water to be pumped out of nearby Little Buffalo Creek and onto a screen. Water from the hose would aid the archeologists in sifting through the muddy soil. "Hicksie likened it to a gold-mining operation," Jordan said.

Three students — Kinney Swisher of Amherst, Craig Diffee of Dinwiddie, and Jeff Buttles of Hampton — quickly went to work on the details. They made a device consisting of a generator, pump, firehose and screen. After dirt was carried in buckets to the screen, the students used the hose to separate it from the hoped-for evidence of the past — projectile points, scrapers, and shards of pottery, mostly.

"The hallmark of archeology is adaptability," Jordan said. "We have met the challenge of our muddy July environment and have not become extinct!"

Thirty-eight students participated in the 10-week Archeology Field School, which ended on August 10. A student's first five-week field school is known as Anthropology 495: Basic Techniques in Field Archeology. In the second internship — Anthropology 595: The Organization of Archeological Fieldwork — students conduct independent projects under Jordan's supervision.

Since August 1981, the Field School has been held each summer at the Smith-Taylor site, located near the junction of the Appomattox River and Little Buffalo Creek in Prince Edward County. The site is on a 289-acre farm formerly owned by the late Robert A. Smith of Farmville. Mr. Smith and Jordan negotiated an agreement in the summer of 1981 allowing the site to be used for archeological fieldwork. The site's name also recognizes Robert E. Taylor, Chairman of the Board of Taylor Manufacturing Co., Inc., of Farmville, who has been a patron of the Field School.

Approximately 20 percent of the 2.1-acre site has been excavated, said Jordan. The site, which has an elevation of 315 feet, sits on a flood plain which lies 15 feet lower. This slight elevation prevented flooding, kept insects away, and still allowed the prehistoric inhabitants to stay close to the water of Little Buffalo Creek.

"I think it was used during the Archaic Period — 8,000 years before the present to 3,000 years before the present — as a base camp for Indians who moved seasonally up and down the Appomattox River," Jordan said. "They would come here for a few days or a few weeks to exploit the available food resources. It was probably not a permanently occupied site; it may have been unused for hundreds of years."

"In the Woodland Period — 3,000 years before the present to about 1600 AD — settled groups probably used the mound as a permanent occupation site. So this site, apparently, had two uses — first for migratory hunting and gathering bands and later as a hamlet for farmers."

Taking advantage of the unusually high water in the Appomattox, two Field School students took a canoe upstream and, paddling their way back to the Smith-Taylor site, did preliminary survey work at similar mounds and bluffs close to the water. Buttles and Jaison Annarino used a topographical map to locate these sites.

Craig Diffee, of Dinwiddie County, uses hose to sift through mud.

Maxwell To Give Lecture

Longwood College chemist Maurice Maxwell will open this year's Faculty Colloquium Series with a lecture on his research on some compounds of thiophene.

The lecture, titled "The Nature of the 3,4-Bond of Thiophene," is scheduled for Wednesday, September 19, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium. It is open to the public at no charge.

Dr. Maxwell is one of a limited number of chemists in this country who are working in thiophene chemistry. (Thiophene is prepared by the high-temperature interaction of butane and sulfur. It is used in organic synthesis.)

Dr. Maxwell's work is, in part, a "prove-disprove" reaction to research by Janssen and deJong of the Netherlands. It resulted in the synthesis of another new thiophene derivative, benzo (1,2-c:3,4-c) dithiophene.

A graduate of Emory and Henry College, Dr. Maxwell received the Ph.D. from West Virginia University. He joined the Longwood faculty in 1974 and presently directs the college's chemistry program.

Dr. Maxwell, along with Dr. Patrick Barber, has been engaged in a project for the Langley Research Center, National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The two chemists have developed some high peformance plastics (polymers) which are stable at high temperatures.

The other lecturers in the 1984-85 Colloquium Series are: Dr. John Molnar, professor emeritus of music, who will discuss the music of Colonial Williamsburg; Dr. Gerald Carney, assistant professor of religion at Hampden-Sydney College, whose topic is Krishna, one of the most beloved Hindu gods; and L. Marshall Hall, associate professor and head of Longwood's department of history and government, who will discuss the "complex phenomenon of Southern Unionism" as revealed in the life of William L. Sharkey of Mississippi.

The Faculty Colloquium, established at Longwood in 1973, provides an opportunity for faculty members to share with colleagues, students, and the public topics of research which are separate from, but related to, their teaching studies.

Bird Assumes Command

Carl D. Bird, a senior from Petersburg, has assumed command of the Longwood ROTC Battalion.

Bird, a business administrator major, officially took over as Battalion Commander in an ROTC awards and recognition ceremony last Wednesday. Bird's new insignia of rank was pinned on his epaulettes by Lt. Col. C. Frank Broome, professor of Military Science at the University of Richmond.

He will be responsible for Longwood's ROTC Battalion, which currently totals approximately 225 cadets. His selection was based on such factors as his academic and ROTC grades, his performance at Advanced ROTC Camp, and military proficiency.

Also during the ceremony, which was held in Bedford Auditorium, many ROTC cadets received awards for their participation in Advanced ROTC Camp this past summer. Some 26 Longwood cadets attended the six-week Camp, which was held at Fort Bragg, North Carolina.

Other awards included the following:

300 Club: Carl Bird, Charles Campbell, David Fowler, Guy Hackett, Steven Harmon, James Jackson, Betsy Kornieck, and William Reimsnider, III.

Physical Proficiency: David Fowler, Charles Campbell, Steven Harmon.

Land Navigation: David Fowler, Adam Lee, Jeffrey Thorpe.

Military Proficiency: David Fowler.

Honor Company: James Jackson, Lee Jones, Adam Lee, Brian Liming.

Carl Bird is now responsible for 225 cadets.

Mixed Tuition Trends Nationwide

By SUSAN SKORUPA

(CPS) — In-state students at Michigan's four-year state colleges and universities won't have to pay any more tuition than they did last year.

But students at Arizona's three state universities will pay 14 percent more, even though the national inflation rate has been around four percent since last fall.

Students nationwide, in short, are finding a mixed tuition picture as they start fall classes. While scattered colleges and university systems have managed to hold increases to a minimum, many other schools have imposed tuition hikes well above the inflation rate.

"There's no trend toward freezing or raising tuition that I'm aware of," says Brooke Breslow of the College Board. "There will be different states and institutions each year that freeze. Some stay stable for two years, then go up. Then others freeze the next year."

In mid-August, the College Board predicted total college costs — which include room and board, books, supplies, transportation, and personal expenses as well as tuition — will rise an average six percent this fall.

Some colleges, of course, have been more successful than others in keeping increases down.

Administrators at all of Michigan's four-year colleges took Gov. James Blanchard's offer to freeze in-state undergraduate tuition in exchange for an 11 percent increase in state funding.

"There was some concern among administrators that tuition was too high," says Ron Jursa of Michigan State Higher Education Management. "Colleges were afraid of being priced out of the market."

"I think the freeze is good," stresses Jim Labadie, a senior at Wayne State University in Detroit. "But tuition is still fairly high. I think we're still among the top ten in the country in terms of high tuition rates."

Tuition freezes, in fact, typically don't last. The University of New Mexico has followed last year's tuition freeze with a 10 percent hike this year.

"The 10 percent reflects the change in state funding," says UNM budget director Jim Wiegmann. "We also needed to make up somewhat for the 1983-84 freeze."

And this year's freeze in the state of Washington could translate into a 24 percent increase during the 1985-1987 period at state community colleges, says Kate Brown of the Washington Association of Community Colleges.

The cost of education continues to climb, she notes, and while inflation is only four-to-five percent nationally, the Higher Education Price Index, which measures the costs of goods and services to colleges, is running at 10-to-11 percent increases.

Colleges will spend a total $85.5 billion this school year, according to a National Center for Education Statistics report released last week.

In Arizona, legislative pressure on campuses to raise more money to pay the higher costs convinced the Board of Regents to kick up tuition 14 percent at the three state universities.

"Tuition is set by the regents," says Otis Elliott, spokesman for the regents. "But it's certainly influenced by the governor and the state legislature."

But when legislators and the governor attempted to raise in-state tuition at the State University of New York system, student protest helped kill the proposal.

"The students made their unhappiness clearly known," says Dick Gillman of SUNY Affairs and Development. "We have a pretty strong student body. They went directly to the legislators. Tuition stayed where it was, which pleased us very much."

At least one school managed to roll back tuition this year.

First-through-third-year students at George Washington's med school will pay 1.3 percent less — or $250 — than last year. Fourth-year students get a $100 tuition decrease, from $17,000 to $16,900 a year.

Even those tiny rollbacks, however, are rare nationwide as many schools impose double-digit increases again this fall.

Penn State's increase, for example, is 10.8 percent for 1984-85. An administrative study shows costs at Penn have increased 170 percent since 1972.

"We have looked at every available avenue for breaking the 16-year cycle of tuition increases," university President Bryce Jordan said this summer. "Unfortunately, this year's budget reflects the cumulative effects of past underfunding."

Oklahoma students face 10 percent in-state and 15 percent out-of-state increases this year because of legislative cuts in education funding.

Private colleges and universities are averaging tuition increases of approximately 7.5 percent in 1984-85, the College Board says.

Stanford raised tuition 7.5 percent, considerably below its 10.7 percent average yearly increase since 1971. But in the past decade, the school has risen from eighth to sixth place in tuition costs among comparable institutions.

Cornell and Dartmouth students will pay 7.9 percent more this year. Administrators blame higher energy and maintenance costs and diminishing federal college aid funds for the jump.

University of Miami student leaders blame administrative "mismanagement" for a 7.5 percent cost hike there.

HAPPENINGS

Heralded Psychologist To Give Lecture

Kenneth B. Clark, educator, psychologist, and civil rights leader, will give this year's first Simkins Lecture at Longwood College.

The lecture, entitled "Social Science and Social Morality," is scheduled for Wednesday, September 26, at 7:30 p.m. in Jarman Auditorium.

Clark is both scholar and activist. He is Distinguished Professor of Psychology Emeritus of the City College, City University of New York, and a past president of the American Psychological Association. He presently serves on the board of trustees of Howard University, the University of Chicago, and the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

He is a leader of social justice and equal educational opportunity. The 1954 Supreme Court decision against segregated schools was based largely on his 1950 study showing that segregation causes psychological damage in children.

Commenting upon the decision in 1964, Clark noted, "The Court saw the issue clearly and in the same human terms in which (blacks) had felt it. A racist system inevitably destroys and damages human beings; it brutalizes and dehumanizes them, blacks and whites alike."

He is the author of several books, including the prize-winning Dark Ghetto, Prejudice and Your Child, and Pathos of Power. He is co-editor with Talcott Parson of The Negro American.

With his wife, Mamie Phipps Clark, he founded the Northside Center for Child Development for the treatment of children with personality and learning problems. He is now president of Clark, Phipps, Clark & Harris, a firm which provides consultation on personnel matters with particular emphasis on human relations.

Dr. Clark is the recipient of numerous honors, including the College Board's Medal for Distinguished Service to Education, given to persons who "have provided national leadership and service in the advancement of educational opportunity."

Born in the Canal Zone,

Panama, Dr. Clark was educated in the public schools of Harlem and at Howard University. He received the Ph.D. in psychology from Columbia University.

The Francis Butler Simkins Lecture Series honors the memory of an eminent scholar and writer at Longwood. Dr. Simkins came to the college in 1928 after receiving his Ph.D. in history from Columbia University. With the exception of periods he spent as a visiting professor at Louisiana State University and at Princeton, Dr. Simkins remained a member of the Longwood faculty until his death in 1966.

New "Solomon Ammendment" Increases Pressure To Register

WASHINGTON, DC (CPS) — Rep. Gerald Solomon, author of the law that denies federal aid to students who refuse to register for the draft, says he may soon introduce a new law to apply even more pressure on students to sign up with Selective Service.

The measure aims to punish schools that set up special funds to support students who lose federal aid because they refuse to register with Selective Service.

"My impression is Congressman Solomon would be encouraging schools' attention to concurment with the Solomon amendment, which is the intent of Congress and the U.S. law," says Jeff Gleason, a Solomon aide.

There is no evidence any schools have actually set up student support funds, but Gleason claims "some have said that's what they intend to do."

Harvard, Northwestern, Swarthmore and Yale universities did announce plans to give private aid to students who can't get federal aid, regardless of the reason. "It's ridiculous," said one frustrated male Longwood College student. "The Solomon amendment is unjust and unfair. Further legislation such as the proposal currently being discussed will only serve to perpetuate the D.C. as senility which we are forced to work with now. We are being punished for our personal principles. Is that fair?"

Solomon's new amendment would cut off funds to medical, dental, allied and other health profession schools that help non-registrants. Those funds currently are awarded under Title VII of the Public Health Services Act.

Health educators, like aid administrators in 1982, are lobbying to alter the amendment before it reaches the House, claiming it's not the job of schools to force student compliance with Selective Service laws.

"We don't object to the underlying premise that students must register for the draft to get student aid, but it is quite another thing to expect the health professions schools to do the job of the Selective Service," said Marty Liggett of the American Association of Dental Schools (AADS) in an interview with Higher Education Daily.

The American Council on Education and the National Association of Land Grant Colleges have joined AADS to change the amendment while other education and professional groups are withholding official reaction.

Even though 98 percent of the eligible men have already complied with the draft laws, "It's a question of principle," insists Gleason of Solomon's office. "Even if a large portion of people are abiding by the law, you still want full compliance."

The illegal activity of a few students isn't fair to those who do register or to colleges and universities which abide by the law, he contends.

As written, the amendment denies grants and contracts to schools which refuse to comply, Gleason says, and will affect only those schools.

"Remember, he (Solomon) is not sure he'll even offer the amendment," he sadds. "He'll decide before the House session begins."

Artist-Of-The-Month Awards

Attention, all students enrolled in Art courses at Longwood, you are invited to submit work completed since August 24, 1984 for the "Artist of the Month" award.

The awards will be as follows:

1st prize, $50; 2nd prize, $10; 3rd prize, $5.00.

The instructions are as follows:

1. Bring work to the conference room of Bedford Building on September 24 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.
2. Each student may submit two entries each month.
3. All 2-D work should be properly presented with appropriate mats or frames. Put title and artist's name on back.
4. All 3-D work should be attractively presented and identified.
5. Pick up work after 1 p.m. on September 26.
6. Art instructors will be happy to answer additional questions.

Students Work In Europe Over Summer

Three Longwood College anthropology students pursued their studies, either formally or informally, in Europe this past summer.

Lydia Millar dug for artifacts in England. Jo Anne Akers studied French at a university in France. Shanna Eyer visited archeological sites in England and Spain. All three are senior anthropology majors.

"I think it's unusual that, in a department which had only 15 majors last year, three of them were involved in some form of anthropological fieldwork in Europe over the summer," said Dr. James Jordan, associate professor of anthropology.

Millar, of Midlothian, was one of eight American college students who participated in an archeology program offered by Westminster College, which is located near Oxford, England. The program, titled "The Archeology of Prehistoric England," lasted nearly the entire month of June.

Akers, from Richmond, took part in a French language and culture class presented by the University of Toulouse. Six Longwood students and 16 from Kennesaw College in Marietta, Georgia, were enrolled in the class, which ran from June 20 to July 4. She is currently working on a project related to her experiences in France which she will present to two anthropology classes.

Eyer, of Fairfax, first went to England to see her family — her father, a Navy captain, is stationed in Northwood, England — and then to Spain. Her travels included Majorca, a spanish island in the Mediterranean. Earlier in the summer, she had participated in the first session of the Summer Field School in Archeology.

Participants in Millar's program had to take part in a five-day "dig" in the nearby town of Radley, date every building in the town of Wootton Rivers, and write a paper about their experiences.

"The dig site was used during four periods: the Neolithic, Bronze, Roman and Saxon periods," she said. "Twenty-three burials and cremations were found there by a team of professional archeologists who were acting as teachers. Those bodies were all from the Roman Period. The site we worked on was a Bronze Period burial monument, which the Saxons later used as a garbage dump. We found a lot of pottery, animal bones, a carved bone-comb, and an antler that had been used for a pick."

In Wooten Rivers, another nearby town, the students had to date a total of 29 buildings. "Some of the buildings were from the 10th century," said Millar, "and they came all the way up to the present. Some of them incorporated elements of architecture from different periods, so that made it difficult."

After the program ended in late June, Millar traveled to Irvine, Scotland, to stay with relatives for a week. Her father, Dr. Jack Millar, professor of history at Longwood, is a native of Scotland. Millar stayed with a great-uncle, and also went to Troon, on the west coast of Scotland. It was not her first trip to the British Isles; she once lived in England for two years while her father worked on his doctorate.

Akers, a French minor, had planned to visit rockshelter and cave sites in southern France, but was unable to do so because her time was limited. Consequently, she is working on a linguistics project for which she will earn anthropology credits.

"She will draw on her experiences in France to show how the French language reflects French culture," Dr. Jordan said. "She will focus on one aspect of the language. She is doing research right now, and eventually will give an hour and 15-minute presentation to two classes of mine."

Asked to compare young adults in France and the U.S., Akers said that the French people she met were "less modest" (topless swimmers are common and many change clothes on the beach or by the pool), they are adept at speaking foreign languages, and are familiar with both American and French politics.

Eyer, who is minoring in sociology, history, and dance, has traveled extensively abroad. This summer, she viewed the Mary Rose, one of King Henry VIII's ships that was sunk in a storm off the coast of England. "It was raised a few years ago and is in the process of being reconstructed," she said.

She has been to archeological sites in Greece (such as the one at Malia, an island of Crete) and Italy, has visited archeological museums (for example, one in Heraklion, Greece), and has seen the world-famous Elgin marbles in England. The Elgin marbles were originally part of the Parthenon and other Greek sculptures, but in the 1820s Lord Elgin, a British nobleman, had them brought to the British Museum. Considered priceless, they remain a source of embarrassment to British officials.

During the past four summers, Eyer has traveled to Italy, Holland, France and Germany, in addition to England and Spain. Last summer she visited Stonehenge and several other prehistoric Megalithic sites in England, collecting slides for the department of Sociology and Anthropology.

Although all three students enjoyed themselves overseas, they were happy to return to the United States.

"I was so glad to get back here," said Millar. "Why? I just missed the American way of life. I almost kissed the runway at Byrd Airport when I got in."

Eyer agreed. "After you travel abroad, you really do appreciate this country," she said.

Finnish Professor Teaching At Longwood

Ilkka Keskinen hopes that the rest of his stay in the United States is better than the first week.

Keskinen, a Finnish professor who is teaching at Longwood College this semester, arrived in the U.S. on Aug. 14 with his wife and 19-month-old daughter.

"The start was not so easy," he recalled with a laugh. "Only four or five days after we got here, my daughter came down with chicken pox. She probably caught it in Finland, since it takes about a week to catch. But she is better now."

Keskinen, who teaches swimming snd strength training at Jyvaskyla University, is here under a partnership between Longwood and his university. Last fall Longwood received a $50,000 partnership grant from the U.S. Information Agency to develop "linkages" over a three-year period.

Jyvaskyla, which has 6,000 students, is the only university in Finland that offers degrees in physical education and related fields.

Keskinen is teaching five swimming courses in the department of Health, Physical Education and Recreation. Although this is his first trip to the U.S., he did not experience "culture shock."

"Nothing has shocked or surprised me," he said of his new surroundings. "Finland has a lot of news from your country. We watch American television shows and American news programs.

Among the TV programs broadcast in Finland are Dallas, Dynasty, Hill Street Blues, Fame, Happy Days, and All in the Family, as well as Disney and Charlie Brown specials. They are shown in English, with Finnish subtitles at the bottom of the screen, he said.

Keskinen, 32, is originally from Saarijarvi, 40 miles north of Jyvaskyla. He has a bachelor's degree and master's degree from Jyvaskyla University, and has taught there two years. He is fluent in English, and also understands German and Swedish.

Finns are a sports-loving, physically active people, according to Keskinen, who played on his high school volleyball team and bicycles two miles to work in Finland. Cross-country skiing and jogging are the most popular sports. "We also jog in the wintertime. We don't mind the cold weather," he said. Ice hockey, volleyball, and a slightly different form of baseball also are popular.

Finland has very few outdoor pools because the water is so cold, but there are many indoor pools, said Keskinen. His university has three pools, including a 50-meter pool, in one building. Most pools are owned by cities and towns, which charge a small user fee.

"It costs about one dollar to swim for an hour and a half. It's only 50 cents to swim from 6 to 8 o'clock each morning, so a lot of people go swimming before work."

In addition to being noted for its frigid climate and long periods of darkness, Finland is famous for its lakes. There are about 60,000 lakes, Keskinen said, and they are widely used for rowing and fishing.

Judicial Board Elections:

Why Should You Care?

By RANDY CHITTUM,
President, Government
Dean of Students

"Do you mean to tell me that there is yet another election coming up?! I thought the Student Government Association just finished with elections, what's going on?"

You're right, the Student Government Association (SGA), just completed the elections for class offices and the Honor Board. And while there is no question that these positions are very important to student life at Longwood, the Student Judicial Board elections represent another opportunity to become involved on the campus and are equally important. In fact, to help students focus on the importance of the Student Judicial Board and because the elections take place in each residence hall, they are held separately from class and honor board elections. This year, they will be on Friday, September 28, during your residence hall desk hours.

"Big deal . . . why should this judicial thing be important to me?"

We're glad you asked. There are three main reasons: 1. The Student Judicial Board holds "hearings" to help resolve differences that occur between students, or conflicts that may arise between students and staff or faculty. In a way, they help to promote a safe and secure living and learning environment on campus.

"OK, so that's one reason, what's number two?"

Well, to be perfectly honest, we hope you will not only vote in the election but run as a candidate for your building as well.

"Ya' right, I've got all this homework from classes and you're asking me to take on something else . . . I'm trying to get an education, ya' know!"

That is exactly why we want you to run for a position on the board. You see, we know that "education" is not just something you get through your classes. Don's misunderstand us, classes are critically important but your "classroom" can be more than just a room in an academic building. Other students who have been on the J-Board have told us they learned a lot!

"Are you telling me that I could put this on my resume and it might even help me get a job or get into graduate school?!"

Without a doubt, in fact, many employers look for experiences in addition to classes that show "other abilities" an applicant brings to a job. Things like what kind of a "person" will this candidate be, will he-she be able to "get along" with others, can he-she be a problem-solver instead of a problem-creator. And yes, a majority of graduate schools look for other experiences than just class work.

"OK, you got me this far, what is the last reason . . . and make it quick 'cause I gotta' class in five minutes."

You got it . . . the last one is the fact that the Student J-Board protects student interests. That is, the student members make certain that those who come before the board receive a fair and impartial hearing. After all, if you had to appear before the board, wouldn't you want to know that there are folks who understood what it was like to be a student and treated you fairly?

"Ya, I guess you're right . . . well, I'll think about it. What do I need to do if I want to run?"

First, pick up an application at your reception hall desk and fill it out. They'll be available this week. Off-campus students can pick them up in the off-campus student lounge at Lankford. Return it as soon as possible but no later than September 28. Your application will be posted for other students to see so they can decide who they want to vote for. And don't forget to vote! Ballots can be filled out at the reception desk of your hall on Friday, Sept. 28th, or in the Lankford Union reception office for off-campus students.

Lady Lancers Rewrite Record Book

Longwood's women's golf team turned in perhaps its finest weekend of golf ever in the eighth Longwood Invitational Tournament Friday through Sunday, but it wasn't enough to top Division I power Wake Forest which won the tourney by 14 strokes.

Led by senior Lanie Gerken and freshman Tina Barrett, Longwood put together rounds of 304-307-317 for a school record 928 total for 54 holes. Wake Forest was even better with 299-305-310 for a tournament record-tying 914 count at Longwood Golf Course.

In one tournament performance Longwood rewrote its own record book. The Lady Lancers set new standards for 54 hole score (928, old mark 933) for 18-hole score (304, old mark 306) and turned in their best finish in the invitational since they won the first event in 1977.

While Helen Wadsworth of Wake Forest won the individual title with a 72-77-71-220 (a tournament record), Gerken broke the Longwood record for individual 54-hole score with a 74-74-74-222 to finish at even par. All-American Robin Andrews held the former record, an 80-75-74-229 set at the Invitational in 1980. Gerken's second place finish was the best by a Lady Lancer golfer since 1977 when Kay Smith won the title.

Making Longwood's performance even more amazing was the presence of three freshmen and a sophomore in the top five. Barrett notched third place in the field of 65 golfers with a 72-76-78-226 which also broke Longwood's old record for 54 holes.

Hockey Team 3-1

Longwood's field hockey team, which won three of its first four games last week, will prepare to host the fifth Longwood Invitational Tournament Friday-Saturday after playing at the University of Richmond Tuesday at 3:00.

Longwood will take a 3-1 mark into Tuesday's game with the Division I Spiders and will welcome Davidson, Mount St. Mary's and High Point for the LC Invitational. The tournament, a round robin affair, was won by Pfeiffer last season while the Lady Lancers came in second.

The tournament schedule is as follows: FRIDAY — 1:00 Davidson vs. High Point; 3:00 Longwood vs. Mount St. Mary's and 5:00 Longwood vs. High Point; SATURDAY — 9:00 Mount St. Mary's vs. Davidson; 11:00 Mount St. Mary's vs. High Point and 1:00 Longwood vs. Davidson.

Last week Longwood beat Randolph-Macon 2-1 Tuesday, lost to Eastern Mennonite 2-1 Wednesday, defeated Appalachian State 2-1 Friday and clipped High Point 2-1 Saturday morning.

Six different players scored for Longwood in the opening week of the season. In Tuesday's opening win freshman Claye Conkwright and senior Pam Esworth scored, Junior Sharon Bruce tallied Longwood's goal against EMC.

Friday at Appalachian junior Sue Groff and soph Cathi Treacy scored and Saturday Groff and senior Mary Garrison had goals.

Longwood was hampered by the absence of Groff in its first two games. Last year's leading scorer, Sue suffered an ankle sprain early last week, but returned to help in the wins over Appalachian and High Point. Freshman goalie Becky Hardin played well defensively.

Spikers Open Play

Under the direction of first-year coach Bonnie Lipscomb, the Longwood women's volleyball team opens its 1984 season Wednesday night at Greensboro College with games against Greensboro and North Carolina-Greensboro beginning at 6:00.

The Lady Lancer Spikers, 9-23 last season, will have their home opener Thursday night at 6:30 when Sweet Briar and Randolph-Macon Woman's College visit Lancer Hall. Saturday, Longwood plays at Eastern Mennonite with Radford.

Coach Lipscomb looks for improvement on last year's season. Five players return from last season including several starters. Returnees include Karen Moye and Brenda Bowman, who are two-year veterans on the Longwood squad.

Coming back with a year's experience are Dana Shockley, Holly Hearne and Jackie Smith.

Newcomers to the Lady Lancer squad are Mimi Dreher, Susan Mears and Bobbi Shuler.

Lipscomb is a 1984 graduate of Longwood and was a four-year standout on the volleyball team. She has been pleased with the efforts of her team in preseason practice and scimmages.

"Our combination of returning veterans and newcomers has worked well together," said the coach. "We have a very tough schedule this year. We will know a lot more about our potential after the first game.

Kersey Looking Up In Pros

Jerome Kersey, Longwood's top all-time basketball player, is one of five rookies on the Portland Trailblazers 16-man preseason roster. Kersey will sign a contract with Portland this week, according to Blazers' general manager Stu Inman.

Kersey flew to Portland Sunday to begin a two-week session of special practice for the team's five rookie hopefuls. The other rookies are Sam Bowie of Kentucky, Bernard Thompson (Fresno State), Steve Colter (New Mexico State) and Victor Fleming (Xavier).

"Jerome is coming to fall camp and it appears he will sign a contract sometime in the next week or so," said Inman. "He is a kid with, in our judgement, enough talent to play in the NBA, but he may not be sophisticated enough right now.

"He has an honest chance to make the team. The question is can he come back to Portland and improve in the areas Coach (Jack)Ramsey and Rick) Adleman want. There is a time factor involved. Is he ready now? I think he knows it's going to be tough."

Inman says that Kersey will be with Portland through at least part of the exhibition season which begins October 7. The NBA regular season kicks off October 27.

Inman calls the 6-7, 220 pounder a "tweener". "Kersey is a big jumper and rebounder, but I feel his position is small forward. He has a tendency to play out of control at times."

Should Kersey fail to make the Portland roster, Inman says he would get close attention from NBA teams if he plays in the Continental Basketball Association. "Jerome played well and got a lot of exposure on our summer league team in San Diego."

Kersey scored 1,756 points and pulled down 1,162 rebounds in his four-year career at Longwood. A native of Clarksville, Virginia, he was a first team All-American in 1983-84. Portland picked him in the second round of the NBA draft in June. He was the second player from a Virginia college to be drafted.

Baseball Team Sweeps W&M

Longwood's baseball team got great pitching from sophomores Tony Browning and Sam Hart Sunday afternoon and swept a doubleheader from homestanding William & Mary. The Lancers took the first game 5-2 and won the second 4-0 in fall scrimmage action.

Browning hurled a four-hitter in the opener and got support from Mike Haskins and Kelvin Davis with two hits apiece and from Jeff Rohm with a triple. In the second game, Hart pitched a four-hit shutout while Mark Walsh went 3-3, John White had a triple and Tom Klatt a double.

Longwood, now 5-1 in fall scrimmages, hosts Richmond for a twin bill Saturday afternoon at 1:00 in games this week. William & Mary's scheduled visit to Farmville Sunday has been canceled.

IAA UPDATE

Longwood College intramurals finished a busy week on Saturday with the completion of this year's first weekend tournament. The round robin, coed softball tournament, which consisted of six games and featured four teams known as "No Respect," "The Invaders," "The Heartbreakers," and "The Wanted." "No Respect" ended as the tournament winners with a 3-0 record. Players on the winning team were Mike Harris, Tony Crute (co-captains), Pam Henson, Doug Glasco, Sarita Thurman, Dave Johnson, Jeanette Schoder, Jim Steve, Donna Goforth, Kelly Sickler and Ruth Mothorpe.

Women's team bowling should finish their tournament this week with the winners bracket now holding at 4 teams consisting of: "The Cruisers," "The Wheeler Dealers," "The Top Ten" and the "Curry Crew."

Men's football should also continue through the week.

Monday brought the onset of 3-man-women basketball. There are 9 men's teams competing in a double-elimination tournament and 5 women's teams playing in a round robin bout.

Entry blanks for men's bowling are due at the captains' meeting Wednesday at 6:30. Likewise, the entry blanks for the partners golf tournament that is to be held on Sunday, Sept. 23, are due on Thursday.

IAA would like to remind everyone that the bimonthly IAA meeting will be held on Thursday, Sept. 20, and that one representative from each sorority, fraternity, and residence hall are please asked to attend.

Lancers Take UMBC Tourney

Commentary By Mark Holland

HULLAND

The Longwood Lancers invaded Maryland this weekend and made short order of defeating Coppin State and the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, en route to winning the UMBC Soccer Invitational for the second year in a row. In a tournament marked by cold weather and gusty winds, the Lancers outscored the opposition 10-0 in running up their season record to 4-1.

Following their opening game drubbing of Coppin State 5-0, the Lancers played UMBC for the championship. The day and the Lancers started off the same, pretty cold. But after a while the sun came out, and things started to warm up. John Kennen was shining fairly bright down on the field and he started to heat things up with his first of four goals.

The Retrievers of UMBC began the game showing a better ability to effectively penetrate the Longwood defensive side of the field then had Longwood's previous opponents. The Retrievers were able to keep the ball on the defensive side and keep Longwood out of its' attack half. On one of Longwood's few penetrations of the opening minutes, Kennen took a Scott Thoden throw-in on his chest, turned it around his man, and put it cleanly in the back of the net.

It was not until late in the first half that the Lancers were able to increase their lead. Kennen received a nice pass in the middle from Mahfoud Kyoud and punched it past the goalie from the right to up the score to 2-0. Scarcely two minutes later it was Kennen again, this time from the left side shooting left footed to get his first half hat-trick.

Coming out after half-time the Lancers started to work the ball more on the attack half of the field. Finishing the game with 32 shots on goal, the Lancers kept a seemingly constant barrage of shots up during the second half. Kyoud and Tim Ford held down the center dishing off to Kennen and Mark McArdle on the right or to Clay Mullican and Mark Kremmen on the left. The right side and John Kennen provided the next score as well with Kennen dribbling past the fullbacks and shooting over the lunging goalie for his eighth goal of the year making it 4-0.

JOHN KENNEN

Senior Tri-captain Darryl Case made the next score happen, driving down the left side of the field. Case got off a powerful shot on goal that the goalie could not control. The ever present Jim DiModica alertly got to the rebounding shot and scored from the right for his second goal of the year.

Head Coach Rich Posipanko used the final half of the last period to give his bench game experience and improve his depth. Freshmen Paul Dzierski, Jeff Robinson, Ricky Arnold and Mike Harris all played strong heads up ball. Posipanko has proven depth in sophomores John Anderson, Craig Reid, and Scott Gittman which he utilized realizing that he gave up nothing on the field.

The opening game against Coppin State was another shoot out. The Lancers took 33 shots-on-goal compared to only five by the Eagles. The Eagles shots-on-goal figure is a direct reflection of the tenacity of the Longwood defense. Erick Karn, Scott Thoden and Dan Bubnis sealed off the goal area and the Coppin State attackers were locked out. The Longwood attack men, playing into a head wind, were cutting the defense to shreds. Tim Ford got Longwood on the scoreboard first with his initial blast. The Lancers, playing some of their best ball of the year kept the ball down in Coppin State's defense.

The Lancers increased their lead to 2-0 when Ford passed off to Kennen at the top of the goal area and Kennen put it neatly in the net. With the first half coming to a close McArdle made a spectacular shot off of a real tricky bounce when goalie Chuks Nyaneria of Nigeria missed a catch. Things only got worse for Nyaneria, Kyoud sent Case an arcing pass that the All-American headed in for the fourth score of the game. In second half action, Kyoud sent a corner kick, with the wind behind it, curling and arcing and finally falling into the goal for the final score.

Censorship sparks dispute

"Obscenities" in question

by John D. Brown and Joe Johnson

"It's hell out there," wrote Jeff Abernathy, Rotunda editor, in last week's deleted editorial. "It's goddamned loony bin, machine-gun hell out there"—and it certainly has been.

The Farmville Herald has been printing The Rotunda for some fifty years, and last Monday, September 17, that contract was terminated. Bill Wall, the General Manager of the Herald refused to print an editorial unless Abernathy deleted words that Wall called "foulmouthed" and "obscene." Abernathy would not change the editorial, but chose instead to write another editorial accusing Wall of censorship.

Wall responded to Abernathy's charge of censorship with a letter: "I do not think you would be satisfied to continue dealing with a printer that you think imposes 'censorship,' and I assure you that I am not interested in printing an obscene publication. Therefore it is in the interest of both parties if you will find another printer." (Wall's letter appears in its entirety on page 2, as a "Letter to the Editor.")

In the original editorial, Abernathy eommented on fraternity and sorority membership drives, and used various interjections to strengthen his point.

Wall told the Roanoke Times and World News that had there been fewer "obscenities" he would have given Abernathy "poetic license." It wouldn't seem that a tongue-in-cheek editorial would warrant this much controversy, but censorship is an attack of First Amendment rights. The charges of censorship did not fail to gain the attention of other reporters, with articles on the controversy appearing in several major Virginia newspapers.

Wall rejects the charge of censorship and cited the terms of the Farmville Herald's printing contract that allow the Herald to refuse printing those materials they consider to be "obscene, immoral or illegal," a document never signed by any current Rotunda staff member. As editor of The Rotunda, however, Abernathy bears full responsibility for whatever is printed. "The sole job of the Herald is to print our newspaper and the only debt The Rotunda owes to the Herald is to pay them for that service. The printer is neither an editor nor a publisher, and I refuse to let them act in either capacity. Because the Herald chose to censor our material, we were more than happy to terminate the relationship."

While Abernathy concedes that the partial elimination of the words which Wall objected to would not have been detrimental to the point of his editorial, he feels that the freedom of expression is seriously jeopardized by the threat of censorship. "I didn't really care about the words, it's the principle. We can't and won't be censored by anyone."

by Frank Raio

Edythe Harrison, the democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate, addressed a local democratic group Friday evening in the lower dining hall. Harrison called the Prince Edward County "Get Out the Vote" dinner, "one of the largest attendances that I have seen at any democratic affair this year." In speaking to the group which included many local party bigwigs, the nominee attacked her opponent, Republican incumbent Senator John Warner.

"When I debated Senator Warner, I beat him. I beat him on the issues, and I began the job of unmasking him...Unmasking what he has undone during the past six years," Harrison said. In addition, Harrison voiced concern over Warner's support of the 10% across-the-board budget cuts and Warner's giving "blank checks" to the MX missile and B-1 bomber. "'My opponent votes against what gives us combat readiness" Mrs. Harrison stressed.

In assessing her chances for victory, Harrison said, "I'm going to win because I'm winning on the issues, because I'm unafraid to speak out, because I'm independent. And I believe that the people in this state want and deserve a Senator that is independent...The people of Virginia do not deserve a rubber stamp.

"I know I'm the underdog. You know what? I like being the underdog. Who did you like better, David or Goliath?

Harrison moved to Virginia in 1955 at the age of 21. She received her first taste of politics when she became part of the organization to reopen the schools that were closed to the uprorar over the Brown V. the Board of Education in 1954. Harrison is facing an uphill battle in challenging Republican incumbent Senator John Warner. There is no doubt about whether Harrison has the support of the internal democratic party structure of Virginia. The nomination was offered to Harrison after several male democrats declined the suggestion from Governor Robb that they run. Harrison would be the first female senatorial candidate to win in a southern state. One Richmond newspaper dubbed Mrs. Harrison "The democratic nominette." If Edythe Harrison can transform energy and style into grassroot votes, she will give Senator Warner a run for his money.

Mrs. Harrison granted The Rotunda an interview after her speech.

ROTUNDA: Jesse Jackson's Presidential Campaign made great gains in registering minority voters, particularly in Virginia. What steps are being taken to bring the minority vote into your corner?

HARRISON: The issues. I will tell them the issues and tell how my opponent has treated them in the past.

ROTUNDA: On what issues do you and Senator Warner stand the farthest apart? What are your major problems with Warner?

HARRISON: He is not an independent, he is a rubber stamp of the (current) administration.

ROTUNDA: Where do you and Walter Mondale stand farthest apart?

HARRISON: I am not for tax increases. I believe in going through that budget and reducing spending, as a first step before I would put in tax increases. And I believe in tax reform.

ROTUNDA: Do you feel that Walter Mondale has made sufficient concessions to the "Rainbow coalition" to bring them back to the voting booths in November?

HARRISON: I do not know what he has done. I do not know. (Pause) I mean I really do not know.

Edythe Harrison: "I like being the underdog."

ROTUNDA: In your speech you used the example of the $4,000 coffee pot to show defense contract overcharging. And this week the Government Accounting Office issued a report warning of "unreliability and unservicability" of several of the U.S. missile systems. What fresh ideas will you bring to the Senate to fight these problems?

HARRISON: By saying No. You see President Eisenhower warned us about the military-industrial complex. With the tremendous amount of dollars that the (defense contractors) put into political campaigns. If you look at my opponent's federal election committee report, all of those companies, their PACs in (the defense) sector of society are supporting this heavily. The marriage between the military and the military-industrial complex just continues to escalate and nobody is watching the shop. And these contracts are awarded to one company to do development. And then they have the contract to produce it. And to insure that

Editor's Note:

The following editorial was to have been run on Tuesday, September 18. Due to opposing definitions of the terms 'obscene' and 'censorship' the Farmville Herald refused to run the editorial. We bring this rather un-magnanimous yet pointed piece of writing to you now.

It's hell out there. I'm telling you it is goddamned, loony-bin, machine gun hell out there. It's the last crazy week before rush, and the Greek salesmen are popping up like spring rabbits. They're behind bushes, under tables, they're everywhere. And they're out to get everyone of you independents. Steer clear, I am telling you. Steer clear for just one week. Because, if you let'm shake your hand, stare you in the eye and say "I'd like you to join Beta Sigma fraternity (or sorority—it works both ways)," then you're a lost hope for us independents.

Sure as you're born, they'll be patting you on the back, shaking your hand, giving you all kinds of groovy drugs—and you'll snap. Before you know it you'll be signing on the dotted line and drafting the check for a hundred bucks to Beta Sigma and then they've got you.

No more pansy salesperson bullshit—you are no longer a prospective, you're a PLEDGE! Aaaaahhhshit—visions of toothbrush scrubbings on the bathroom floor—running naked, cold and hungry down Main Street—stealing hub caps from the Sheriff's Vista Cruiser—collecting odd items from stranger's dresser drawers...

Forget all of the fun you had back when all the sisters and brothers of Beta Sigma knew your potential cash value. No more taking you out for a few icy cold beers—no more of that bogus. That was all over when you signed the check, didn't you know? Oh, suuure, just as soon as we've made you feel like a low caste piece of cow manure for a few months, we'll be the best of friends. Just pay your dues next semester.

Independents; stay away from these loonies for another week...what's a week? If they're your friends now, then they'll surely be your friends after rush is over. And you'll be a hundred bucks richer and probably somewhat less hungover. And—hey—if you really need a few letters on a freaking pink sweatshirt, how about the ones that stand for GOD DAMNED INDEPENDENT?

MJA

Your Turn

Rotunda is "obscene"

To the Editor:

I regret that it was necessary for me to disagree with you, the editor of The Rotunda, on Monday, September 17, concerning the publication of an "editorial".

The "editorial" contained a repetitious number of the same four letter work that had absolutely nothing to do with the thoughts expressed. There was no attempt on my part to change the thoughts of the editorial. I assure you that even though I may disagree with you, I will uphold your right to free speech.

Following a similar incident two years ago, I sent The Rotunda a copy of the standard terms and conditions under which we operate. Item No. 25 states: "Should any materials furnished to Printer for productions be considered obscene, immoral or illegal, in its sole discretion, Printer reserves the right to return those materials to customer and stop all production on any job."

On Monday, September 17, I informed you that I, the printer, considered the words you used to be "obscene". I also informed you that if you eliminated or altered these obscene words we would proceed with the production of The Rotunda. Instead of accepting my advice you chose to accuse me of "censorship".

Under the circumstances I do not think you would be satisfied to continue dealing with a printer that you think imposes "censorship", and I assure you that I am not interested in printing an obscene publication. Therefore, it is in the best interest of both parties if you will find another printer.

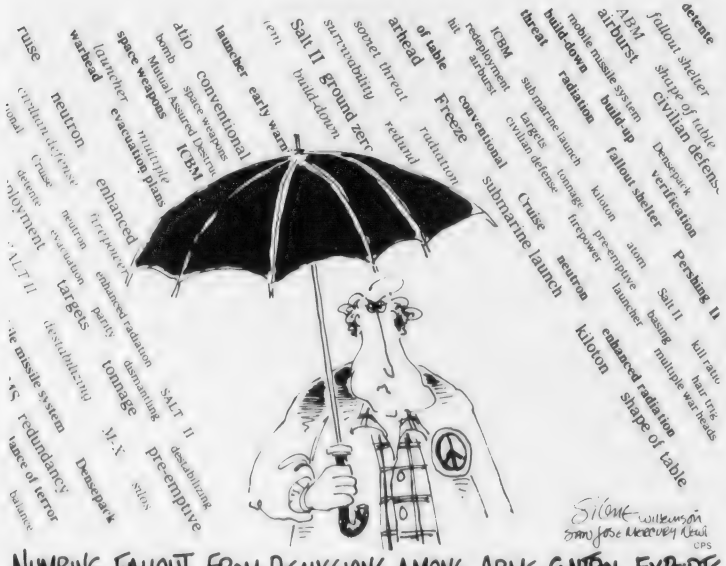
Ra-Ra's not elitist!



To the Editor:

As I read the interview with Horace Scruggs in the September 18th issue of The Rotunda, I became very angry wit the frequent and derogatory use of the word "ra-ra." Although I respect Mr. Scruggs and his decision to turn down the position of Geistmeister, I do not feel that he has the right to ciritiicize the members of Geist and all of the other school spirited people.

Admittedly, there are more important issues in the world than Longwood's traditions and Oktoberfest Weekend. I personally, however, feel that I cannot as an individual put an end to nuclear proliferation, stop prejudice, and make the world safe for democracy. I do feel that by being a responsible student, working with various clubs and organziations, and taking part in some of Longwood's traditions that I can make a difference here. And isn't that what Geist is all about—people working together to make the Longwood College experience just a little more exciting and meaningful?

Furthermore, it is unfair to stereotype all ra-ra's as elitist individuals who don't think about the world around them. Many people use campus involvement as a means of learning how to work within the system to change things and influence people. Thus, I urge you to consider a point of view other than that of Horace Scsruggs, because not giving people credit as individuals is the sign of a closed mind; and to quote last week's Rotunda editorial, "In this world, there is no room for a closed mind."

NUMBING FALLOUT FROM DISCUSSIONS AMONG ARMS CONTROL EXPERTS.

Four years later

Professors still wary of "Supply-Side"

by Susan Skorupa

(CPS)—Though starting their fourth school year since the advent of "Reaganomics," college economics departments still aren't taking supply-side economics very seriously.

"Supply side is a political issue," claims Professor Phillip Cagan, head of Columbia University's economics department.

Cagan, like many of the professors interviewed for this article, believes, "It will be gone in a few years."

But some supply-side proponents, notably former Southern Cal professor Arthur Laffer, contend the theory is in fact making headway in college classrooms.

"It's being taught everywhere," Laffer says, "and has become the basic precept of the (economics) professional journals."

Laffer was one of the first advocates of supply-side theory, which forecasts that tax cuts—not the "pump priming" of Keynesian economics—would best stimulate the economy.

Laffer's ideas attracted a small coterie of followers, including a Wall Street Journal editorialist named Jude Wanniski. Wanniski's writings eventually attracted converts like Ronald Reagan, Sen. William Roth and Rep. Jack Kemp.

All, of course, eventually helped mold America's current supply-side economic policy. Despite evidence the policy has helped generate record levels of economic growth, many campus econ departments haven't adjusted their courses.

"Professors have the luxury of being able to teach obsolete theories longer than government and business can adhere to them at the risk of losing money," Waniskfi scoffs.

The reason it's not taught is that it's not a very good theory, others counter.

The recent economic recovery is explained better by traditional economic theory than by supply-side theory, says Professor Michael Veseth, an economist at the University of Puget Sound in Tacoma, WA.

"The big spending cuts, world recession and large structural deficits that caused the recovery have more to do with old-fashioned Keynesian pump-priming than with supply-side side economics," he insists.

Keynesian theory, hatched by Britist economist John Maynard Keynes, has been the basis of American economic policy since the 1930s, when President Franklin Roosevelt employed it to try to spark a recovery from the Great Depression.

Keynes' then-radical advice was to let the government go into debt in order to get money to inject into the economy, thus stimulating consumer demand. With consumer demand up, business would begin producing goods and services again to meet the demand.

When demand and government spending sparked inflation, Keynes advised the government to reduce spending.

Until then, most school taught "classical economics," which stressed individual choicemaking in a society tending toward full employment, explains John Sumansky of the Joint Council on Economic Education.

"Studies of the overall economy and Keynesian theory eventually didn't burst on the scene," Sumansky says. "They were forced on us by the Great Depression and attempts to end it."

Years after the theory became government practice, college economics departments began teaching it. Since the publication of Prof. Paul Samuelson's landmark Keynesian textbook in the late forties, Keynesian economics has been the standard emphasis in most departments.

"Colleges are not teaching supply-side courses," asserts Vanderbilt economist Professor John Siegfried. "If it's taught it's taught as a part of another course. Strong supply-siders were talking about it in 1968, but if didn't have a label."

Siegfried attributes the increased interest to media hype, not academic study of the theory.

"It's a very important idea," he concedes. "But now there's a lot of attention in the popular press. The increase (in emphasis) is not in academic areas."

Wanniski attributes campuses' reluctance to teach supply-side theory on its own to simple stuffiness. Tenured economics professors have a vested career interest in defending "outdated" Keynesian theory.

Things will change as younger economists successfully use supply-side theory to predict the economy's performance, Wanniski predicts.

"Supply siders," for example, "are the only ones who predicted the current economic boom without inflation," he asserts.

"Eventually school recognize who's got the better track record," he says, "and switch to supply side."

Because nearly all of the nation's 65,000 economists are Keynesians, Wanniski thinks it may take a generation for college economics departments to begin emphasizing supply-side theory.

For the moment, Wanniski says he and his peers have to be content with making the theory the foundation of U.S. policy. "The major influence of supply side have been outside colleges, in the political arena."

Prize winning poet Gwendolyn Brooks to appear

Gwendolyn Brooks, Pulitzer Prize-winning poet, will give a reading at Longwood College on Monday evening, October 1, at 8 o'clock in the Gold Room of the Lankford Building.

Since the publication of her first volume of poetry, A Street in Bronzeville, in 1945, Ms. Brooks has been acclaimed as "a most extraordinary writer and woman."

Her second book of poems, Annie Allen, was published in 1950 and won her the Pulitzer Prize. She has received numerous other honors, including the Shelley Memorial Award from the Poetry Society of America and more than 40 honorary doctorates from colleges and universities across the country.

She is Poet Laureate of Illinois, her home state, and several schools and a cultural center there have been named for her.

Her poems are marked by direct, bold language that reveals the whole range of human emotions and social follies. She comments on the black experience in America with "brutal anger, wry satire, and visionary serenity."

Gwendolyn Brooks

Among her books of poetry are The Bean Eaters, In the Mecca, Family Pictures, and To Disembark. She also published a novel, Maud Martha, in 1953 and an autobiography, Report from Part One, in 1972.

Ms. Brooks has been described as a "superby reader of her own poetry and that of contemporaries." She has read, lectured, and conducted poetry seminars and workshops at colleges and universities throughout the country.

The public is cordially invited to attend Ms. Brooks' reading; there is no admission charge.

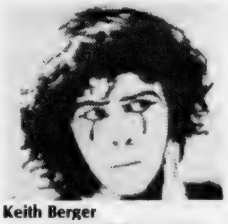
Rock/Mime shows reviewed



by Gary Rader

KEITH BERGER

When I was first assigned to cover a 'Mime' show, my first thought was 'dull'. Fortunately, my first impression was far from the truth. Keith Berger's show was very well done with just the right touch of humor thrown in. He opens the show by randomly picking a student and bringing her on stage for several minutes, going through several skits with her. It works perfectly. Berger successfully makes the audience feel as if they are part of the show, and in a sense, they are. On more than one occasion, students were picked to help with on stage skits.

Berger's performance of mime is nearly flawless. His several skits include a parody of westerns, "the box"—a man being incased by a shrinking, invisible box, and "the nightmare"—the intense re-enactment of a nightmare Keith went through.

Talking with him after the show, I found out that he is returning and would be interested in conducting a one-day Mime workshop. Hopefully, the audience will be bigger next time. Anyway, if thought a Mime show was dull—think again. You will be missing out on something special.

Barry Drake

by Jerry Dagenhart

BARRY DRAKE

On Monday, August 17, 1984 Barry Drake rolled back into Farmville, once again. He was enthused as he exclaimed, "I'm glad to be back in Farmville, the cultural center of Virginia, America and the world." He soothed his audience right away by letting them know there were worse places to be such as "Ferrum" where he had just left.

Drake's repertoire included many original pieces along with some old favorites. Perhaps the most memorable song of the evening was Randy Newman's "Ballad of Science" or "Let'd Drop the Big One Now." I have the feeling quite a few "true-Americans" were stirred by that particular song.

At any rate, Barry Drake will be returning January 20, 1985, to present his Electric History of Rock 'n Roll. If this show is anything like Monday nights, one would have to be insane to miss it.

Longwood RA's: predicaments of power?

by Dennis Carter, Tim Fitzgerald, and Lisa Jessup

"R.A.'s are upperclassmen who live in the residence halls. They are friendly and helpful and specially trained to help you with a variety of concerns in and out of the residence hall setting."
—The 1984 Longwood Student Handbook

Resident assistant—the name should indicate at least in part a function of their position; to assist the students living in Longwood Dorms; to ameliorate old feuds or break through strained roommate relations. The possibilities of such a name would seem to be endlessly positive for the student resident-assist-help-aide-but in reality that's not always the case.

"Too often they believe they are policemen instead of assistants" said Mark Holland, a sophomore at Longwood College. "They need to be trained in a different way, they should be trying to keep us out of trouble." Or as one Longwood College student put it, "R.A.'s aren't worth a damn."

The reason for the apparent animosity might have more to do with the regulations R.A.'s are required to enforce rather then the manner in which they enforce them; and the Resident Assistants are the first to notice this disparity. "I think the visitation rules are ridiculous." said Becky Etzler, R.A. on the second floor of Main Cunningham. "I'm not going to go up to two 21 year olds who are engaged and sleeping together and say, 'I'm sorry you have to leave.' If people are bright they will be discreet. You know it is happening. Every R.A. on campus knows it." Indeed, the majority of Resident Assistants will 'turn the other way,' when visitation rules are violated and would just as soon concentrate on what they consider to be their position's true calling which is counseling, "Everybody knows they can come and talk to us if they want to that is what we are here for. I prefer doing that to being a desciplinarian—I'm not here to entertain or babysit people," said Joyce Rollandini, an R.A. in Cox Residence Hall.

Eric Houseknecht also an R.A. in Cox, sees the R.A. as someone who intervenes during a crisis situation. "I really can not dictate how life on the hall should be—students decide that—the majority of students on second floor Cox apparently do not want a quiet floor that's their concern. I have been aware of visitation violations and have not written them up so long as it does not distrub or violate anyone else's rights. I see crisis intervention as the R.A.'s most definite function. This summer I was involved in a situation where a drunk student started picking fights and harassing other residents. Eventually a campus police officer became involved and the drunken individual punched her (the officer) in the face and broke her nose. I went over and helped to contain the guy."

There are other incidents where an R.A.'s presence has made a difference; last summer on top of one Residence Hall roof an R. A. talked to a student for a half an hour and eventually convinced him not to commit suicide. A year ago in the same hall another R.A. was confronted with a senior who had 'lost it'; who was 'kind of' drunk and had a 'lot of problems' and was in the process of tearing a rocking chair into splinters. "I got the other students away from him and called up people who might be able to help, and then I stayed with him and tried to keep him calm by talking to him. I was pretty nervous.

Of course most of an R.A.'s duty is not nearly so exciting—nor as easily appreciated. "People do not see the majority of the work we do: keeping up maintenance around the dorm halls, or writing up monthly prorams for the students" (programs ranging from educational activities to social activities for each hall.) "A lot of times just our presence has a good psychological effect on students—they know there is an authority figure nearby. It gives them a scapegoat—they can say to their friends, "Yeh, I'd like to do such and such but the R.A. might catch me."

But there are always the bad apples and most of the R.A.'s admit that for everyone of their group who takes their position seriously there are others who enjoy 'power tripping;' those who write up people just to be writing them up or who will use their position to become more visible on campus. Said one R.A.—"it is sort of a self promoting type of thing—it gives me the ability to meet people like Ms. Mable or Dr. Greenwood who have helped me with their recommendations. It's a great finge benefit of the job."

An like most human institutions, the R.A. job is by no means free of hypocrisy. One former R. A. admitted to violating visitation rules while writing up students for just such a violation. "Of course, I was never caught for it because we were mature and discreet," said the R.A. who preferred to remain anonymous. Mature and discreet seem to be the by-words that an R.A. will use to judge his or her fellow students' violations.

Fellow students who may well wonder if the expense of the R.A.s' salaries (free room and board) is worth the direct costs for the college and the indirect costs for themselves, a sum total of $109,275 this year along, to 'pay' the forty seven R.A.'s on campus. In addition there are the training expenses for the R.A.'s who are housed for 12 days prior to the beginning of fall semester and are required to spend anywhere from 2-4 days on campus after the end of a semester. Are they worth the expense? The vote among the R.A.'s at least, is split down the middle. "Without us Longwood would be a madhouse—totally chaotic" or "Longwood could pretty well fare for itself without the R.A.'s"

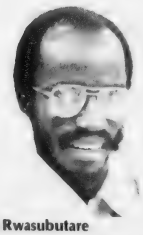
African professor teaching at LC

by Kent Booty

Jean Bosco Rwasubutare has done well for someone who was born in the countryside of Rwanda, one of Africa's poorest nations.

Rwasubutare is a Fulbright Scholar teaching at Longwood College this year. He is a professor at the National University of Rwanda, and has been a translator at international conferences in more than a half-dozen countries. He has traveled throught Africa, Europe, and the United States.



"I'm getting more out of life than I ever dreamed of," he said. Rwasubutare, 32, is a specialist in modern African literature and also has extensive knowledge of English and American literature. In Longwood's Department of English, Philosophy and Foreign Languages, he is teaching "A Survey of Modern African Literature."

He also is a skilled linguist. In addition to Kinyarwanda, his native tongue, Rwasubutare speaks French, English, Lingala and Swahili. Rwanda has two official languages: Kinyarwanda and French. "I speak English in the classroom, French around the campus, and Kinyarwanda in the marketplace."

Rwanda, a tiny mountain republic in east-central Africa, has been described as a "tropical Switzerland." Most of its 5.5 million people are farmers and many also raise livestock. The country, which had been part of a Belgian-administered U.N. trusteeship, became independent in 1962.

Rwasubutare, who had to leave his wife and four children behind, was surprised to be selected a Fulbright Scholar.

"The post was advertised in all of black Africa," he said. "I heard about it from the American Embassy in Rwanda. So I applied, but I didn't expect to be chosen. In fact, when I would go down to Kigali (the capital), I didn't even ask about it at the Embassy. It was a very big surprise."

Jean Rwasubutare

Rwasubutare's students in Rwanda are "immensely interested" in American and British literature, specially American literature. "They like 20th-century literature. They're extremely interested in novels, which are new to them. What fascinates them are the characters."

It is not hard, he said, for young Africans to relate to Western literary characters. "For 12 years, they have been learning about the Western World in elementary and secondary school. They have one foot in the Western World and the other in traditional Africa."

Elementary school in Rwanda is free and compulsory, and both secondary school and college are free to those who pass a difficult government exam, he said. As the number of people who atend school has increased, so has the country's literacy rate, but it's still low.

The National University of Rwanda, founded ifn 1963, has about 1,500 students. It offers degrees in fields in the humanities, the sciences, engineering, medicine, agronomy, and economics. Students can earn bachelor's or master's degrees, but they must study abroad to earn a doctorate. "College students pay nothing at all. The government pays for everything."

Rwasubutare has a bachelor's degree from the National University of Rwanda and a master's from the University of Ottawa. He has taught at the National University for eight years.

He is much in demand as a translator. Rwasubutare has translated at conferences in India, Kenya, Botswana, Tanzania, Burundi, Uganda, and Madagascar. Usually he translates from English to French, although sometimes he translates the other way. "Translators I talk to always say that translation into English was better than the translation into French."

"Translating is a matter of experience," he added. "The more conferences you attend, the more you can master the jargon. And it also depends on the subject matter. I feel more at ease if the subject, for example, is the humanities rather than a technical subject."

This is Rwasubutare's third trip to the U.S. In 1974, as a public relations officer for the Rwanda Board of Tourism, he visited several cities here, learning how to develop tourism. In 1979, he attended a traning program in applied linguists at the University of Pittsburgh.

Modern African literature has evolved through three periods, said Rwasubutare. "The early literature was characterized by revolt and protest against colonialism and assimilation and racism. The Europeans had perpetuated a myth of the African savage; they said we weren't capable of running our affairs."

"With the coming of independence in the early 1960s, African writers dealt with other themes. They wrote about such problems as the African states consolidating their unity, tribal strife, and military coups."

"The themes in the 1970s were more universal. They began to address the problems of the human predicament. The human condition, in general, is still the dominant theme today."

Sex on campus: confused, conservative

Aside from being generally in favor of it, what do college students think about sex? Two recent studies at Rutgers U. and the U. of Maryland indicate the dust has settled from the sexual revolution.

While student attitudes have become more liberal in many areas, such as homosexuality and abortion, other attitudes, like those toward monogamy and contraception, remain moderate to conservative. Sexual behavior among college students doesn't seem much different from that in the general population.

The Rutgers study, conducted by psychotherapist Pat Murphy and sociologist Ann Parelius, found that less than half the male population was sexually active, and only 70% reported have had intercourse within the last year. Fewer Rutgers women reported occasional intercouse (67%), but more (50%) described themselves as sexually active than did the males.

A large percentage of both groups said they were sexually monogamous (83% males; 90% females).

Fear of herpes and AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) has made 27% of the males and 29% of the females change their sexual practice. Still, medically diagnosed venereal disease appeared in 13% of the female population and 14% of the males. The Maryland study, which compared student attitudes in 1973 and 1983, found that awareness of where to go for information and abortion, has dropped from 91% ten years ago to 75% today.

At Rutgers only 35% of the sexually active students said they had an adequate contraceptive method that they always used. While most students said using contraception eased their minds, 35% of the males said they would be "disappointed" if their partner used a diaphragm, and 25% said they would be "turned off." Twenty-seven percent of the women showed a similar attitude, saying they would be turned off if their partner wore a condom. Interestingly, unwanted pregnancies were reported by both sexes in roughly the same percentages as venereal diseases.

The major findings at Maryland were that more students engage in premarital sex now than in 1973. Attitudes toward abortion have become more liberal, and fewer students feel homosexuals need psychological treatment. However, more students in 1983 said they would keep their homosexuality secret than in 1973.

The study also turned up an increasingly conservative attitude toward what's acceptable sexual behavior for women. The belief that women should have sex only with partners with whom they're involved emotionally has increased from 42% to 52% in ten years. Also, significantly more males than females felt that the availability of contraceptives on campus increased promiscuity.

A recent Johns Hopkins study of high school students showed the inconsistency of some of these attitudes isn't a product of college life: The high school students also have contradictory feelings toward sex. For example, 60% of the girls and 80% of the boys said they'd already lost their virginity. But 83% said that 18 would be the best age at which to begin having sexual relations. That, say the Hopkins researchers, means many of the young people who've started having sex wish they hadn't. One-quarter of the high schoolers said premarital sex is, simply, wrong.

Most high schoolers agreed that having sex without contraceptives is foolish, but one-quarter admitted doing so, in their most recent sexual contact.

Campus notes from around the country

- Students' names will no longer be passed along to appropriate campus religious groups at the U. of Wisconsin-Madison. Two local residents and a student obtained a restraining order forbidding the UW from passing along information on religious preference, which is voluntarily provided by students on their registration forms. The trio claims the practice violates separation of church and state. A hearing was to follow.
- Faculty evaluations should be open for public perusual, the U. of Texas-Austin Students' Association is claiming. Using a ruling by the state attorney general that such information isn't exempted from the Open Records Act, the SA asked the university to release all student responses to multiple choice questions on the regular Course-Instructor Survey. Faculty members themselves currently release about 25% of the answers for the student-funded course guide.
- Getting good grades can sometimes bring presents from Mom and Dad. But the Southern College of Seventh Day Adventists, will now give its own rewards for students who perform well—travel credit toward round-trip tickets to Europe. The credits are awarded on the basis of class standing and grade point average. They're offered under an agreement with KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, in hopes of boosting the college's declining enrollment.
- A change in university schedule was the prime concern of Virginia Tech students in the annual Student Government Association survey. Over 80% favored starting their quarter calendar earlier, or shifting to a semester system. The survey resulted in Tech's schedule beginning a week early this year.
- Students who are crowded three to a room in residence hall rooms designed for two people tend to think less of themselves as people. Aaron Wilson Hughey of Western Kentucky U. gave a self-perception test to one group of students living in normal conditions and second group living in overcrowded rooms. The latter group scored significantly lower in self-perception, perhaps as the result of loss of personal space, theorized Hughey, a WKU house director.
- Stanford U. law professor John Kaplan lost his libel suit against Newsweek On Campus for its article calling one of his courses a "gut" or easy course. A U.S. district court judge ruled the article consisted of student opinions and didn't deride his abilities as a teacher.

will continue to vote for that project even though it is unsound, because there are subcontractors in their states earning money off of it. It is very entrenched, Eisenhower warned about it in 1951.

ROTUNDA: But what can we do to prevent things like the "coffee pot" incidents?

HARRISON: By having someone like me who is not just a vote but a voice, (someone who will) say "c'mon fella's let's put some integrity into this government!" We need money for job training, we need money for health care, we need to take care of our senior citizens, we need nutrition programs and head/start programs, and help for farmers.

ROTUNDA: The bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Lebanon this week raises the question of your foreign policy stance in that region. Does the U.S. have an obligation to risk American lives in an effort to bring stability to Lebanon and other volatile areas?

HARRISON: If we are in an area we have to have security for our kids. What worries me about this whole situation is when nuclear weapons get in the hands of terrorists.

ROTUNDA: But ideologically, do you feel that the U.S. has an obligation to send our people to promote peace in these areas?

HARRISON: No, I did not say they continue to receive their funding, they subcontract out in forty some states. So that the politicians in those states that. It is our interest to have peace. But we have to choose the methods, the areas and be sure that we protect our people...I'll tell you one thing. I would not have put our boys there in Lebanon where they were killed with no bullets in their guns.

Longwood learning environment: What do students say?

by Bill Moore

Last spring, with the cooperation of the Office of Academic Affairs and various faculty members, I collected surveys from a large and relatively random cross-section of the Longwood student body. We wanted to explore students' general perceptions of their Longwood experience, the learning environment at Longwood, and their own academic concerns. We have now analyzed a sample of 500 from the original sample of approximately 1,000, and a more complete report is forthcoming. For now, I thought I'd share a few bits as "food for thought."

Generally, the picture is a positive one. While 78% of these students said they study more here than they did in high school, 65% termed their high school preparation adequate. 71% say that they can talk to faculty easily, and 72% have had little problem choosing a major. 73% of these students say that they have had a positive overall experience at Longwood, and 69% expect to graduate from Longwood.

However, there is a dark side to this picture of Longwood as well. 78% of these students say they study more here than they did in high school, but the average number of study hours per week is 14.6. Quantity of time is not the only issue, to be sure; quality and efficiency of studying count, too, but nevertheless this average still seems low (especially when compared to official faculty expectations of 2 hours outside of class for every one hour in class!). Elsewhere on the survey, 56% of these students indicated "finding time to study" was a concern for them. We seem to have a busy student body, but doing what is the question!

On other fronts, 68% of the sample said that they have had problems registering for the courses they wanted; it's not clear how much of this significant problem is real and how much is unrealistic expectations. The same is true for perceptions of academic advising—45% say they're satisfied with their advising, but 40% say they are dissatisfied. But what is expected? It reminds me of Will Rogers' comment about the weather—everyone talks about it, but no one does anything about it. Faculty are assumed to know automatically how to provide quality advising; students are assumed to know automatically how to approach and use their advisors most effectively. These assumptions are clearly faulty in many cases.

Finally, while 73% of these students report a positive overall experience at Longwood, when asked if they'd still choose Longwood if they could do it again, only 38% agreed, 34% were unsure, and 28% disagreed. Again, it's not clear whether such a discrepancy points to a simple "grass is greener on the other side" phenomenon or if it reinforces earlier data suggesting that for many students at Longwood, their bond with the institution is tenuous at best. They're here because they didn't get into JMU (VCU, etc., take your pick), or because Mom is an alumna, or because it's inexpensive, and they've not been able to get beyond that to see the real value and worth of the institution, for all its flaws.

New musical talent to stage

To Sophia Paulette, being chosen for the female lead in the L.C. Players upcoming production of The Three Penny Opera was, at last, the break she had been waiting for.

Paulette, a junior biology major, drama minor here at Longwood, comes to us with a concrete background in music and voice. In high school she was active in an acappella choir, took private voice lessons for two years, and played in several musicals. She also sings in her church choir, both collectively and solo, and is currently taking a voice class.

Although Paulette is excited about her role in The Three Penny Opera, she admits that she didn't expect to get the part. "I had tried out for previous parts recently here at Longwood and didn't get them. I guess I was just better suited for this role." Paulette had not planned on even trying out for this musical, but someone suggested that she give it a shot and sing an audition piece. She agreed, and the musical director was very pleased; she got the part. It's weird," she recalls, "I don't think they knew I could sing before this.

While it is Paulette's singing debut on the Longwood stage, it is not her debut altogether. She appeared in a one-act play her freshman year, but since then has remained basically in the background performing in the technical aspects of the productions instead of onstage; she is also the secretary for the Longwood Players. "I've always been sort of in the background because I'm basically a shy person," Paulette stated. "This is the first time I've done anything really big." □

Maxwell opens lecture series

by Eric Houseknecht

Wednesday evening September 19th marked the opening of Longwood's Faculty Colloquium Lectures for the 1984-85 school year. Starting off this year's series was assistant professor of chemistry Dr. Maurice Maxwell whose lecture was entitled "The Nature of the 3,4-Bond of Thiophene."

Maxwell began by briefly reviewing the fundamental concepts of chemical bonding, benzene structure, and the nature of thiophene for the benefit of those in the audience who may have lacked the proper scientific background to fully understand his lecture. He then outlined a series of steps he used (while working for DuPont) in attempting to synthesize a compound known as 7H-cyclopenta (1,2-c: 3,4-c')dithiophene. His interest focused on the 3,4-bond of this compound, the nature of which had become somewhat controversial as the result of research done by Janssen and deJong of the Netherlands. Maxwell's explanation of a second syntheses of a thiophene derivative revealed the true nature of the bond in question and acted like the concluding chapter in the solving of this scientific mystery.

Through his excellent explanation of chemical fundamentals and skillful use of visual aids, Maxwell made an intelligible, coherent presentation which was undoubtedly enjoyed by all who attended. Distinguished members of the audience included Maxwell's parents who traveled from his native state of West Virginia to witness the evenings activities.

Longwood's colloquium series will continue on November 14th when Professor Emeritus of Music John W. Molnar lectures of "Music in Colonial Williamsburg's Theatre." □

Hockey team is 5-3

FARMVILLE, VA—Longwood's field hockey team, now 5-3, visits Lynchburg Thursday in a 3:00 matchup after finishing second behind High Point in the Longwood Invitational Tournament Friday-Saturday.

The Lady Lancers blanked St. Mary's 4-0 and Davidson 6-0 in tournament wins, but suffered a 1-0 loss to High Point in their second straight game Friday afternoon. The Panthers beat Davidson 2-0, Mount St. Mary's 1-0 inovertime and Longwood to win the title with a 3-0 record. Finishing behind Longwood (2-1) were Mount St. Mary's (1-2) and Davidson (0-3). In other action last week Richmond beat LC 4-0 Tuesday.

Longwood's 6-0 win Saturday afternoon marked the first time since a 6-0 win over Randolph-Macon in 1982 that the Lady Lancers had scored six goals in a game. Junior scoring leader Sue Groff (Glen Mills, PA) had two goals in each of Longwood's wins, while freshman Traci Strickland (Virginia Beach) had two in the win over Davidson.

Groff, who has six goals in six games, has accumulated 23 in three years and is now the fourth leading career scorer in Longwood history.

Senior Pam Esworthy (Ijamsville, MD) had a goal and two assists and junior Sharon Burce (Alexandria) one assist and two goals.

Lancer Hockey Team in action

Volleyball team is now 2-3

by Christina Popernack

The Longwood Lancer Women's Volleyball team ended the first week of play with a 2-3 record.

The next contest is the Liberty Baptist Tournament to be held Friday through Saturday followed by an away game Oct. 2 at Virginia Commonwealth University. The next home games are Oct. 4 at 6:30 pm against Mary Washington and Roanoke.

Last week in volleyball action, the Lady Spikers opened the season by losing to UNC-Greensboro 15-8, 15-8 and Greensboro College 15-4, 15-5. Longwood returned home Thursday to defeat Randolph Macon Women's College 15-6, 15-7 and Sweet Briar 15-5, 15-5. Saturday, the team traveled to Eastern Mennonite and lost 15-12, 15-7, 10-15, 15-9.

When asked abou the EMC match, Coach Bonnie Lipscomb replied: "Karen Moye team captain, and Susan Mears played well defensively." She also stated: "Jackie Smith, Brenda Bowman, Mears, and Holly Hearne all served well." Lipscomb feels that the team plays well together, but lacks refinement.

"Right now we are playing in spurts. We need to be more consistent." states Lipscomb.

Fourth laps for Lancers

FARMVILLE, VA—Longwood College will host the fourth "Laps for the Lancers" walk-jog-a-thon Sunday, October 14 at 4:00 on a .4 mile layout starting in front of the Rotunda.

"Laps for the Lancers" is a fund raising project sponsored by the Longwood College Lancer Club to help provide financial support for the athletic program. The event will feature several hundred participants walking, jogging or wheelchairing around the course as many times as possible in one hour.

For more information contact "Laps for the Lancers" director Rich Posipanko at 392-9268 or call the Longwood Athletic Office 392-9323.

Golfers finish 13th

by Jim Winkler

FARMVILLE, VA—The Longwood men's golf team finished 13th out of 16 schools Friday-Saturday in the VMI and Washington & Lee Invitational. Old Dominion won the tournament held at the Lexington Country Club.

For the second straight week making progress and there is a good attitude among the players." Although the team is still inconsistent, the players have the ability to score well. Reynolds shot 80 and Hungerford 81 on Saturday, marking their best scores all year. Rishi and Hughes each shot good rounds on Friday.

Booters outscore opponents by large margin

FARMVILLE, VA—Longwood's 5-1-1 soccer team received its first-ever national ranking last week when the Lancers were rated 18th in Division II in the ISAA-Adidas rankings.

Last week produced a school record 11-0 win over Shenandoah Fridy and a 1-1 tie with a strong Liberty Baptist squad Saturday. This week Longwood entertains Christopher-Newport Tuesday at 3:30 and visits Roanoke Saturday. The Christopher-Newport game is a Virginia Intercollegiate Soccer Association Eastern Division clash.

Looming on the horizon is a trip to Charlottesville next Tuesday (October 2) to play the Division I and nationally ranked Virginia Cavaliers in Scott Stadium. Virginia will undoubtedly be the strongest opponent the Lancers have ever taken on.

Lancers Mark McArdle makes a mid-air stop as the Lancers advance to first national ranking.

Baseball update

Longwood's baseball team entertained Richmond in a fall scrimmage twinbill Saturday afternoon and the Lancers dropped a 7-4 decision in the 7-inning nightcap after the 9-inning opener had ended in a 5-5 tie. The Lancers are 5-2-1 in fall play.

Senior Allen Lawter had three hits in four trips to the plate and junior Dennis Leftwich stole two bases to pace Longwood in the opener. Jeff Mayone slugged a home run and Marty Ford collected two doubles to lead the Lancers in the second game.

This week Longwood plays at Virginia Saturday morning at 11:00 and at James Madison for two games Sunday at 1:00 □

Intramurals roll on

Intramural's continues it's busy season this week with Men's Flag Football approaching the end. B League already finished with Main Event going undefeated in the tourney. A League should finish up this week with four teams left in the winners bracket: Encore, Lightening, Zuccinies, and the Bandits; and five teams left in the loser's bracket: Wanted, Force 25, Buckeyes, Animal House, and It's Like That. Women's team bowling finished Monday night in a battle between the Cruisers and the Wheelor Dealers, however, that outcome was not available at press time.

Three-Man Basketball is also narrowing the winners bracket and the Wanted and Vish left in the losers bracket. This weekend saw Scott Thoden as the winner of the Golf Tournament, the second weekend tournament of the year.

Coming up we have entry blanks due this week for the Even Indoor Soccer tournament (play will be the weekend of the 29-30) and Women's Flag Football. Men's bowling began yesterday. □

Player-of-the-week

FARMVILLE, VA—Senior Lanie Gerken, who led the Longwood women golfers to their top performance in history September 14-16, has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period September 14-21. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Gerken qualified for the NCAA championship last spring, and if her play in the recent Longwood Invitational is any indication, she will likely qualify once again. The Lady Lancer co-captain fired a 74-74-74-222 to place second out of 65 golfers and led Longwood to a second place finish behind Division I Wake Forest.

Gerken's score is a school record for 54 holes and marks the first time ever that a Longwood golfer has equaled par in a tournament.

Lack Of Aid Affects Med Students

(CPS) A student graduating from medical school this year will probably already be some $26,400 in debt, a new study by the Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC) says.

Based on its findings, the AAMC warns that skyrocketing tuition, along with financial aid cutbacks, may soon keep all but the children of the rich from attending medical school.

The concern over med student debts closely parallels college financial aid experts' fears that all students are falling dangerously far into debt to finance their college educations.

Officials say the recent restructuring of federal financial aid programs has forced many students to rely on loans, rather than grants, to pay for college.

And while the debt problem threatens all college students, medical students are becoming especially vulnerable, according to the AAMC study.

Tuition has doubled or tripled at most medical schools in recent years, already locking out many middle - and lower class students, according to the study, which was conducted by a panel of 18 medical school deans.

This year, the average medical school graduate left school with more than $26,400 in debts, the study shows, a 10.8 percent increase over last year.

Over eight percent - one out of every 12 - left school owing more than $50,000.

"If this trend continues," the study says, "many students may be denied the opportunity to study medicine. A medical education may become an opportunity restricted to the affluent."

Only 12 percent of this year's med students graduated without debt, compared to 14 percent in 1983.

OCPP Helps Students Win Jobs

by Lori Foster

When you graduate from Longwood chances are employers will not be hunting you down and good jobs will not be falling out of the sky. Finding a good job doesn't just happen, you have to make it happen. Here at Longwood on the second floor of S. Ruffner we have the Office of Career Planning and Placement, who will help you do just that, find a job.

The OCPP Staff, directed by Niki Falls and her assistant, Linda Dove, is always willing to assist you. The services of the office are voluntary. A student does not have to take advantage of it in order to graduate, therefore too many students put off the early effort and being their own job search only after they have left school. Students do not realize they will need some guidance or instruction until it is too late.

Seventy-five percent of the seniors use the office in someway, however, Fallis suggests that the underclass students should begin to participate in informational interviews and programs as early as possible. The OCPP is not an employment agency, they simply teach students how to use their services so they can correctly go about finding a job. However, many times matches are made between students and employers as a result of using the office.

There is a large variety of services that the OCPP makes available to all students. They provide career information, assist students in career decisions through individual counseling and group seminars, and provide job search strategy workshops, just to name a few. Fallis "encourages students to keep up with the activities of the office by notices appearing in the Rotunda, the campus

Catalinas Prepare For Performance

The Catalina's, Longwood's synchronized swimming club, will present "Dive-In Theater" October 13 for their Oktoberfest performance.

Show times are 1:30, 2:00 and 2:30 at Lancer Pool. Admission is 50 cents.

"Dive-In Theater," the movie theme for the program, presents five routines choreographed to "There's No Stoppin' Us", "Up Where We Belong", "Ghostbusters", "I'm Free", and "What A Feeling".

The finale, a salute to the 1984 Summer Olympics where sychronized swimming made a debut, includes all members of the club swimming to the music of "Olympic Fanfare and Theme".

The Catalina's have 20 members and are coached and advised by Health and Physical Education Instructor, Cindy Peake-Heath.

Officers for 1984-85 are Susan Drewry, President; Suzy Crothers, Vice-President; Ellen Brown, Secretary; Cheryl Evans, Treasurer; and Leslie Wright and Kathryn Schrader, Historians.

New members joining the club are Donna Armento, Suzanne Evans, Joey Faries, Amy Gahs, Linda Mahan, Anne Mackenchnie, Anne Undrhill, and Laura Ziegler.

Returning members are Debbie Bucsko, Laura Clark, Gloria Cliff, Sue Craven, Mindy Robinson and Jana Wells.

I had the rare opportunity Sunday evening of drinking with six of Longwood's most conservative students. A truly weird scene it was, too; what with all these button-down, khaki people, I felt something like Jesse Jackson might if he were to be magically zapped into the height of the Farmville Republicans' weekly bridge match. A desparate, evil situation it was, and I was forced to call on all my powers of reservation to keep from jumping up on the tables, beating my chest, and advocating National Health Insurance at the top of my lungs.

We were gathered for the Mondale-Reagan debate, and I suppose that I was invited as the token Democrat, although I had the distinct impression that two or three of these freaks wanted to sacrifice me after the gig, in honor of what they were sure would be Reagan's thorough trouncing of Mondale. When I told them that Mondale was a sure thing, they laughed and began to mutter something about "four more years" among themselves.

With a half-hour to go before show-time, every one of 'em was getting hostile, and I tried to melt into the sickly yellow walls of the room to avoid provocation of any sort. Lori, the girl who had invited me in the first place, was out at Par-Bil's picking up our second case of Budweisers, and the other five had no sympathy whatsoever for my plight. When Lori finally got back, all was calm again, and she sat down to talk about the debate.

"So you don't really think Mondale's got a chance, do you?" She was about to burst out laughing 'cause she knew what a spot she'd put me in, leaving me alone with all of those inebriated crazies.

"Against that geriatric cow?" I asked, my voice full of disgust. "Mondale can't lose... Did Kennedy have a chance against Nixon? Can Superman save Lois Lane? Is baseball American?" Themes of patriotism raced through my brain ...President Walter Mondale... New direction for America. Wow.

Naturally, Lori didn't agree with me, and she was none too happy a minute later when I said that Reagan was a raving lunatic whose chief desire -and probably talent- was to sing "This Land is Your Land" arm-in-arm with Smokey the Bear on a thirty-second TV spot. However, she remained calm until the beginning of the debate.

Mondale-Reagan Debate Shows Difference

What really bugged me at the beginning was old Barba Walters; she was just too annoying, though she did get a good shot for America's journalists. Can't they g somebody like Cronkite for these things? Anyway, once the intros and compliments were done with, everyone g settled for a real hoe-down. Lori brought out a cold six-pac and we watched as Reagan slithered his way through h first question.

He was babbling something about the reason h couldn't get a balanced budget by 1983, like he promise when the camera first cut to Mondale, who was chucklin over Reagan's gibberish.

"YEAH-all right!-go,Fritz, go!!" I screamed as th camera cut back to the President. Before my elation wa over, a half-full can of Budweiser whizzed by my ear ar crashed into the coffee table. I ducked and took cov behind a giant bean-bag frog of Lori's.

When Mondale finally got his first question, his TV a dience in Louisville, where the debate was held, was goir wild when he spoke: "I am not going to cut out of soci security, medicare [or] student assistance..." Whereupo Denice, Lori's roommate, hollered some nasty words at th TV screen and turned around to snarl at me. Safely behir the giant frog, I said nothing.

As the debate went on, I began to realize that somethir was really strange: while Reagan, the media-proclaime 'TV President', was often edgy and dull (remarkably lik Carter in the '80 debates), Mondale seemed full of vigo unlike the Mondale I thought would show up for the debat He had crawled out of his shell and taken on a new vitalit He took the upper hand early, and he used a trick Reagan's, saying that, when he thought of the Presiden he was "reminded a little bit of what Will Rogers once sai about Herbert Hoover, 'it's not what he doesn't know tha bothers me . . . it's what he knows for sure that just ain so.'"

Just as soon as he said that, of course, I leaped for cove as the beer cans came flying. "Tell 'em Fritz!" I yelled a the room broke into a frenzy.

A minute later, though, everyone settled down to he Reagan speak: "I have instructed my cabinet members a staff that [on any issue which comes before me], they a not to bring up any of the political ramifications that mig surround the issue. I don't want to hear them..." Amid flurry of exaltations which reminded me of a Baptist pray meeting, I began to lose control. Tears were rolling dov my face and I was in hysterics on the floor. I didn't even g a word in before Lori dropped the frog on my head.

Throughout the ninety-minute debate, Reagan tried take the thunder back from Mondale, but he was never rea ly able to do it. "I wasn't going to say this... but... the you go again," he exclaimed using the same phrase whic he has used to his advantage in debating Carter four ye ago. This time, however, it wasn't successful.

Reagan's speeches, though they were at time dramati quite often sounded hollow. Mondale successfully debate his viewpoints such as those on abortion, whereas Reaga appeared to be the narrow-minded President which many of his actions in office have proven him to be. Th President was unable to successfully defend his party platform plank which would require federal judges publicly acknowledge their respect for the 'sanctity human life'. In general, the President wasn't able to brin himself across as the gun-slinging tough guy we 'know' is. Lori even agreed on that point, but the rest of the grou wasn't able to admit it.

No one could quite figure out what happened to Walt Mondale on Sunday night. It doesn't even matter reall What's important is that for the first time, he was able strongly convey the strength of his convictions and th need for the utilization of those convictions. He shed th image of the dull, former vice-president, and he took on th image of a tough, strong-minded candidate who wou make an intelligent Chief Executive.

Lori, however, wasn't in complete agreement when I to her that Mondale would be our next president. She sa something to one of her friends, and, before I knew it, I wa running like a madman with six staunch conservative close at my heels. --MJA

Rotunda Advisor Comments

To The Editor:

In recent days, I've been asked why I don't keep a tighter rein on the college paper. There are a number of reasons. The most important is that it's not my job. I'm forbidden by tradecraft to edit copy, and by law to censor it, even were I inclined to do so, which I'm not.

Let it be said that no member of the administration has so much as hinted that I should.

But let it be added that the paper has had four advisors in four semesters. This is not the way to establish the continuity any publication needs. Such a debacle may be laid directly at the door of the administration, which two years ago responded to another controversy in an incoherent manner whose ill-considered consequences are with us yet.

This feckless game of musical chairs -- which featured off-campus advisors rendering ill-focused advise -- had its origins in the year I spent on leave, when the Rotunda (according to whom you listen to), either fulfilled its reportorial mandate with agressive elan or disgraced itself with gutter journalism. I'm too far from the facts to know them, but I do know that for the past 12 months I've been kept spinning like a top while various deans and vice-presidents took turns rehiring and re-firing me as soon as one got wind of what another was up to. Call it a salutary lesson in realpoliitik, in which the was between candor and caution is ever unequal.

Despite all this, the paper thrives -- a tribute to its student staff, who have done their work while all too many of its elders were able even to get a grip on theirs.

Sincerely,
W.C. Woods
Advisor,
the Rotunda

Greek/Independence Weighed

Dear Editor:

This is written in respoonse to the letter Check Ebbetts, and the events surrounding the pointless debate concerning the merit of Longwood Greek Organizations. Surely the letter was just an angry attempt or possible a humorous attempt to reciprocate on the editorial written by Jeff Abernathy. The editorial written by Abernathy sparked a backlash of pro-Greek sentiment expressed on the October 2 Rotunda letters page. This was duly expected, by Ebbetts' article does little more than to feed the fire. Being an independent and not affliated with the Rotunda I thought I might humbly defend Independents while offering a moderate rationalization of the debated non-issue.

In contrast to Chuck I don't believe Greek Organizations at Longwood can truly be equated with any form of ancient Greek culture. The only thing Hellenic about the local Greeks are the letters they wear on their assorted garments. After a quick history of the orgins of Fraternities we are informed that Fraternities can help you through the "best times of your life." This, only happens after you mystically discover the "direct advantages" that Ebbets forgot to list.

For someone who is "socially unskilled, culturally underdeveloped," has an "inbred fear of rejection" and is a known "God damned Idiot" this letter by defintion should be physiologically impossible. The facts are that the Greeks need money to survive, and to become a full-member of the organization must be accomplished monetarily. Some, Greek organizations seem more prestigious than others, and seem more discriminatory in value judgements made on people's lifestyles and appearances. Whatever the case if you have the money and want to join, chances are that you won't have much difficulty in finding a group to accept you. Only a precious few ever get blackballed or quit once they join.

Ebbetts' mumbo - jumbo about "inbred fear of rejection" really amused me. I suppose you can conquer the fear by simply supplying your favorite bunch of guys or gals with a few bills. I submit that he has the "rejection theory" backwards. It would seem that people who join Greek Organizations because their friends already have, need to feel secure in a group, or just need a party gang are people possession elements of the fear of rejection.

Abernathy slapped the Greeks on campus, and we all expected a reciprocal swing. Ebbetts responded not by repudiating Abernathy, but by reckless accusations against the Independent Student Body. Behind this non-issue is the principle that I thought was self-evident: Anyone may join, but no one has to. Some of the basic precepts associated with the founding of this country were based on principles supporting individualism and freedom of choice. As long as the Greeks don't interfere with my immuntable natural rights, then everything is hunky-dory. Nothing is going to change the fact that Greeks have long-standing traditions at colleges all over this nation, Longwood being no exception. Let's stop beating a dead horse.

Policy Stated For "Your Turn"

The Rotunda policy on our "Your Turn" column is as follows:

— No letters will be published anonymously. All letters must have name, room number and if possible, phone number marked clearly on the page.

— All letters should be typed or printed legibly. In either case, they must be double spaced.

— No letter will be published if it contains false information; nor will a letter be published if it is slanderous or libelous to any person or group. All letters are subject to editing and grammatical correction. If you wish your letter to be printed in full or not at all, write "Full" in the bottom left hand corner.

Disagreement With Last Week's Letter

To the Editor:

This letter is in response to the editorial written by a certain Miss Linda B. Chamber in the October 2nd. edition of the Rotunda. Miss Chamber made several comments on subjects that I wish to discuss and has given me reason to think on those subjects quite carefully. I plan to go over her letter here in the hope that my observations may give her some reason to re-think her positions.

I first wish to comment on her assumption that only those who have been "born again" are true Christians. Miss Chamber, true Christians have no need to be "born again" because they are already Christians. Miss Chamber, a Christian is defined as "a person professing belief in Jesus as the Christ, or in the religion based on the teachings of Jesus" (from Webster's New World Dictionary). I wonder what you were before you were "born again"?

I now would like to say a few words concerning homosexuality. Miss Chamber has given us many fine examples of Biblical condemnation of homosexuality and I must say that I am impressed with her learning, however, I wish to further her education in the religion that she has been "born again" into. Miss Chamber, a true Christian would not fight a person's desire to be a homosexual. A true Christian would pray for his/her soul not in the hope that the person's homosexuality will not spread. A true Christian would accept the person as he/she is and try to understand him/her. A true Christian is a person who helps others with problems, not a person who creates them. Homosexuality is not a disease Miss Chamber, it is a willful choice made by people who prefer their own sex to the opposite sex. Homosexuals are not living in an adominable lifestyle, they are living in THEIR lifestyle. A true Christian would know this and would try to make their life as easy as possible because they are persecuted by people like yourself. You ask why they are having so much trouble "coming out of the closet" and I would answer you by saying that it is people like you, with the misguided notion that they have the right to make people conform to their own idea of what is right, that is keeping the homosexual in the closet. You, Miss Chamber, and those who think like you do are the ones who are keeping the homosexual from becoming an open part of society. Homosexuals are people, Miss Chamber, and deserved to be treated with respect. They have made the choice to be who they are and they will be responsible to GOD for that choice. NOBODY, here on earth, has the right to treat them like condemned people because only GOD can condemn and nobody here should presume to judge others for HIM. You should go back and study the text of your new religion (the Bible) and read what it has to say about people who make judgement on others and what it says about self-rightousness, it may do you some good.

I also wish to comment on the last part of her letter concerning "THE LETTER". Why would you ever thank GOD for censorship? Freedom of the press is one of our Constitional rights and probably our most important right next to freedom of speech. Mr. Wall did not show good judgement in trying to censure that article. Mr. Wall decided that he was above the law and had the power to delete items from that article that he had no right to delete. If we had allow-

by Eric T. Houseknecht

This being an election year, discussions all over campus, and for that fact all over the country, have turned to politics and today's "issues" as thousands of otherwise normal students feign political awareness and genuine concern for the state of our nation. Questions are being raised as to how well President Reagan can meet the needs of our citizesn, especially owing to his steadfast refusal to raise taxes. Mr. Reagan's tax reforms are being heavily criticized by the Democrats as favoring the right and doing nothing to help the needy. Many of today's more outspoken champions of democracy seem to feel that the poor need more tax breaks, while the rich, so often blessed with loopholes, need to be taxes more heavily. However, the plight of the poor extends far beyond material matters. In order to find an appropriate solution to the tax problem, let us take a broader look at the dilema of the poor.

The poor are, for the most part, an unhappy lot. Often cold, invariably short of cash, frequently hungry, they unquestionably have grounds for complaint and few would dispute this. In general, the poor are deprived of most of the things that comprise that which is called "the good life" or "the American standard of living". This state of affairs has been duly noted by both the government and the governed, and much as been done in an attempt to alleviate the situation. Wherever a lack has been perceived a solution has been proposed. No money? Welfare. No apartment? Public housing. No breakfast? Food stamps. It's obvious that the poor need help. The unpoor are willing to help them - some excessively so.

For those unpoor genuinely dedicated to good works, the non-material problems of the poor are obvious. I should like to make it immediately clear that I am not about to expound on the universal human need for love and affection. As far as I can tell, the poor get all the love and affection they can possibly handle. The concept of an unsuitable marriage obviously started somewhere.

No, I am speaking here of needs of a social nature. In order that you might gain a better understanding of this matter, I offer by way of illustration an imaginary dinner party given by a member of the unpoor for his peers, you among them. You choose to accompany you a needy friend. He lacks the proper attire. You accomadate him from your own wardrobe. Your host provides ample food and drink. Your friend is momentarily happy. He feels unpoor, you feel generous, your host feels gracious, good will abounds. For just an instant, you toy with the idea that poverty could be completely eradicated by the simple act of including the poor in the dinner plans of the unpoor. Coffee is served. The talk becomes earnest. The conversation, as is its wont, turns to tax problems.

It is at this point, I assure you, that as far as the poor person on your left is concerned, the party is over. Suddenly he feels poor again. Worse than poor - left out. He has not tax problems. And under the present system he will remain in this degrading position for the rest of his poverty. As long as he is poor he will be without tax problems, and as long as he is without tax problems, let us not forget, he will also be without tax benefits. And they call this a democracy. A democracy, when one man is in a fifty percent bracket and his dinner companion is in no bracket at all. It isn't enough that a man has no food, no clothing, no roof over his head. No, he also has no accountant, no investment lawyer, no deductions, no loopholes, and very likely no receipts.

This is, of course, unconscionable, and now that you hvae been apprised of the situation, it is unthinkable that it go on one minute longer - certainly not if we call our society an equitable one. Fortunately, there is a solution to this problem.

Tax the poor. Heavily. No halfway measures. No crumbs from rich man's table. I mean tax. Fifty percent bracket, property, capital gains, inheritance - the works.

The point many will be quick to raise is that the

ed this to happen we would have thrown away one of the dearest rights that our Founding Fathers fought and suffered for. Mr. Wall tried to violate our civil rights and thank GOD that the staff of the Rotunda had the guts to tell him so. Miss Chamber, if you find something in the paper that is offending you, you already have the most effective method of self-censorship that has ever been devised; you can turn the page. Why don't you try that next time. Censorship is an evil, just as assuredly as murder and rape are evil. Censorship deprives the population the opportunity to decide issues themselves. Some people call for censorship of 'obscene' material and they truly believe that it should be banned, but who is to say what is 'obscene'? Would you say that pictures of naked women were obscene? If the answer is yes, and you somehow managed to get all pictures of naked women banned did you know that you would have to ban paintings too, and sculptures as well. Some of the greatest artworks would be banned all because you thought they were obscene. What is obscene to one person is beauty to others. That is just an example but the same principle applies to any other mode of communication and the same arguments apply against any form of censorship. Besides, we could never all agree on who the censor would be. Some would want priests others would want teachers and still others would want somebody else. If we all agreed on what material we wanted censored there would be no need for censorship because there would be no market for the material. As long as any type of material has a market it should be allowed to be published. I believe with all my heart the American people will never allow any form of censureship to be imposed upon them. I hope and pray that people who think that censureship is the answer to the problems that they see in the media will see the error of they ways before it is to late.

I know that this letter will not make people stop persecuting homosexuals and I know that this letter will not make the censureship advocates come to their senses but at least I hope that it will make them think about it a little. I sure hope so.

Play Sponsored By Social Work Department

On October 18, 1984, the Social Work Department is sponsoring a play entitled "Why Can't I Drink?" This play will be presented by the Family Service of Central Virginia. The performance will take place in the Wynn Building Auditorium at 7:00 p.m. The admission is free for everyone.

"Why Can't I Drink?" is a play that touches on such problems as peer pressure, stress, and the other problems related to drinking. The play will also illustrate the symptoms of alcoholism in young people.

After the play a discussion led by a trained spokesman for the agency will take place. At this time the audience will have a chance to comment on the ideas presented in the play. Everyone is invited to attend this production and take part in the discussion to follow.

Trading Places: A Review

by Tim Fitzgerald

October 4-6, the Longwood Student Union presented the movie Trading Places. This movie, which stars Eddie Murphey, Dan Akaroyd, and Jamie Lee Curtis, was shown at 7:00 and 9:00 each night. Judging from the reactions of the sell-out crowd on Thursday, Trading Places was a big success at Longwood.

In talking with people after the show, I found that the majority of the people in attendance had already seen the movie before. Most of them also felt that the show was as good the second time as it was the first time.

It was obvious that most of the people came to see Eddie Murphey. As usual, Murphey did not disappoint his audience. He kept the audience laughing throughout the entire show. To put it simply, Murphey was his normal, brilliant self.

In this movie, Dan Akaroyd proved that his acting career can continue without John Belushi. Although overshadowed by Murphey, Akaroyd also played an important part in the success of this movie. Any Hampden-Sydney student would be proud of Akaroyd's attempt to portray an Ivey League graduate.

The only negative comment that I heard about the movie pertained to Jamie Lee Curtis. I overheard one girl asking a friend, "Why does Jamie Lee Curtis take her clothes off in every other scene?" I have to agree with her comment that "she could probably be a good actress if she did more acting and less stripping."

The "sleeper" in this picture was Coleman, the butler. His dry, hidden humor contrasted with the direct, straight forward humor of Murphey and Akaroyd for a pleasant variation of change of pace.

Although at times the movie was exagerated and unrealistic, it was still very entertaining and well worth the one dollar admission fee. Once again the Student Union has done an excellent job in providing the students with a quality movie at a very reasonable price.

The next movie to be presented by SUN will be Pink Floyd's The Wall on November 8th and 9th.

Springsteen Review

by Kevin Sneed

Bruce Springsteen is one of rock's most popular acts. His latest effort, Born in the U.S.A., is the typical Springsteen album. This work fails because it lacks originality. It reinterates the same message he has been attempting to relay over the years.

To effectively analyze a Springsteen album, one must separate the artist from the entertainer. Bruce is unquestionably one of rock's greatest performers. His concerts lasts from four to five hours, and the Boss literally wears the audience out. Unfortunately, his album does not reflect his ability to perform. His much is extremely reminescent of that of Mitch Ryder and the Detroit Wheels. Bruce's much and style were a welcome relief from the clone bands that existed ten years ago. Springsteen has not progressed artistically; he has produced the same music and lyrics album after album.

Bruce attempts to exemplify unflorified lives of ordinary people in Born in the U.S.A. The range of his songs go from that of a Vietnam Vet to steel working towns. Ten years ago, he was writing the same sentiments. I do not intend to downgrade Mr. Springsteen, but he has found a formula which is successful. Springsteen's lack of originality tarnishes his image as an artist. If the Boss can locate the artistic integrity he possessed ten years ago, then he will be remembered as one of rock's all-time greats, if not he will be doomed to a life performing in the Las Vegas Hilton.

College Credit Offered For Health Workshop

Longwood College is offering a three-day workshop on women's health and health care the weekend of October 19-21.

The workshop program will deal with physical, mental/emotional and social factors related to women's health. The workshop is sponsored by Longwood's Office of Continuing Studies and the Department of Health, Physical Education and Recreation. It is funded in part by a grant from the Duke University/University of North Carolina Women's Studies Research Center.

Topics to be considered include: mental health of women; female sexuality and reproductive heatlh; breast cancer -- examination and recovery; women and aging; drug use and abuse; fitness, nutrition, and "girth control"; occupational stress, equal opportunity, and dual-career marriages; rape and spouse abuse; and women as patients and health care consumers.

Dr. Sandra K. Cross, assistant professor of health education at Longwood, will direct the

Rescue Squad Needs Students

The Prince Edward Volunteer Rescue Squad is seeking volunteers who have a desire to help the Farmville community. Any person who is willing to be on call for approximately 12 hours each week is encouraged to apply for membership. Any students who are already experienced as Emergency Medical Technicians or above are encouraged to volunteer.

The Prince Edward Volunteer Rescue Squad is currently comprised of 22 active members. Not only are calls answered in Farmville and Prince Edward County, but also in parts of Cumberland, Buckingham and Charlotte Counties. While there are seven fire departments who routinely answer calls in these areas, there is only one rescue squad. It responds to an average of 90 calls per month.

This is an excellent way to meet other people and to become more involved in what can be your community. For information contact Roy Williams at Southside Community Hospital at 392-8811, extension 187.

Rookie Golfer Named Longwood College Player Of The Week

Tina Barrett

Freshman Tina Barrett who fired a 72-79-151 to win the individual title in the ECAC Open Tournament September 29-30, has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period September 28-October 5. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood College Sports Information Office.

Barrett, a graduate of Perry Hall High School, was the best of 40 golfers representing seven colleges in the 36-hole ECAC Open Tournament at Bryce Resort in Bayse, Virginia. Her first round 72 broke the existing course record for women at Bryce Resort.

The rookie golfer also led Longwood to the tournament title, its first since 1981 and first ever over a predominantly Division I field of teams.

"Tina has made a consistent contribution to our team score in every tournament," said Longwood coach Barbara Smith.

Barrett has a stroke average of 77.1 for eight rounds during her short college career and every round but on has been 79 or lower. She has finished no lower than third in each of Longwood's three tournament appearances.

Franchise Enterprises Supports Longwood Athletic Scholarship Program

Franchise Enterprises, Inc., of Rocky Mount, North Carolina, and owner of Hardee's Restaurant in Farmville, has for the third straight year made a major contribution to the Longwood Athletic Scholarship Program.

A gift of $250 will be given to the Athletic Scholarship Fund honoring a Longwood Player of the Game selected after each regular home basketball game this year and announced at the next home game.

Hardee's has committed a total of $2,000 in support of Longwood's men's basketball for this year. Don't miss the special "Hardee's Night" activities in conjunction with the January 16th home game against Randolph-Macon.

Hardee's has been the single largest contributor to the Longwood Athletic Scholarship Program over the past three years with a total of $8,000 support over that period.

"It is a great benefit to this college and this community when a business home-based elsewhere demonstrates that it is a community partner and supporter," said Donald Lemish, Vice-President for Institutional Advancement at Longwood. "Franchise Enterprises is an outstanding community partner."

Kenneth Fields Awarded Certificates From The Army

Longwood junior Kenneth Fields (Largo, MD), a member of the Lancer men's basketball team, has been awarded two certificates for outstanding service to the Defense Communications Agency, a unit of the United States Army.

Lieutenant General Winston D. Powers presented the certificates to Fields in special ceremonies in Washington, D.C. Each award has a $100 stipend.

Fields was recognized for his work in the Office of Corporate Planning and Integration of the Defense Communications Agency the past two summers. He worked in the computer area of the office.

Fields transferred to Longwood this semester after finishing at Moberly Junior College in Moberly, Missouri. He averaged 13 points and six rebounds per game while earning All-Conference honors and a sport on the Academic All-Region team last year.

A graduate of Fairmont Heights High School, Fields scored 23 points per contest land pulled down an average of eight rebounds per game in his senior year.

He and his Lancer teammates will open preseason basketball practice October 15.

IAA Update —

Longwood's Intramural Athletic Association continues this week with the finals of the mens flag football to be held Wednesday, 10/10. The championship game will be between Encore and the Zuchinies who came out of the loser's bracket and defeated Encore once last week.

Womens flag football, which consists of 20 teams, started preseason action last week and will begin regular season action on Wednesday, 10/10.

Mens bowling is also well underway with only five teams remaining. The Strikers and the Pinheads are in the winners bracket while Encore, Keggers I (SPE) and the Crows (AXP) are still playing in the losers bracket. Finals for bowling will be on either Wednesday, 10/10 or Thursday, 10/11.

Entry blanks for indoor soccer are due on Thursday, October 11. Teams should sign up for practices Monday 10/8 through Thursday 10/11 by signing up on the IAA bulletin board. A mandatory captains meeting will be held on Thursday, 10/11 in the IAA room in Lankford.

Anything Goes Relays, a coed fun-for-everyone intramural event, will be held on Monday, October 8.

If anyone is interested in officiating volleyball for money, please pick up applications now and turn them in on Thursday, 10/11.

Lady Lancers Earn Second Place In Tournament At Yale

Continuing its strong early season play, Longwood's women's golf team earned a second place finish in the Yale University Invitational Tournament over the weekend. James Madison finished on top with a 327-324-651 while Longwood scored a 340-327-667.

Next up for the Lady Lancers is a rugged field of Division I opposition in the Duke Invitational Friday, Saturday and Sunday

Soccer Team Ranks 15th In Division II Pool

Longwood's soccer team, 8-2-1 and ranked 15th in last week's ISAA-Adidas Division II pool, faces Eastern Division VISA foes Mary Washington Wednesday and Averett Saturday in road games this week.

Last week the Lancers bowed to sixth ranked Division I Virginia 4-0 Tuesday night and returned home to blank Eastern Mennonite 5-0 Saturday afternoon as John Kennen and Tim Ford dominated the action. Ford and Kennen accounted for all five goals and two assists between them.

Longwood's games at Mary Washington, 3:30 Wednesday, and Averett, 2:00 Saturday, are the start of a seven game road swing over the next four weeks.

workshop. Ten other professionals who are engaged in research, teaching and/or community service related to women's health will make presentations.

The workshop schedule will be as follows: Friday, October 19, 12 noon to 9:30 p.m., with a two-hour dinner break; Saturday, October 20, 9 a.m. to 9:15 p.m., with breaks for lunch and dinner; and Sunday, October 21, 9 a.m. to 2 p.m., with a break for brunch.

All of the sessions will be held in the Wynne Building on the Longwood Campus.

Praticipants may earn two graduate or undergraduate credits or two Continuing Education Units (CEUs). Those who cannot attend the full workshop are invited to participate by the day; fees will be adjusted accordingly.

For complete information on the workshop schedule, fees, and registration, call or visit Longwood's Office of Continuing Studies, Wynne Building, telephone 804-392-9256. The deadline for registration is October 16.

Duncan Named Chairperson

Longwood women's basketball coach Shirley Duncan, who guided the Lady Lancers to a 16-10 record last season, has been named chairperson of district committees which will handle selections for Division II All-American and Coach of the Year for 1984-85.

Duncan will be the District III chairperson for the Kodak/Women's Basketball Coaches Association Division II All-American basketball selections and for the WBCA/Converse "Coach of the Year" selection for Division II.

The Longwood coach was appointed by Darlene May of Cal State Poly Pomona and Cherri Mankenberg of Nebraska-Omaha, national chairs, respectively.

Sorority Rush Is Held

Sorority Rush 1984 was a great success, with 79 young women walking on Sunday, September 30. Lead by Donna Eason of Kappa Delta Sorority and Ann Brownson, the Panhellenic Advisor, Rush came in with a boom! Starting off with Open House Parties on Sunday, September 23 and Monday, September 24, the Rushees were given their first glimpse of each of the sororities. After a free night on Tuesday, the 25th, Wednesday Ski Parties were held and also on Thursday. Each sorority here tried to show the Rushees what their sorority was like. On Saturday, the 29th, Theme parties were held. At these parties the Rushees were given even more information about the sororities on the morning of Sunday the 30th the mood was very sentimental as the sororities presented their Inspirationals. Then on Sunday evening, in spite of rain, many damp spectators witnessed Rush 1984's climax as the festivities of walk commenced and 79 Longwood women were welcomed into their new sisterhoods.

bulletin, newsletters, and to spport those activities they find valuable to them."

Due to the few number of employers that visit Longwood, Fallis and Dove go to them. The main goals of their visits is to give employers information about Longwood students, statistics of past graduates and making them aware of what Longwood College has to offer. They also invite employers to visit our campus and to meet those interested. Not only does the staff go to the employers and bring them back, but they also are responsible for taking the students to employers. On Wednesday, November 14, the OCPP will provide transportation to Lynchburg for "Challenge '85", a career fair for liberal arts majors.

The OCPP keeps in touch with students who have graduated as well. A "follow-up" of Longwood grads is designed with detailed statistics and reports concerning the employment of former students.

Another service of the office is the credential file, which is a systematic collection of recommendations/references, a personal data sheet, a transcript and a resume. These documents and information are used to support a candidate's application. The file will be sent to prospective employers upon request or it may also be used for entry to graduate school.

Most important, participation in the programs and services of the OCPP will help you to become a knowledgeable job seeker. As Fallis stated "it is not necessarily the person that is best for the job who will be the one to get it, but the one that goes after it in the best way!"

poor lack the means to be taxed. However, I counter by saying that an inability to accept this solution is a matter of scale, of relativity.

The fifty percent concept is the easiest to grasp, for it should be quite apparent to all that everyone has half, the poor included. If someone makes as little as $2,000 a year, this still leaves him $1,000 for income taxes. Not a fortune certainly, but stil nothing to sneeze at.

The problem some may see with property taxes is undoubtedly conceptual. That is their conception of property very likely tends toward the fallow acreage, midtown real estate, principal residence sort of thing. After all, property merely means ownership; that which one owns is one's property. Therefore property taxes could - and should - easily be levied against the property of the poor. Equal freedom, equal responsibility. So no more free rides for hot plates, vinyl outerwear, or electric space heaters.

Taxing the poor for their capital gains may be an arduous task but isn't an insurmountable one. Admittedly, it probably won't come up that often, but the poor would be well advised not to try selling off any leftover Spam Bake without reporting it.

Inheritance is another tricky concept and while to some the word "inherit" may conjure up images of venerable country estates and square-cut emeralds, to others - i.e., the poor - quite different visions spring to mind. A hand-me-down pair of Dacron slacks is, of course, no square-cut emerald, but then again, one thousand dollars is, as I believe I mentioned in point number one, not a fortune.

Minority students particularly are being locked out of the medical field by soaring tuitions and dwindling scholarship funds, AAMC officials say.

Since 1974, the report points out, the number of minority students attending medical schools has stalled at 8.3 percent of total enrollment.

Many lower-income and minority students who would otherwise enter medical school are opting for less-costly business, chemistry, and biology degrees that will bring them high-paying jobs without a huge debt obligation, the medical dean reports.

And cutbacks in federal student aid for med students promises to exacerbate the debt problem, says AAMC spokesman Robert Boerner.

The main scholarship program for medical students, the National Health Services Corps (NHSC) awards, "is being cut radically and virtually phased out by the Reagan administration," Boerner says.

"There will be fewer than 200 (NHSC) awards annually now," he says, "compared to about 1200 four or five years ago when the program was at its peak."

Even one of Ronald Reagan's personal physicians has rebuked the president for the cuts in aid to medical students.

Programs such as the NHSC awards "Have enabled people with little resources to reach their full potential," says Dr. James Giordano, one of the physicians who operated on Reagan when he was shot three years ago.

Including himself as one of the students who was helped by federal assistance programs, Giordano hopes Reagan "will not abandon the commitment that has meant so much to me and my family."

The Rotunda Interviews: Sally Shreir

Editor's Note: In the second of The Rotunda interviews, Sally Shreir comments on her own views of U.S. politics and feminism, as well as issues relating to her Wednesday evening speech, entitled "Totalitarianism: Marx's Legacy Or The Kremlin's Heresy".

Sheir is managing editor of The Salisbury Review, a leading British journal of political opinion. She was at Longwood last week on a speaking tour.

Rotunda: There is a polarization of views in the political field in the U.S. anyway of the neo-left and the neo-conservatives -- What do you think of the conservative trend here? Is it a positive force in the country?

Shreir: Yes, I have to say yes. . . I'm going to get into my role now and play it. As far as I can see it, it's quite different from in Britain. In Britain conservatism as an intellectual force is only just taking off now whereas here it seems to be something that's been going on maybe since the Fifties . . . it's been quite respectable to call yourself an intellectual conservative. Whereas in Britain, that's only now the case. Up until the last few years the intellectual establishment was entirely dominated by the left, and there was a left wing consensus in all spheres of education and culture. That's beginning to change now, partly because we've got a very distinctively conservative government and partly because I think people do think the left is subverting some of our institutions and that education is no longer the sort of liberal humane kind that conservatives and indeed liberals in Britain would like to see. You have to make the distinction you see between here, where to be a liberal is to be on the left really whereas to be a liberal in Britain is quite a lot in common in some spheres anyway between conservatives and liberals as opposed to the labor party or the socialist party -- a lot of variants would be the same -- not by any means all. So, although the liberal party never gets into power in Britain all politics is built on a foundation of liberalism and so to be a liberal isn't to be left. You might not agree with them. You might not agree with their philosophy of the human nature of institutions. But it's far less one side of a polarized situation as it is here, where nobody as far as I can see calls themself

Search For A New Director Of Student Activities

by Barrett Baker

The search for the new Director of Student Activities, which is in the process of beginning, is geared to involve as much student participation as possible.

"We want to get as much input on the applicants as we can," says Phillis Mable, Vice-President of Student Affairs, "and we want the applicants to get a lot of student exposure - it's a two way thing. After all," she continues, "these people will be working for the students and if the students aren't happy with woever gets hired, then the effort won't be much of a success."

Barb Gorski, who is currently the Interim Director of Student Activities and involved with screening applicants for the job, feels very good about the way the project is being handled. "This is one of the most organized projects around," she states, "and we've got a good bunch of candidates to choose from. We are in the position to be very picky about the person we choose."

The process, which begins with a screening committee consisting of Colleen Brenan, S-UN President, Moffett Evans, Technical Director of the Speech and Dramatic Arts Department, Ann White, Lankford Building Manager, Randy Chittum, President of Student Government, and Sophia Pollet, Chair of the Series for the Performing Arts, along with Gorski, is designed to eliminate those applicants who don't meet the minimum requirements of candidacy.

As soon as this process is completed, the remaining applicants will be invited to come to Longwood for interviews. The interviews, which are expected to run for about 1½ days per applicant, are to be conducted by various committees representing Student Activities, Employees of Student Union, and Student Leaders directly involved with S-UN.

"A lot of work has gone into this project in order to control the element of bias and to get as many students involved as we can," adds Gorski. "I think this is a great opportunity for students to discuss what they want in the new director and to gain interviewing skills that can be used after they graduate."

Upon the completion of the interviews, the screening committee will then review the remaining applicants to make recommendations to Phyllis Mabel, who will make the final decision on who will be hired. The new director will be expected to begin operations by January 1, 1985.

Among other things, the Student Activities Program supports students in their academic preparation and achievement through educational, social, cultural, and leadership programming for the college community; registration and coordination of student organizations; and development of policies affecting the Student Union and Activities Program.

With the addition of a new director, the Student Union itself will begin to expand. Defined committees will be formed dealing with different activities (lectures, films, concerts, mixers, etc.). This is designed to get more people involved in the S-UN and to give more power adn authority to those people.

"The students at Longwood have not been given enough credit as to their ability," states Gorski. "I've had to put a lot of trust in them and they never let me down. Whoever the new director is will have a real talented and great team of people to work with."

We, the People . . .

Danny Ross hollered a few times at eleven o'clock last Friday night. He was standing about twenty-five feet form the tall concrete walls of the State Penitentiary in Richmond. Danny waved his rebel flag, screamed some more, and slapped his buddy on the back. His eyes were sparkling, and a smile was poking out from the sides of a can as he guzzled his last Budweiser. Linwood Briley was dead.

Across the street, and closer to the Penitentiary, Susan Jackson crossed herself as tears fell down her dark brown cheeks. Sobbing, she felt a hand on her shoulder as she kneeled to the sidewalk. Voices surrounded her in support. They were singing "Amazing Grace". Linwood Briley was dead.

An hour earlier at 10:15 on Friday, October 12, 1984, a Richmond reporter walked up and down Belvedere Street, some two hundred feet from the cell where Briley waited to die. The crowd on Belvedere was swelling, a thousand strong already. At the corner of Belvedere and Spring Street, Susan Jackson and others from the black community gathered, praying silently. Further down Belvedere, protestors of the death penalty burned white candles. Some carried signs proclaiming their protest: "To execute a murderer is simply to adopt his point of view", "Thou shalt not kill" and others. On the opposite side of Belvedere, David Ross stood drinking beer with other white residents of Richmond's Oregon Hill subdivision. The signs they carried were different: "Have pity on Linwood Briley. Reduce the voltage to 220", "An Eye for an Eye". An elderly white woman stood silten under a lamp post holding a sign which read "Kill the Negroe". She told the reporter that she'd received two death threats.

The reporter, a Richmond native, walked through the crowd talking to both supporters and protestors. A friend of David Ross' said "I'd kill him myself . . . they ought to hang him by the balls." He was wearing patched Levi's, a black Molly Hatchett T-shirt and a jean jack with a skull and crossbones embroidered on the back. "I'd kill him myself," he repeated.

People around him nodded in agreement, "Anybody against the Death Penalty should go in there and hold Linwood's hand when they throw the switch," said a woman with long brown hair and a beautiful smile. She was about thirty years old, the same age as Briley. It was 10:35.

On the other side of the street, as the clock raced on, protestors held hands, sang the gospel and talked ever-so-quietly among themselves, as if the slightest noise would disturb the last-minute efforts of Briley's lawyers. At 10:50, the reporter asked one protestor what he thought of Briley's chances for a reprival. "It's good to dream," he replied, "but not likely." A small group stood holding hands nearby; one of them was holding a sign that read "Victim's Families Against the Death Penalty."

At 10:55, the waiting crowd was tense. There was no way of knowing whether Briley was on his way to the electric chair or if, perhaps, the lawyers had succeeded. Both sides of Belvedere were getting restless. The supporters anxiously sucked down more Budweisers; the protestors crossed themselves over and over . . . and at 11:05 word passed through the crowd quickly. It was done.

The reporter talked to many protestors after the execution. There were few supporters available for interviewing. Most had already left.

"It just seems like we failed," said one tearful protestor, "as a society, we just failed, plain gave up. Instead of having confidence in human beings, we give up on them. Instead of believing we could do the job of rehabilitating the man, we kill him. Instead of showing love, we hate." At 11:05 last Friday, it was done.

Linwood Briley was a murderer. And we, the people . . .? At 11:05 p.m. last Friday, Linwood Earl Briley was dead.

Explaining The Seasons

by Eric T. Houseknecht, III

This weekend while driving to Richmond on a sunny Sunday afternoon, I was struck by a rather disconcerting revelation. Autumn was upon us and had been for several weeks now. And while anyone who owns a calendar may have been well aware of this fact, it seems that living in the collegiate environment often leaves one without a sense of what's occuring in the world around them. More specifically, some of us have become so engrossed in our own concerns that we don't even know what time of year it is.

Our own fair city of Farmville is by no means a metropolis, and it should be apparent to all that trees, in this town, are in abundance. But those who spent their formative years in less rural environments are frequently troubled by their inability to spot seasonal change. Deprived of such conventional signs as caterpillars, yellow leaves, and the frost on the pumpkin, these bewildered citizens are quarterly confronted with the problem of ascertaining just exactly when it is what time of year. In an attempt to dispel this sort of confusion I offer the following guide:

AUTUMN

Autumn refers to the period beginning in late September and ending right before January. Its most salient visual characteristic is that white people all over town begin to lose their tans. Another marked feature of this season is that there are white people all over town, a fact worth noting in this context as it signals a mass return from the beaches.

Nubbier, more textured fabrics start to make an appearance and shoes become more bootlike.

Politicians begin to spout brightly hued wild promises, but it is unwise to pick them, particularly early in the season, and on the whole, one is far safer in sticking to the cultivated varieties.

WINTER

Rumored to be a season separating autumn and spring, winter is, in this particular region of the temperate zone, a rather mythical figure. This quicksilver season has

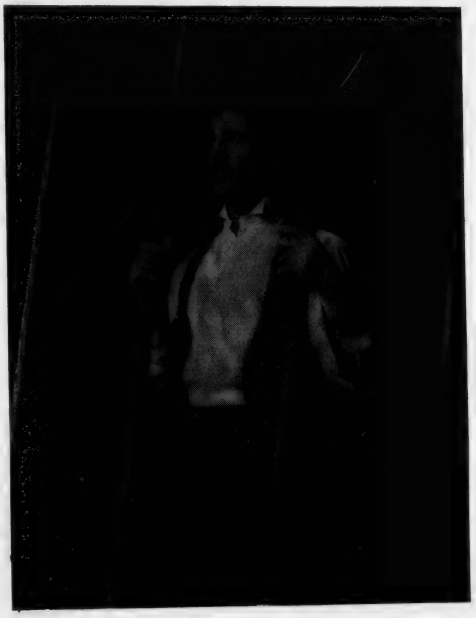
The Art Of Pessimism

by Frank Raio

It has been a rough week. I am not in a very good mood. I sprained my ankle and I got dumped by one of Longwood's many blondes. The professors of this fine institution have done their part to shave my buzz this week and I am hungover. Now I shall write this week's column. You can read it if you want to, I don't care.



I hate when two politicians face each other and the nation, each armed with completely opposite statistics about the same issue. I hate all the trash that accompanies political campaigns; this trash comes from journalists as well as politicians. Who cares about Vice-presidential nominee Ferraro's husband? I don't care, but if the press feeds me enough of his tax records and the like, I'm sure that I will hate him too.

I dislike all federal programs that do not directly help me or somebody whom I do no hate. I abhor the federal government when it withholds transportation funds from states who do not raise their drinking age to twenty-one. National government-pressured fifty-five mile per hour speed limits similarly piss me off. I despise the constant attempts at passing legislation that is anti-abortion, anti-birth control, anti-homosexuality or pro-prayer in public schools. The interest groups who are making our representatives take these actions and the representative who bend under this pressure make me vomit. May the fleas of one thousand camels infest the bodies of all involved in this "legislation of morality."

I bum out on the federal deficit. I am sick of hearing all the complaints about the debt and the non-action of the entire country in dealing with this future crushing problem. I loathe the Soviet leadership. The amount of money being spent on arts by the super-powers stinks. History has made the Russians paranoid and ideaology makes the Soviets aggressive. Thus they race militarily. Nature has given Americans brains to figure this out. Thus we race. This I hate.

I still hate England for blowing us off and going to the 1980 Olympics in Moscow. I will always hate Japan for earning billions in the U.S. (on cars, stereos, computers, and floppy discs) and still refusing to pay their share towards the NATO defense budget. I hate Romania for giving Nadia Comaniche steriods, thereby causing her to become a moose when she grew up.

There, I feel much better now. I used by alloted Rotunda space to get out all of my frustrations. It saved me from having to write about political campaigns and postponed the inevitable visit from the men in the white jackets. I am now ready to face another week in the cruel world of Longwood and beyond.

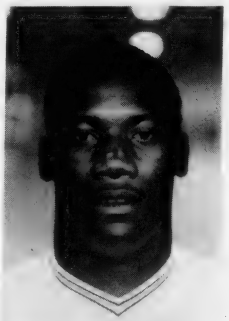
IAA Update

The Intramural Athletic Association continues onward this week with such sports as flag football, bowling, indoor soccer, and volleyball.

Last week, the finals of men's flag football took place with Encore being crowned as the champions. Encore defeated the Zuchinni's (PI KAPPS) for the second time in three tough matches tow in the title.

Women's flag football continues this week with 20 teams competing for the title.

The finals of men's bowling took place on-Monday with the Strikers and Pinheads playing for the championship. There will also be a match for third place between the Keggess (SPE) and the Crows (AXP).



Men's Indoor Soccer gets underway Monday, 10/15 with 9 teams signed up.

Entry blanks for women's volleyball will be due on Thursday 10/18, and a mandatory captains meeting will be held at 6:30 in the IAA room in Lankford on the same evening.

The next weekend tournament will be held on 10/20-21 with competition in coed pool and coed badminton (mixed doubles). Entry blanks will be due on 10/17 with a meeting at 6:30 inthe IIA room in Lankford.

Lancer's Kersey Has Bright Future With NBA

Impressed by three solid performances in exhibition contests, Portland head coach Jack Ramsey said

Jerome Kersey

Thursday night that it appears former Longwood cager Jerome Kersey has a future in the National Basketball Association.

In Thursday's 139-97 victory by Portland over the Los Angeles Lakers Kersey scored 16 points, grabbed six rebounds, handed out four assists and made three steals in just 28 minutes of action.

After the contest Ramsey predicted success for the 6'7", 215-pound rookie, whom the Blazers chose in the second round of the NBA draft.

"On a day-to-day basis Kersey had made tremendous progress," said Ramsey. "He plays with great ability and instinct. Right now it looks like he has a future in the NBA."

Laker coach Pat Riley also praised Kersey and Portland rookies Steve Colter and Bernard Thompson.

"That's as good a set of rookies as you'll see play in a game like this," said Riley. They all come from solid programs."

Kersey had also played well in Portland's first two exhibition contests against the Utah Jazz, with totals of 14 points and 6 rebounds in one game and 20 points and nine rebounds in the other.

"Jerome is looking very good," Portland Publicity Director John White said earlier last week. "He has really impressed the Portland coaches."

Kersey is one of 14 players battling for a spot on the Blazers 12-man regular season roster. Longwood's all-time scoring and rebounding leader has signed a four-year contract with Portland, with the pact being contingent on him making the team.

Lady Lancers Rank Fourth In Golf; Play Resumes Oct. 22

Sophomore Kimbra Patterson and freshman Tina Barrett led Longwood's women's golf team to a fourth place finish out of 12 teams in the 8th Duke University Invitational Friday through Sunday.

The finish, Longwood's best ever at Duke, reversed last year's 12th place showing. Duke came out on top with a 299-301-300-900 while Longwood notched a 320-318-310-948, beating teams from NC State, Penn State, James Madison, William & Mary, North Carolina-Wilmington and Appalachian State. All six of the aforementioned colleges are Division I.

Patterson, an up and down golfer previously, turned in the top performance of her career with a 78-79-77-234 to tie for 13th out of over 60 golfers. The sophomore was just 12 strokes over par and displayed the consistency she had lacked before.

Barrett also tied for 13th with an 82-78-74-234. Her final round score was even-par. Barrett now has a stroke average of 77.4 for 11 rounds of college golf. Should she continue that pace, Tina will set a new Longwood record for stroke average.

Also contributing to Longwood's strong showing were senior Lanie Gerken 79-80-82-241, freshman Marcia Melone much less staying power than its hearty antecedent and is often difficult to identify.

A few hints of winter's impending arrival may be seen by travelling north to a more metropolitan environment where the popular outdoor fashion shootings of the fall will become sparce and will invariably be replaced by illegal aliens selling oversized pretzels and cold chestnuts.

Along about February, local citizens will grow tired of watching the daily rainstorms and will, almost as one, fly to Florida for some relief. Shortly after their return they will begin to lose their tans, but this is merely an example of the exception proving the rule and should not be taken by the novice as a sign of autumn. It is still winter, so try to regain your bearings by going to Winn-Dixie and determining which out-of-season fruits are the most expensive.

SPRING

Spring is a season whose reputation precedes it and is often found attractive by a more rarefied crowd. Around April, art majors and aesthetic realists begin shedding their sweaters, while in the cities, very constructed young men start to plan next autumn's colors. Property values at the beach rise sharply while the level of reason and good will recedes from the banks.

Newsstands become more delicately tinged as magazine covers once again sport their seasonal pastel look and the word "relationship" is in the air, although fortunately not in the water.

SUMMER

Although the most hard-nosed element maintains that summer is that time which is not winter, it technically describes the interval between spring and autumn, and most quickly manifests itself by a luxuriant growth in VEPCO bills.

A great many adults, stunned by the bountiful harvest of roving street gangs, forget that they look terrible in shorts. Daylight savings time blossoms once more and is welcomed heartily be insomniacs who now have less night to be up all of.

Wits thicken, urban flesh turns a vivid gray, and the word "relationship" is in the water, but not, fortunately, in Farmville.

"Pygmalion" Shows Tonight

The film "Pygmalion" will be shown on Tuesday, October 16 at 7:30 p.m. in Bedford Auditorium as part of the Women in Literature Film Series. The film series is free and open to the public.

Released in 1938, this first film version of George Bernard Shaw's play stars Wendy Hiller as Eliza Doolittle and Leslie Howard as Henry Higgins. Shaw's popular play was later filmed in a musical version entitled "My Fair Lady".

Approximately thirty people from the Farmville community and local high schools and colleges attended the first film in this series, a 1967 version of Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew," on October 3.

The final film in the series, "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof," starring Elizabeth Taylor, Paul Newman, and Richard Burton, will be shown on Thursday, November 1, at 7:30 p.m.

The Women in Literature Film Series is funded by a grant from Duke University, University of North Carolina Women's Studies Research Center.

Dr. Martha E. Cook, Associate Professor of English at Longwood, received a Curriculum Development Award from the Center to develop a course which is being taught for the Senior Seminar in English in the fall semester, 1984. The course focuses on the portrayal of women in British and American poetry, fiction, and drama, by both male and female authors.

Students in the course are reading William Makepeace Thackeray's Vanity Fair in assignments approximating the novel's original publication in monthly installments, in connection with the focus on the study of long novels in the English curriculum at Longwood.

According to Dr. Cook, "The stories by authors such as Ernest Hemingway and Norman Mailer have to date served as the basis for our most exciting class discussions."

Faculty and staff members from Longwood College received three of the ten grants of this type awarded in 1984: Dr. Cook; Dr. Sandra Cross, Assistant Professor of Health and Physical Education, "Women's Health Issues Workshop"; and Meredith L. Strohm, Director of Student Services,and Chester C. Ballard, Assistant Professor of Sociology, "An Across-the Curriculum Examination of Women's Studies Issues." No other single institution received more than one such award.

Lap For Lancers Raises $2,000

The fourth walk-jog-a-thon Laps for the Lancers was held Sunday afternoon around a .4 of a mile course in front of the Rotunda at Longwood, raising nearly $2,000 in pledges for Longwood College Athletics.

An estimated 75 participants took part. Top male runner was Tim Fitzgerald of the wrestling team who completed 25 laps in an hour (10 miles). Another wrestler David Moffett was second with 23 laps

Top female runner was basketball standout Karen Boska with 15 laps (6 miles) completed. Tied with 14 laps were Robin McGowan (cheerleaders), Barbie Burton (basketball) and Sherry Wallace (running for field hockey).

Top individual fund raisers were Lancer Clum members Dr. Carolyn Hodges ($427), and Dr. Carolyn Wells ($200). Hodges and Wells paced the Lancer Club to a total of $810.95 in funds raised.

Top teams in fundraising were the Longwood cheerleaders ($396), women's golf ($246) and women's basketball ($201). Each team receives one-half of its pledge total with the other half going to support the general Athletic Program.

Rotunda: So the actual conservatives in Britain would be somewhat more liberal than conservatives here?

Shreir: They have been up to now, but there is a trend toward a very traditionalist type of conservatism which is trying to go against some of the liberal assumptions and the idea that all thats good in terms of human values can be consigned to the liberal camp. This type of conservative traditionalism also goes against what can be seen as a liberal economic policy on the part of the government. I mean, monatarism is really, in a sense, just an aspect of laiseez-faire which of course is just nineteenth century liberalism so what this type of conservatism in Britain is saying is that there's more to conservatism than a particular point of view of all economics although it would certainly prefer a laissez-faire type of economic (system) to one that involved a lot of state intervention. What's involved with that kind of conservatism is traditional values, religion, respect for the family, respect for certain institutions like the monarchy, the House of Lords, all those wonderful British things that make life seem . . . what do they do? . . . they give you a sense of the natural order and they . . . dignify power.

Rotunda: If the class system is more traditional in Britain, do you see the class system here as being just as traditional in a different way, or is it a totally different thing?

Shreir: I don't know that I've been here long enough to say . . . I don't know about the working class in America really; I haven't seen as much in terms of the sort of spontaneous inclination to divide people into classes in that way. Or in terms of people thinking of themselves as belonging to a certain class, that might be because a lot of the people I've met have been middle classs because you have to pay for your education, whereas there's much more of a system of state aid for education in Britain. So, I don't know, but I would suspect that more working class kids have higher education in Britain, but I might be totally wrong about that. I seems incredibily expensive (to get an education in the U.S.) whereas if you get any kind of grant at all, and almost everyone in Britain does for a first degree, then you automatically get your tuition fees paid.

Rotunda: The student left in the U.S. has been an active force in the country since the mid-sixties; do you see that as a positive force here, and, also, is it an active force in Britain?

Shreir: It's certainly a force in Britain, though it's less viciferous than it was, because a lot of the things around which it can unite, certain fundamental rights and all the rest of it - or what would be seen as fundamental rights - have now been fulfilled. Someone was talking to me about the civil rights movement here, and saying that's why the democrats haven't got anything to sort of cohese around. I think it's inevitable that students are going to be idealistic in those directions. . . I do think actually that it's very easy to be on the left when you're a student and it's not so easy later on. The idea that anything that's on the right is callous, and uncaring, and unfeeling is totally wrong, and I do believe that. . . actually. That sort of consensus which tends to exist in student politics is mistaken because there certainly is a type of conservatism which is not by any means uncaring and unfeeling. I think that when you look at some of the things that are happening in Eastern Europe, you see that the left - left wing politics - can lead to a system which is decidedly uncaring and unfeeling and doesn't cater to human needs at all, and I do believe that.

Rotunda: How so? Specifically where?

Shreir: Checkoslavakia, Russia, the communist world.

Rotunda: How about the free left - the green's in West Germany -is that uncaring?

Shreir: No, I didn't say that the left was necessarily uncaring; some feel that they might be misguided - the left which tends to think that it has a monopoly on morality and on humane attitudes acan turn into a very inhumane system which is precisely what has happened in Central and Eastern Europe. Of course, the Greens and all the rest of it think that they are caring, and most of them are caring. The issue is a pragmatic one, unfortunately; it's not just a moral or an idealistic one. In an ideal world, we wouldn't have nuclear weapons. This isn't an ideal world, and I do think that there are things intrinsic to the communist system which make them belligerent.

Essential to communism is the idea of an enemy -- communism rests very heavily on that and that's how it galvanizes people into action and that's how it gets them to think that everything that's being done is for the people, when very often, if not always, it's for the state.

Shreir: I think that there are people in Britain who do genuinely respect democratic institutions and constitutional government and all the rest of it. There are a lot who don't, but once you get to calling yourself a Marxist if you look carefully at what Marx said then the tendency toward totalitarianism is all there, and it isn't just heresy.

Rotunda: In regards to the student left, are you saying that they aren't able to see the actual drudgery and financial realities of the world, and as they grow older, they do, and become somewhat more conservative?

Shreir: I don't think it's just the drudgery and the financial reality. I think it has much more to do with values, and I think there is a tendency when you're young to reject all sorts of ideas. To say that, I jknow sounds terribly patronizing. But we've all done it, or most of us have done it, in some way. It's not surprising. I think that the type of idealism that seems totally harmless when you're a student - when your're young - can have extremely dangerous consequences especially when it degenerates into dogma and into an ideology and you get a system which, far from being free, is in fact enslaved to an ideology which is far worse than being constrained by certain laws and institutions.

Rotunda: Did the socialist system in Britain grow out of a certain liberalism?

Shreir: I think not, I think that it would like very much to distinguish itself from liberalism and to be seperate. Because of very different beliefs. Although a lot of them, as I asaid, would respect certain liberal institutions and political processes. It is quite a different view, liberalism is very individualistic, socialism is to do with the corporate body and the general good, supposedly. Also, totally different views of human nature, of historical processes and all the rest of it on it. So it is quite distinct.

In many ways, theoretically, there is more in comon in terms of an attitude towards history between socialism and conservatism than between (socialism and) liberalism. Liberals thank that there are these immutable human values and institutions and immutable human nature. That is quite different from conservatism and socialism which would think that human nature and political processes that are built on it have dtermined in some sense historically. I think certainly the movement whith the socialists in Britain would not want to be called liberals.

Rotunda: Would they want to be called Conservatives?

Shreir: Certainly not. One of the ironies that is not well-known is that the Soviet Union which is one of the most conservative governments there is. It is incapable of changing and that is one of the problems of being, as I put it, of being ensalved to an ideology.

Rotunda: Where does feminism fit into all this? Why is the feminist movement traditionally in the left?

Shreir: I have a lot of sympathy with feminism, but not when it becomes an ideology such that women are so worried about being ideologically sound that they are as much trapped as they thought they were being trapped by men. That is what actually happens.

Rotunda: So, the feminist force is actually detrimental to the cause?

Shreir: No it's not necessarily detrimental, it's the form it often takes that is detrimental. There is nothing wrong with women doing more and seeing themselves as equal, if different from men. There is something wrong with thinking that everytime you put on a dress or talk to a man you might be doing something ideologically unsound.

Rotunda: So the extremism is the problem?

Shreir: Yes, it is difficult to talk about the extremism because in England you tend to distinguish between socialist feminism and radical feminism. Socialist feminism is feminism that thinks everything will be resolved for women if you have socialism, and radical feminism is feminism in which you think sexual politics are more fundamental. I don't think that I fit into either of these categories. Although, like a conservative, as a conservative . . . I think that you won't resolve everything by an economic system . . . I think that social life and human relations is far more fundamental than economics and would be changed fundamentally by economics, if you want to change it.

English Program Emphasizes Major Works

Great works of literature, which traditionally have been shunned in college English classes because of their imposing length, are making a comeback at Longwood College.

The National Endowment for the Humanities aided that comeback recently when it awarded a $28,000 grant to Longwood's freshman English program. The grant will build upon a pilot program last spring in which freshmen were required to read and "know well" a major novel.

The grant, awarded by NEH's Division of Education Programs, provided funds beginning in January 1985 to support additional research into classic literary texts, a visit to campus by a major scholar who will work with faculty and students, and a series of workshops to strengthen the techniques for teaching literature. The Longwood Foundation is also contributing $7,000 to the expanded program. Dr. Ellery Sedgwick, assistant professor of English, will direct the program.

The key element of the grant is the extended study of a major literary work in English 101, a composition and literature course taught by the Department of English, Philosophy and Foreign Languages. Teaching the work serially—as many literature classics were first published—encourages more thorough, lasting knowledge of the classics which have shaped Western culture, say the people involved in the program.

"Under the traditional approach to teaching literature, everything was retrospective," said Sedgwick. "The students would read the work and then come back into the classroom and discuss it retrospectively. But this way, they will be developing their insights while they are still reading the book. Instead of being told by the teacher what it means, we will discover the themes as we go along."

The tendency in freshman English classes has been toward shorter works, such as short stories and poems, and therefore only upper-level English students were exposed to major works," said Sedgwick. "So many of the major works in British and American literature are big. They shouldn't be excluded simply on their length. We feel that these important works should be brought back into the curriculum."

The selected work for the spring semester will be Bleak House, a novel by Charles Dickens. Last spring semester, another Dickens novel, the classic David Copperfield, was read by the 500-plus freshmen in English 101.

One advantage of the program is that some 500 to 600 students will be reading and discussing the same classic work throughout a semester.

"One thing that appeals to us is that everyone will be reading a long piece of literature together," Sedgwick said. "They can discuss it in their dorm rooms or in the dining hall or wherever. We want them to become immersed in the culture of that era."

"We'll have speakers come here from time to time to discuss the work and its cultural, historical and social background. I believe strongly in presenting a novel in its cultural context. In the past, the cultural background wasn't given enough attention."

In addition to reading a major work, students in English 101 will continue to study other shorter works of literature and to write essays to sharpen their composition skills. The course is required of all four-year students at Longwood.

Longwood's small classes, which allow for critical analysis and discussion by students, and the fact that all full-time members of the department teach in the freshman program, were important elements in the grant application's appeal to NEH. The grant proposal emphasizes a coordinated teaching of research techniques and will add new resources to Longwood's library collection. Although the funding is finite, "we hope that the program will have a continuing effect on the way we teach," said Sedgwick.

Yearbook Publication Studied

by Lisa Jessup

Although there is student interest in the Virginian, Longwood's yearbook, communication problems plague its recovery.

Phyllis Mable, Vice-President of Student Affairs, said the Student Government Association (SGA) was looking to see if students wanted a yearbook or not. An SGA goal for the year was to survey students on whether or not they would pay ten dollars for a yearbook. Randy Chittum, SGA President, was uncertain of the survey's progress.

A freshman who showed an interest in the yearbook, Wendy Staples, conducted a survey of approximately 500 students during dinner in Blackwell Dining Hall. Of those 500 students, 350 said they would purchase a yearbook at ten dollars and 150 students said they would not.

Staples has a few people with high school yearbook experience willing to begin work on the student's activity fee, but the student fees were not enough to cover the cost of the yearbooks—consequently, yearbooks had to be sold.

Another problem was a lack of staff. Carolyn Tinsley, a staff member of previous yearbooks, said, "The sky was the limit. We could do anything we wanted but there weren't enough people." Chittum said the problem was not getting students to work on the yearbook as much as getting students to buy them.

Last year, the Virginian was not published. Instead, a few seniors organized a booklet picturing graduating seniors which was handed out at graduation.

Ms. Mable believes a lot of students probably would like to have a yearbook as a memory of their college days. She also said, "Some students see a yearbook as extra baggage—if they have to pay for it then forget it."

As to the present state of the Virginian, Ms. Mable said, "No one opposes the yearbook, nor is anyone pushing for one."

Virginian, but is waiting to see what effect her survey will have in getting the ball rolling.

Teresa Hasty, a Student member of the Publications Board, said the first step is to get an advisor and a business manager. Then a budget for the yearbook is needed to present to the Publications Board.

The Virginian is funded through Student Activities Fees. However, the deadline for an organization to make an appeal to the Student Activities Fees Committee was October 17th. Chittum, who is not worried over missing the deadline, said, "There will still be some (money) left over."

Staples, who was not aware of the deadline nor that an advisor and business manager were needed, said that Chittum was to handle things once she knew that people were interested in a yearbook. Chittum said he was not aware of this arrangement.

One major problem with past Virginians was the fact that the cost of the yearbook was supposed to be included in a

Standing Tall in a Milk Pail

Ronald Reagan may have more forethought than any of us ever expected. Since 1980, the President has been acting to strengthen the U.S. economy through supply-side economics, which, he claims, has lowered inflation as well as unemployment.

Yet Reagan's current plan will do more for the U.S. economy than any petty tax cut. It will bolster our economy and make the national debt seem less important. It might even solidify national pride, and it will be a superb post-birth method of population control. The man-of-the-hour's answer to the nations? War, man, war!

And Mr. Reagan isn't fooling around. Just last winter the CIA was mining Nicaragua's harbors, and now over 1,900 U.S. troops (as compared to a handful of advisers two years ago) are residing in Central America. Already, "joint military exercises" between the U.S. and Honduras involving nearly 6,000 U.S. soldiers have been conducted in that nation. Already, airfields have been expanded to enable "our boys" to land safely just miles away from Nicaragua. In addition, military bases were established during the exercises and conveniently left standing. Already the CIA has spent over seventy million dollars in "covert operations".

There's no sense in fooling around in Nicaragua as we did in Vietnam two decades ago—let's reelect Reagan and get it over with. I've always wanted to see Central America anyway. Let's not be hypocrites about it either—like we were in Vietnam—let's call it a full-scale, all-out military invasion. Get in there and win one for the Gipper, you know how it is. Or if you don't, Reagan certainly does: if we're real Americans, we'll support him to the bloody end.

Enough of that babble: The thrust of the Reagan administration's foreign policy is hostile to our adversaries and alarming to increasing numbers of our allies. It is increasingly obvious that Reagan's version of foreign policy has, over the past four years, crept into a kind of senile paranoia. Nicaragua begins to look more and more like Reagan's version not only of Vietnam but also of Afghanistan. He continues to make unrealistic claims that the "reds are coming," yet he has been unable to show conclusive proof that the Soviets or the Cubans are supplying arms to Nicaragua in numbers even close to the rate at which we are supplying arms, training, and troops.

Ronald Reagan has done more to arouse the hostilities of countless nations than any U.S. President in decades, even arousing the hostility of many of our European allies. Were we to continue on this course for "four more years," Reagan's aggressive style may likely lead us into war in Central America if not elsewhere in the world. Reagan's belligerence in foreign relations, notably the lesser in the four months before election day, may well result in a fate contrasting sharply with this psychotic, standing tall image which Reagan seems to feel is necessary for the United States.

Americans aren't as hostile as the Reagan administration believes. I hope, at least, that U.S. citizens aren't willing to see their country become illegally involved in the affairs of another nation yet again. Too many died the first time, and the next would see thousands more die on the battlefields. This is the point to which Reagan seems perfectly willing to lead. But are we willing to follow. . . . .

If Reagan wants to go fight the commies, somebody give him a plane ticket and a water pistol. Not an election.

Your Turn

To the Editor:

Longwood's newly formed Dining Hall Committee is a body of students chosen to discuss food service problems. Two students from each class were chosen by class presidents.

The committee has already met with the new Dining Hall Director Rick Johnson twice, and will continue to do so on a bi-weekly basis. In our first two encounters Johnson proved himself willing to discuss student's grievances in a candid atmosphere.

In our first two meetings much was discussed and resolved. The committee made a proposal that hot breakfast be served from 7:30-8:30 a.m. instead of 7:00-8:00 a.m. The dining hall would still remain open from 7:00 until 9:00 with only the hot breakfast period shifting. This idea would seem to better accommodate students with 8 and/or 9 a.m. classes. Also discussed was the feasibility and efficiency of the family-style eating arrangement. Family-style is now only in operation at dinner, but administrative pressure is pushing for a resumption of family-style in the upper dining hall during lunch time. The only reason it hasn't been imposed is the lack of student workers. Instead of our committee making any arbitrary decisions it was decided that the issues should be decided by the students. On Wednesday, October 24 in the New Smoker a vote will be held on the breakfast issue, and a simple plurality will decide it. Also on the ballot students will be polled to discover whether family-style or cafeteria dining accommodations are perferred.

ARA/Slater's main gripe with students is the disinterest of students to bus their own tables. It was agreed that past gimmicks used have not helped to solve the problem. The only new idea proposed was that stack carts could be sectionalized in the cafeteria. The rationale is that students wouldn't have to walk as far with their trays, and could avoid the congestion of the regular depository areas. Since the proposed carts would have to be purchased administrative approval is still pending.

The Dining Hall Committee is here to represent the students. It's not going to be able to change the food service to everybody's liking, but it can bargain for reasonable substantive and qualitative changes. Students with specific gripes or problems can take them to either Rick Johnson or myself. Any reasonable suggestions may also be sent to Box 867.

The Threepenny Opera: A Review

by Jeff Abernathy

The Longwood Players' production of Bertolt Brecht's The Threepenny Opera offered some of the best performances the college has seen in a good while, arguably since the 1982 production of Red Ryder in addition, however, the musical exhibited some very weak performances and some very obvious repetitions of character-types.

1984 Best-Actor Recipient, Vince Decker, playing the lead role of MacHeath, portrayed the villain with few flaws; however, direction seems to have made the character sinister in a cute manner, and not in an evil one, as was the playwright's intention. The audience is led to sympathize with MacHeath, whose numerous crimes nearly lead to his death, and we aren't able to evaluate him in an objective fashion, as Brecht would have desired.

Aside from this, Decker took on a tough role and handled it well. MacHeath's disposition changes by the minute, which makes the role a difficult one for any actor. Given this, Decker created a very believable character. The audience was not thrown off as MacHeath intermittently changed from a raging tyrant to a supposedly starry-eyed lover in a few short moments. There is reason enough here to credit Decker with the best performance in The Threepenny Opera. In addition, however, Decker's singing voice has vastly improved since the few short lines he sang in 1983's Imaginary Invalid. His voice was stronger than any of the others on stage. Thus, despite flaws which may have come from direction, Decker's performance in the musical was superb.

Female lead Sophia Paulette, in her first major role at Longwood, played Polly Peachum, a young innocent who has fallen in love with MacHeath. Paulette's acting was particularly good in the second scene of the First Act, in which she "marries" MacHeath. She played off of Decker's lines well in this scene, and the rendition of "Pirate Jenny" was her best of the show.

Paulette has a good voice, yet she was unable to project fully in many of her songs. The audience was, at times, straining to hear. The "Jealousy Duet" with Natalie Thompson as Lucy Brown lacked intensity. Neither actress was able to pace the duet properly; it was performed much too slow.

Laura Coombs was melodramatic in the role of Mrs. Peachum. She seemed to be playing to the audience and not working with the other actors on stage. There was a nearly audible sigh as she finished each line, and Jerry Dagenhart, in the role of Mr. J. J. Peachum, was forced to make up for the inadequacies.

Dagenhart carried the Outfit Shop scenes. Where other actors were weak he was able to continue the momentum. The musical's first scene is the best example of Dagenhart's work. When it started too slow, he increased the pace and entertained the audience where other actors were failing. If there was a difficulty with Dagenhart's performance, it was that he tends to be overbearing on the stage. While this isn't always objectionable to the audience, it may impose on less experienced actors. In many scenes of The Threepenny Opera, however, Dagenhart's boisterous performance was both enjoyable and necessary.

Connie Watkins played the prostitute Jenny impressively. Her acting was critical to the Brothel scenes, as was her singing. Watkins was cast well in this part.

Jeff Fleming, playing Tiger Brown, was effective in his first performance at Longwood. His singing voice was especially good in the "Army Song". He was well suited to the nervous police commissioner.

The musical was able to entertain the audience consistently over the nearly three-hour performance. Props were done well excepting minor problems such as misspellings on the Street Singer's easel and the inclusion of "Honor Code Violation" on the listing of MacHeath's crimes.

The Threepenny Opera reminds one of past Longwood Players' productions, for more than one of the actors has played a part strikingly similar to the one he or she played in this musical. If the intent of the productions is to enable students to learn the act of acting, repetitiously casting individuals for similar parts defeats such intent. If the actors plan to make careers of acting, such casting serves to limit the scope of their talent by neglecting some aspects of it. Actors end up in a rut before they complete the training which is intended to expand them. Running in circles is fun, but it doesn't get you anywhere.

The Longwood Players staged a worthy production in The Threepenny Opera. Hopefully improvements will be evident in the year's remaining productions.

To Have and Do Not

by Eric H. Houseknecht

Originally, I had every intention of writing an article this week. I just couldn't think of anything to write. I saw my editor on Friday night and he suggested that I comb the campus and do a party review. The idea of evaluating Longwood's social scene on a Friday night appealed to me. Unfortunately, seventy-five percent of the student population packed up and left this weekend. So I convinced myself that my schedule could not, at this time, accommodate such a task, seeing as how I was up to my ears in oversleeping, unfounded rumors, and superficial friendships. I retired to my room to peruse the remains of last Sunday's paper.

Browsing through the "Arts and Leisure" section, I came across an article describing the negotiation of a book deal by a writer of commercial fiction. The book in question has not yet been written. On the basis, however, of the reputation of the author and the expertise of the agent, the book-to-be was sold for the gratifying sum of one million dollars. The following week the same agent sold the same nonexisting book for the same exact figure to, as they say, the movies.

I mulled the situation over for a while. I've gone to great pains this year just to be prolific enough to churn out one article a week. Obviously, I've been going about this whole business in the wrong way. Not writing, it turns out, is not only fun but also quite profitable. I wrote a note to myself to call that literary agent on Monday and tell him that I have several unwritten books available for purchasing—maybe as many as ten.

I spent the remainder of the evening filled with an uneasy greed. My sister called and we discussed this and other matters at some length. When it came time to hang up, I did so reluctantly, being well aware of how important talking on the phone was to my newly lucrative career of not writing.

On Saturday I forged ahead and, by absolute imposition of will, spent the entire day not writing a single word. Instead I attended an exhibit of the work of a local professor and artist. In happy contemplation of my impending wealth, I asked another observer of these works about the prices of some of the attractively displayed pictures. His answer left me only mildly shocked and it was at this point that I decided to diversify—to become more visual.

Not writing was fine for the acquisition of a little capital but the real money was, it seemed to me, in not painting. No longer was I going to allow myself to be confined to one form. I now was not going to work in two mediums.

Inspired by my new discovery, I began to look at things in an entirely new light. While driving through the countryside I was struck by the thought that among the things I cultivate, land is not one of them. I made another note to contact the Department of Agriculture and notify them that I am presently not growing any wheat. I know that the acreage around Cox is small but it should be worth something. And while I'm at it I might as well try the Welfare Department. I don't have a job either. That ought to bring in a few bucks.

So I did not paint—piece of cake. I grew no wheat—simple. I even remained unemployed—no problem. And when it came to not writing I was the best, an old pro. Except where there's a deadline to be met; then I falter. But this piece was due. There are others to think of and obligations to be met. But as the more observant among you will notice, I have exercised a modicum of restraint. This article is short—much too short. I couldn't help it. I needed the money. If you're going to do something you might as well do it halfway. After all, business is business.

Mondale Turns To Students For Votes

(CPS)—Heartened by what supporters term "exceptional" and "very receptive" student audiences at several recent campus appearances, the Mondale campaign is trying to woo the elusive student vote with a renewed vigor, campaign organizers report.

The new strategy, however, aims at a sector of the population that rarely votes, and that seems to be swinging toward President Ronald Reagan, observers point out.

Moreover, the head of the nationwide College Democrats group thinks much of the campaign's new student focus is "hogwash," adding the Mondale troops in reality are not doing anything different from what they've been doing for months.

Nevertheless, "Mondale is definitely interested in getting our message to (college students)," says Gary Brickman, national youth coordinator for the Mondale/Ferraro campaign.

"Mondale has been speaking on quite a few college campuses, and he's really been getting a lot better response than earlier on in the campaign," Brickman claims.

As a result, he says, "we're starting to focus on the campus vote and get-out-the-vote programs."

The strategy change, Brickman says, came after Mondale's September speech at the University of Southern California, which was punctuated by repeated heckles and jeers from Reagan supporters.

But the hecklers only provoked Mondale into making one of his best speeches, Brickman says, injecting some excitement and controversy into the appearance.

National press coverage of the event also helped boost Mondale's campus image, particularly after several of the hecklers admitted they were part of an organized effort to interrupt the speech, Brickman adds.

Although an October 5th New York Times Poll shows President Reagan heavily favored among college-aged voters, Mondale supporters say the USC speech gave new life to his campus campaign.

The following week Mondale got another unexpected lift during a well-received speech at George Washington University in Washington, D.C.

"When he went to George Washington and got such an outstanding reception," Brickman says, "it really helped pick up" Mondale's interest in the student vote.

As a result of the USC and George Washington speeches, "Mondale's campus campaign is a little more visible now, and we're picking up (the campus campaign) as we get closer to the election."

Among other things, Mondale will squeeze more campus appearances into his schedule in the weeks before the election, and send other Democratic leaders to campaign for him.

Mondale headquarters recently released press releases for National Student Voter Registration Day, asserting "students will vote in significant numbers to put an end to Reagan's underestimate of your generation."

"Your generation will decide this race," one of Mondale's prepared statements said. "For Ronald Reagan to think that you don't care about your own futures—care about cuts in loans for education and most of all about nuclear war—is sheer arrogance."

Former presidential candidates Gary Hart, George McGovern, Jesse Jackson, and Alan Cranston—who themselves garnered sizable campus followings during their campaigns—will be speaking on Mondale's behalf at a number of schools, Brickman says, although he couldn't list any specific campuses.

Jackson and Hart already have begun courting the student vote for Mondale at a number of recent campus visits, however.

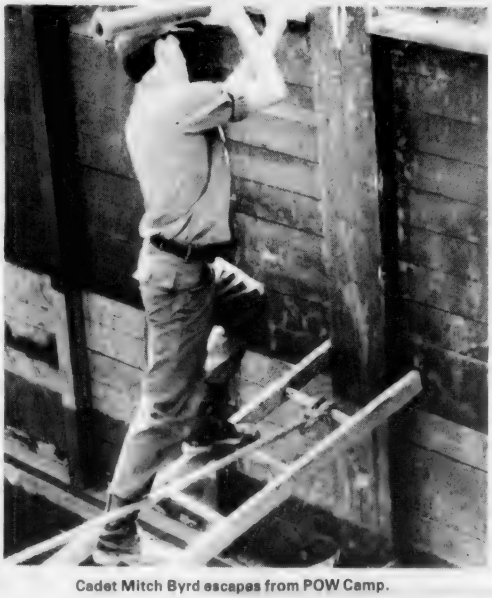
"Young people are really beginning to look at the issues," says Bill Morton, president of the College Democrats in Washington, D.C.

"And Mondale's speech at George Washington was a turning point for his campus campaign," he adds.

But Morton says the talk of a great new drive to get the college vote is "absolute hogwash," a ploy to get more media attention.

Mondale's campus vote movement has been in full swing for months, Morton says, relying on voter registration efforts, speeches by Hart and Jackson, and campus appearances by Mondale's son and daughter at such schools as the State University of New York at Albany, Cal-Santa Barbara and Texas.

Vice Presidential candidate Geraldine Ferraro, too, has campaigned at Memphis State, Vanderbilt and Akron, among others.



Cadets Travel To Fort Lee

On September 22, 1984 fifty-eight Longwood ROTC cadets traveled to Fort Lee, Va. where they met a group of cadets from the University of Richmond. Jointly these cadets would conduct and undergo training at both the Leadership Reaction Course and at the Confidence Course. The training which took place was a learning experience for both the MSIV's (senior year cadets) and the MSIII's (junior cadets). It gave the MSIV's their first chance to conduct and evaluate training, and it gave the MSIII's a brief glimpse of what ROTC advanced camp is like.

The Leadership Reaction Course, (LRC), is designed to test a cadet's ability to lead a group of men through on obstacle using only the material at hand and the combined ability of the group. Each cadet is given the opportunity to be the squad leader during one of the ten different situations. They are then evaluated and critiqued by one of the MSIV graders. The cadets are evaluated on a scale of 1 to 5 in each of the following areas; administrative control, communication skills, decisiveness, delegation, enthusiasm, initiative judgment, planning, problem-analysis and teamwork. It is this evaluation which allows the MSIV's to assess the cadet's weaknesses, so as to best prepare them for advanced camp.

While the LRC tested a cadet's mental ability, the confidence course was a test of his endurance. The MSIII cadets remained in the same squads they had been in for the LRC, however they were joined by an MSIV grader who would guide them through the 24 obstacle course. His purpose was to keep the squad motivated and to make sure that they worked together, thus ensuring that every squad member completed the course safely.

The LRC and the confidence course are just the beginning of a full year of training for the MSIII cadets. Before the year's end, the MSIII cadets will be proficient in leadership dimensions, land navigation, use of the M16 rifle and the M60 machine gun, squad tactics, drill and ceremony, and physical training. It is up to the MSIV cadets to maintain the high standard of training which was given by last year's MSIV's for these MSIII's to excel at advanced camp.

Cadet Mitch Byrd escapes from POW Camp.

CAMPUS CLIPS

"Miracle Producer to Speak"

Mary MacCracken, author of A Circle of Children and Lovey, A Very Special Child, will speak at Longwood College on Thursday, October 25, at 8 p.m. in the Red/White/Green Rooms of the Lankford Building.

The public is cordially invited to hear Ms. MacCracken's address. Her topic is "A Safe Place to Grow." Following the address, there will be a reception in the Gold Room of Lankford Building.

Mary MacCracken has been described as a producer of "what were once called miracles." For more than 20 years, she has worked with children who have been judged "difficult to impossible"—children with problems ranging from learning disabilities and social maladjustments to serious emotional disturbances like autism.

Much of Ms. MacCracken's time is spent in diagnosis of learning disabilities and emotional problems and in consultation with families and schools. She has worked in both public and private schools and is presently in private practice as an educational therapist in Englewood, New Jersey.

Her formula focuses on "teaching the whole child" and giving the young learner self-esteem along with academic skills. "If you feel terribly bad and troubled you're not going to be able to learn," she said. "A teacher has to deal with both."

She states that teaching time and effort "should be 90 percent to the child's strong points and only 10 percent on remediation of weaknesses... The child must be successful or he won't go on to the next task."

Ms. MacCracken's first two books—A Circle of Children and Lovey, A Very Special Child—won American Library Association awards, have been published in 21 countries, and were made into television specials for CBS.

Her latest book, City Kid, won the 1982 Educator's Award as "a book which may influence future directions in the teaching profession." It also is being developed as a TV special.

In 1979, Ms. MacCracken was honorary chairperson for the National Mental Health Association and received an award citing her "outstanding contribution to a better understanding of childhood mental health."

Ms. MacCracken's address is part of Longwood's Teacher Education Centennial celebration and is co-sponsored by the local chapter of Delta Kappa Gamma Society International and the Farmville chapter of the Longwood Alumni Association.

Campuses Reluctantly Okay Porn Flicks

Several campuses once again have opted to approve using campus funds and facilities to run pornographic movies during the last month.

Most recently, University of Virginia President Frank Hereford has refused a National Organization of Women (NOW) invitation to view the movie "Deep Throat."

NOW wanted to enlist Hereford's support in banning the film from UVA, where it was shown as a fundraiser for the Phi Sigma Kappa fraternity two weeks ago.

Hereford, in a letter to Cynthia Taylor, president of the Charlottesville, Va., NOW chapter, said that while he "personally abhors this kind of thing," he feared banning the film would violate the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, Taylor reports.

Also fearing it'd quash free speech, an Indiana University dorm student government last week approved a motion to let students keep showing X-rated movies in the dorm.

The week before, 25 University of Iowa protestors tried to disrupt a campus showing of a movie called "Peeping Tom."

The anti-pornography forces have won a few times. The manager of a University of Texas at El Paso campus pub recently ordered the pub's pay TV channel turned off at 10 p.m., when SelecTV switches to blue movie programming.

"This is a very complex issue of values," NOW's Taylor replies. "Hereford claims the school won't do anything that is against community standards, but in Charlottesville, this is against community standards."

She maintains "the cost of human dignity is too great to show this type of film on public grounds of a state school, especially as a fundraiser."

Taylor also sees the issue as "the last bastion of men against women at a university."

The courts, however, have been quick to rule against those who would ban movies, books or other forms of popular culture.

In a May, 1983 landmark case, a Michigan federal judge forced Grand Valley State College administrators to pay the $250 rental fee for a X-rated film a student group wanted to show.

The college routinely had paid film rental fees in the past, but didn't want to fund a pornographic film.

Even student groups have shied away from outright bannings. In the last six months, student politicians at Penn, Hawaii, Arizona State and even Virginia rejected measures that would have barred X-rated films.

Hoping to steer a middle course, the Cal-Santa Barbara student government in 1983 voted to allow showing pornographic films, but to require they be preceded by a 10-minute educational program on the subject.

Artist of the Month Named

Christy Crews Dunn, a junior art major from Victoria, is Longwood College's Artist of the Month for October.

Her award-winning work is a pen-and-ink drawing entitled "Brown's Landing." It is the artist's representation of a certain spot, located at Brown's Landing, NC, which she says "always induces a meditative mood in me. With a few liberties with time, space, and 'terraforming,' I have tried to give the viewer some of what I have received."

Mrs. Dunn received a cash award of $50, and her drawing is on display in the first floor hallway of the Bedford Art Building at Longwood through October 31.

Mrs. Dunn is interested in many forms of art, including crafts, graphics, calligraphy, photography, and painting, as well as drawing. She hopes to be an independent studio artist, working in a variety of media.

The Artist of the Month competition is open to all students taking art classes at Longwood; the winning work is selected by members of the art faculty. Through the program, more than $1,200 has been awarded to young artists of extraordinary ability.

Second place in this month's competition went to Renie Triarhous for her hand-pieced and hand-quilted quilt square, "Colonial Rising Star," Third place went to Robin Brown for her ink-and-pencil drawing on handmade paper, entitled "Innocence of Youth."

Washington Journalist To Speak

Charles Corddry, Washington-based defense correspondent for The Baltimore Sun, will speak at Longwood College on Wednesday, October 24, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium.

The topic of Corddry's lecture is "Foreign Policy and Presidential Politics 1984." The public is invited to attend the lecture at no charge.

Corddry and his wife, Marion, are Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellows and will be on the Longwood campus the week of October 21-26. They will visit classes and talk with students in groups and individually.

Charles Corddry has been a journalist for 43 years, covering military and foreign affairs for United Press International before joining The Sun's Washington bureau in 1967.

He reported on the early missile and space activities at Cape Canaveral; the North Atlantic Treaty Organization during most of its 30-year history; numerous Cold War crises in Berlin, Cuba, etc.; the Korean War; SALT I and II; and the 1967 and 1973 Middle East wars.

Since March of 1967, he has been a panelist on WASHINGTON WEEK IN REVIEW, public television's longest-running program.

Marion Corddry is a public relations consultant and freelance writer. She has worked for several educational and medical institutions, including American University and the George Washington Medical Center. Her interests include the economics of health, the hospice movement, commercial art and graphics, business writing and magazine journalism.

The Corddrys were originally scheduled to visit Longwood last spring, but their visit had to be postponed because of Corddry's illness.

The major purpose of the Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellows Program is to bring students into contact with successful professionals who can relate what is learned in academic courses to the professional world.

Paintings and Ceramics On Exhibit

Recent work by Randall Edmonson, acting head of Longwood College's art department, is on exhibit in the college's Bedford Gallery through November 14.

The exhibit features paintings and ceramics. The paintings are done in acrylics and are what the artist describes as "hard-edge geometric abstracts."

The ceramics on display include "both functional and sculptural stoneware forms," Edmonson said.

Edmonson has taught painting, ceramics, and design at Longwood since 1979. He holds the B.A. degree in art from Drury College in Missouri, the M.A. in design from the University of Missouri, and the Master of Fine Arts in painting and ceramics from Southern Illinois University.

His work is exhibited regularly in regional and national exhibitions; he has received purchase awards at the Mid-America Biennial exhibition and at the Virginia Watercolor Society's exhibition last year.

Edmonson's paintings are included in museum and college collections, as well as numerous private collections, throughout the United States.

Gymnasts in Exhibition

By Jim Winkler

The 1984-85 edition of the Longwood gymnastics team will perform in an exhibition Wednesday night at 7:30 in Lancer Hall. This year's team includes six returnees from last season and six freshmen.

Returnees from last year include senior Dayna Hankinson, a former All-American, juniors Lisa Zuraw and Kelly Strayer and sophomores Kerri Hruby, Debbe Malin, and Shay Woolfolk. Strayer competed in the NCAA Division II Nationals last year and holds the school record in floor exercises (9.2) and all-around (34.45). Zuraw holds the record on bars (8.7).

Interim head coach Debby Whorley feels the Longwood team has a set of good freshmen gymnasts as well. Newcomers to the team are Tammy Zeller, Diane McIlwain, Mary Schaefer, Dawn Campbell, Leslie Jaffee and Teresa Robey.

The Lancers will host an intersquad meet November 14 at Lancer Hall, but will not begin the season until January 19 at George Washington. The Lancers first home meet will be against Radford January 29.

Head coach Ruth Budd will rejoin the team in January when she returns from a five-month trip to Finland.

The exhibition Wednesday will be the team's first "full performance" of the year.

Two goals from Tim Ford propelled Longwood to a 4-0 VISA Eastern Division win over Virginia Wesleyan Saturday afternoon, but the Lancers won't have long to savor their ninth soccer victory of the season.

Wednesday Longwood visits Radford for a 3:00 p.m. clash and coming up Saturday and Sunday is the Gobbler Classic at Virginia Tech. Longwood plays the Hokies at 3:00 p.m. Saturday while powerful West Virginia Wesleyan meets Western Carolina at 1:00 p.m. The championship game will be at 3:00 p.m. Sunday and the consolation at 1:00 p.m.

Coach Rich Posipanko's team is now 9-3-2 overall and ranked 20th in last week's Division II soccer poll. The Lancers are 2-1-1 in VISA Eastern Division games and still in the chase for a berth in the state playoffs.

Ford, who now has five assists and 11 goals, scored twice in the first half of Saturday's game, played before a crowd estimated at 2,500 by coach Posipanko. Clay Mullican also scored a first half goal and junior Mark McArdle notched the final score. Erick Karn, Mahfoud Kyoud and Mike Harris had assists for the Lancers.

Goalkeeper Brian Sprinkle collected his fifth shutout of the season and the 17th of his career. Longwood now has eight shutouts, just one short of the school season record, set in 1982.

After this week Longwood has two regular season games left: October 31 at Hampden-Sydney and November 5 when Randolph-Macon visits.

Hockey Team To End Season Today

Longwood's field hockey team will take a 9-7 record into Tuesday's game at Virginia Tech, the regular season finale for the 1984 Lady Lancer squad.

Last week Coach Bette Harris' team won one of three games against Division I opposition. Monday the Lady Lancers fell to Virginia Commonwealth 2-1 before bouncing back to take a 1-0 overtime win over Radford. Saturday Longwood dropped a 4-1 decision at Duke.

Sharon Bruce scored her sixth goal of the season against the Rams Monday afternoon. Wednesday senior Mary Garrison tallied the game-winner in overtime after the clubs had battled to a 0-0 tie in regulation play.

Freshman Traci Strickland scored for the Lady Lancers in Saturday's loss in Durham, NC.

In the win over Radford Longwood notched 33 shots to the Highlanders' 17 and benefitted from nine goalie saves by keeper Haidee Shiflet.

Just out of REACH—Longwood's Sue Groff (20) battles for possession in win over Radford.

IAA Update

IAA continues this week with indoor soccer, flag football and volleyball.

Men's bowling finished competition last week with the strikers being proclaimed the champions. Members of the Strikers are Piyush Agarwal, Mark Higgins, Doug Williamson, Chuck Faber, and Punkaj Rishi. The Pinheads; Keggers (SPE), and Crows (AXP) finished second, third, and fourth, respectively.

Men's Indoor Soccer is underway this week with nine teams competing.

Women's Flag Football is down to eight teams with semifinals being held Tuesday, October 23, the finals of each bracket being held Wednesday, October 24, while the championship game will be on Thursday, October 25. Teams still in the winner's bracket are Crazy 8's, Totally awesome Fighters and Dambanas. Teams in the loser's bracket are AST, L'espirit, Party Animals and Maniacs.

Women's Volleyball gets underway Tuesday, October 23, in Lancer with 20 teams competing.

Mixed Doubles Pool, a coed weekend tournament was won by Randy Campbell and Kim Galliher.

Entry blanks for men's pool are due Thursday, October 25, with a meeting to be held at 6:30 in IAA room in Lankford.

Player Of The Week

Sophomore Kimbra Patterson turned in the top performance of her career October 12-14 at Duke University, and the Lady Lancer golfer has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period October 12-19. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Patterson, who has shown flashes of brilliance in the past, put her total game together for three days at the Duke Invitational. She shot 78-79-77-234 to tie fof 13th place with teammate Tina Barrett. Patterson helped Longwood shoot a 320-318-310-948 for fourth place out of 12 teams, the Lady Lancers best showing ever at Duke.

In her top performance last season Patterson shot a 76-81-77-234 in the National Small College Tournament in May, helping Longwood to a second place finish.

Patterson was the first girl ever to play on the boys' golf team at North Stafford High School. She has won the Aquia Harbour Women's Club Championship the past three years.

Lancer Netters At CNC Saturday

Radford University defeated UNC-Greensboro to win' the fourth Cindy Smith Memorial Invitational Volleyball Tournament Saturday afternoon as host Longwood dropped both its tournament contests to fall to 8-14 on the year.

Radford beat Bridgewater 15-9, 15-8; Longwood 15-5, 15-12 and Christopher-Newport 15-5, 15-8 to reach the finals of the tournament. The Highlanders dispatched UNCG 15-10, 10-15, 15-5 in the championship contest.

Longwood visits Christopher-Newport Saturday afternoon in its only action of the week. Last week, prior to the tournament, the Lady Lancers got a pair of wins Tuesday at Lynchburg, defeating the Hornets and Hollins 15-13, 15-5 and 15-13, 15-7, respectively.

Last Wednesday Longwood entertained VCU and Liberty Baptist. LBC took a 15-13, 15-4 decision while the Rams beat LC 15-3, 15-2.

TOURNAMENT FINISH — (1) Radford, (2) UNCG, (3) Bridgewater, (4) Christopher-Newport, (5) RMWC, (6) Longwood.

Equestrians Open Season

The Longwood riding team opened its season last Saturday (October 13) co-hosting a show with Mary Washington. It was a good afternoon for the Lancers as all Longwood riders placed in their respective divisions.

Mary Brockwell finished fourth in novice over fences and fifth in intermediate under saddle for Longwood. Also placing for the Lancers were Mike Carey, third in novice under saddle and sixth in novice over fences, Lisa Nelson, third in intermediate over fences and intermediate under saddle, Lea Anne Lawson, third in advanced walk-trot-canter, Cynthia Settle, sixth in walk-trot-canter, Robin Levy, third in advanced walk-trot-canter and Bethanne McCarron, sixth in novice over fences.

The Lancers next riding show is scheduled for November 9 at University of Virginia.

WHAT WOULD THE FREEZE ACCOMPLISH?

The first step in reversing the nuclear arms race is stopping it. A freeze is an agreement to stop. A U.S. - Soviet freeze on the testing, production, and deployment of nuclear weapons would:

- End the momentum of the arms race which is pushing us towards a nuclear tragedy of unprecedented proportions.
- Halt the development of first-strike and less verifiable weapons.
- Provide a first step toward genuine, overall reductions in the nuclear stockpiles of both countries.
- Reduce tensions between the U.S. and U.S.S.R., leading to a decrease in tensions worldwide.
- Improve the prospects for stopping the spread of nuclear weapons to other countries.
- Stimulate our economy by diverting funds from inflationary and unproductive military projects to programs that create more jobs and meet human needs.
- Increase national and international security.

Cuomo's Keynote Address Sounds Important Themes

Editor's Note: At 9:35 on Monday, July 16, I sat in the Frazer TV lobby watching the Democratic National Convention which was being held in San Francisco that week. Depression was beginning to overwhelm me. I had supported San Francisco Mayor Diane Feinstein for the Vice-Presidential nomination with Gary Hart as a close second choice. Fritz Mondale, the heir-apparent to the Presidential nomination, had chosen Geraldine Ferraro from New York amid a fury of controversy. In addition to this, Mondale had thrown himself into further controversy, more or less a frenzy of ruffled feathers, by announcing that Burt Lance would be the new Democratic Party Chairman. The convention hadn't even begun and there were doubts that Mondale could get out of it with the full support of his party. It was a bad scene.

I sat there that night and watched Jimmy Carter give a speech to the throng of Democrats. He looked old. His hair was all white—his face was lined and leathery. He looked nothing like the Carter Americans had elected in 1976. Yet his speech wasn't old. He talked about hope: hope for the Party and for America. His face brightened up some as he spoke. In fact, before Carter left the platform I thought I caught a glimpse of the fightin' peanut farmer who led Begin and Sadat to the Camp David Accords.

Still, at 9:35, as Jimmy hugged Rosalyn and Dan Rather droned on in his montone voice, I was depressed. It just didn't look good. Too many problems, too many worries. Mondale, my brain had led me to believe, didn't have much of a chance. I had decided that Ronald Reagan, the fascist pig he is would win the November 6 election. But in the next forty-five minutes, despair flew into a turbulent rage of hope and conviction. I was thrown into commitment all over again, and by 10:20, I was sure that Walter Mondale would be the next President of the United States of America.

The key to my flight from despair was a speech. Specifically, the keynote address of New York Governor Mario Cuomo. The man had given me something. He had shown me faith. Faith that the American people would drag Reagan out of office by his gold cuff links on November 6. Faith that this nation would change the course it was on. Faith that 'four more years' would be only a ghostly spectre driven away in a few short months.

The editorial board of The Rotunda hardly expects Longwood students to have a similar reaction, but we felt Cuomo's address important enough to voters to print it in full in this election issue. It says a lot—about Reagan and about America. It is printed here for your consideration.

As we go into election week, we have much to consider. We must decide which candidate we will choose to influence the next thirty or forty years of our lives by appointing a large number of Supreme Court justices. We must choose which candidate we want to handle the situations in El Salvador and Nicaragua. We must choose which candidate we want to face questions such as abortion, ERA, and school prayer. It is important only that we choose, yet choose with as much forethought and intelligence as possible. So enjoy Cuomo's words; we hope they will help you make your choice, but don't take it lightly—it is very critical indeed.

On behalf of the Empire State and the family of New York, I thank you for the great privilege of being allowed to address this convention.

Please allow me to skip the stories and the poetry and the temptation to deal in nice but vague rhetoric.

Let me instead use this valuable opportunity to deal with the questions that should determine this election and that are vital to the American people.

Ten days ago, President Reagan admitted that although some people in this country seemed to be doing well nowadays, others were unhappy, and even worried, about themselves, their families and their futures.

The President said he didn't understand that fear. He said, "Why, this country is a shining city on a hill."

The President is right. In many ways we are "a shining city on a hill."

But the hard truth is that not everyone is sharing in this city's splendor and glory.

A shining city is perhaps all the President sees from the portico of the White House and the veranda of his ranch, where everyone seems to be doing well.

But there's another part of the city, the part where some people can't pay their mortgages and most young people can't afford one, where students can't afford the education they need and middle-class parents watch the dreams they hold for their children evaporate.

In this part of the city there are more poor than ever, more families in trouble. More and more people who need help but can't find it.

Even worse: There are elderly people who tremble in the basements of the houses there.

There are people who sleep in the city's streets, in the gutter, where the glitter doesn't show.

'There is Despair, Mr. President'

There are ghettos where thousands of young people, without an education or a job, give their lives away to drug dealers every day.

There is despair, Mr. President, in faces you never see, in the places you never visit in your shining city.

In fact, Mr. President, this nation is more a "Tale of Two Cities" than it is a "Shining City on a Hill."

Maybe if you visited more places, Mr. President, you'd understand.

Maybe if you went to Appalachia where some people still live in sheds and to Lackawanna where thousands of unemployed steel workers wonder why we subsidized foreign steel while we surrender their dignity to unemployment and to welfare checks; maybe if you stepped into a shelter in Chicago and talked with some of the homeless there; maybe, Mr. President, if you asked a woman who'd been denied the help she needs to feed her children because you say we need the money to give a tax break to a millionaire or to build a missile we can't even afford to use—maybe then you'd understand.

New York Governor Mario Cuomo

Maybe, Mr. President

But I'm afraid not.

Because, the truth is, this is how we were warned it would be.

President Reagan told us from the beginning that he believed in a kind of social Darwinism. Survival of the fittest. "Government can't do everything," we were told. "So it should settle for taking care of the strong and hope that economic ambition and charity will do the rest. Make the rich richer and what falls from their table will be enough for the middle class and those trying to make it into the middle class."

The Republicans called it trickle-down when Hoover tried it. Now they call it supply side. It is the same shining city for those relative few who are lucky enough to live in its good neighborhoods.

But for the people who are excluded—locked out—all they can do is to stare from a distance at that city's glimmering towers.

It's an old story. As old as our history.

'Courage and Confidence'

The difference between Democrats and Republicans has always been measured in courage and confidence. The Republicans believe the wagon train will not make it to the frontier unless some of our old, some of our young and some of our weak are left behind by the side of the trail.

The strong will inherit the land!

We Democrats believe that we can make it all the way with the whole family intact.

We have. More than once.

Ever since Franklin Roosevelt lifted himself from his wheelchair to lift this nation from its knees. Wagon train after wagon train. To new frontiers of education, housing, peace. The whole family aboard. Constantly reaching out to extend and enlarge that family. Lifting them up into the wagon on the way. Blacks and Hispanics, people of every ethnic group, and Native Americans—all those struggling to build their families claim some small share of America.

For nearly 50 years we carried them to new levels of comfort, security, dignity, even affluence.

Some of us are in this room today only because this nation had that confidence.

It would be wrong to forget that.

'To Save the Nation'

So, we are at this convention to remind ourselves where we come from and to claim the future for ourselves and for our children.

Today, our great Democratic Party, which has saved this nation from depression, from fascism, from racism, from corruption, is called upon to do it again—this time to save the nation from confusion and division, from the threat of eventual fiscal disaster and most of all from a fear of a nuclear holocaust.

In order to succeed, we must answer our opponent's polished and appealing rhetoric with a more telling reasonableness and rationality.

We must win this case on the merits.

We must get the American public to look past the glitter, beyond the showmanship—to reality, to the hard substance of things. And we will do that not so much with speeches that sound good as with speeches that are good and sound.

Not so much with speeches that bring people to their feet as with speeches that bring people to their senses.

We must make the American people hear our "tale of two cities."

We must convince them that we don't have to settle for two cities, that we can have one city, indivisble, shining for all its people.

We will have no chance to do that if what comes out of this convention, what is heard throughout the campaign, is a babel of arguing voices.

To succeed we will have to surrender small parts of our individual interests, to build a platform we can all stand on, at once, comfortably, proudly singing out the truth for the nation to hear, in chorus, its logic so clear and commanding that no slick commercial, no amount of geniality, no martial music will be able to muffle it.

'The Lucky and the Left Out'

We Democrats must unite so that the entire nation can. Surely the Republicans won't bring the convention together. Their policies divide the nation: into the lucky and the left-out, the royalty and the rabble.

The Republicans are willing to treat that division as victory. They would cut this nation in half, into those temporarily better off and those worse off than before, and call it recovery.

We should not be embarrassed or dismayed if the process of unifying is difficult, even at times wrenching.

Unlike any other party, we embrace men and women of every color, every creed, every orientation, every economic class. In our family are gathered everyone from the abject poor of Essex County in New York, to the enlightened affluent of the gold coasts of both ends of our nation. And in between is the heart of our constituency. The middle class, the people not rich enough to be worry-free but not poor enough to be on welfare, those who work for a living because they

Mondale Endorsed

Over the past two months I've made a conscious effort not to be insulting or negative to the President of the United States of America. Over and over again I've told myself "Don't be nasty. Be pleasant, convincing, and ... ultimately boring." This final realization has led to hopeless failure in my endeavors.

No one is convinced by straight statistics on the President. His record is beyond reproach, or it should be; in the eyes of students, blacks, women, laborers, educators, and even the President's own minority group, the elderly, Reagan should be nothing more at this stage in the game than a very bad joke told by the voters of 1980. Yet Reagan's bandwagon rolls on—and even those who've been rolled over are anxious to hop on. There's absolutely no way to convince people what the man truly stands for, except by calling a rose a rose. In this case, by calling a thorn a thorn.

Ronald Reagan has driven this country to believe that it is proud, strong, and free "once again," and he has hyped himself up to be some mystical guru who brought all of this to us, absolutely free-of-charge. Now, in 1984, all the people have to do is dial 1-800-VOTE-RON. Operators will be standing by on November 6. That's 1-800-VOTE-RON, that's 1-800-vote-ron, that's 1-800-vote-ron, that's ..... And the President deserves his first Oscar for the acting he's doing. Unfortunately Reagan stands for an America which most of us believe to be long gone.

In an October 30, editorial, the Village Voice said of the President: "Reagan is heir to an ugly legacy concealed behind his smiling face and upbeat rhetoric. His political forebears opposed ... the rights of blacks, Hispanics, and women to full citizenship. They opposed Social Security, Medicare, food stamps, Head Start, [and] student loans... Their reactionary testament was conceived long before Reagan became its executor, but he has remained faithful to it."

Reagan has not brought the country to a position of strength. He has propped it up with Media hype, deficit spending, and a dangerous foreign policy. The U.S. is as a fragile scarecrow in the wind with Reagan at the helm, but we are only able to see the giant smile on the scarecrow's potato-sack head. It is senseless for student voters to help re-elect a president who forced massive cuts in student loans, supports a lowering of the minimum wage, supports a Constitutional Amendment banning abortion, and is the candidate most likely to lead this nation to war. The fact that we may make a few more dollars a week with Reagan in office hardly justifies his re-election.

And why vote for Mondale? Because Walter Mondale will push for arms control and a nuclear freeze. Because Walter Mondale will hold defense spending to sane levels. He will stop the retreat of civil rights which Reagan began, and he will strive to see the Equal Rights Amendment become a reality. Mondale will stop the attack on the environment begun in 1980. And Walter Mondale will stop the ludicrous practice of "trickle-down economics" which may trickle to the depths of the middle class but no further.

Mondale is not the perfect candidate for the Presidency, but he will be far more perfect than Ronald Reagan has been in office. Mondale represents American workers; he represents the common man. Further he represents policies which are sorely needed in the United States after four years with the Gipper.

On November 6, American voters may see through the facade which Ronald Reagan's presidency truly is. If they do, we will be able to get on with building a nation united; or we may continue to build a nation of segmentation and despair. We need only look closely to make the choice. On November 6, we decide which path we shall take.

SGA Proposes Changes

The Student Government Association has proposed three changes to its Constitution. These changes concern composition of the Student Union Board and Honor Board as well as a new section which will require that all proposed amendments or constitutional changes be published in The Rotunda a week before the student body votes on them.

Students may vote on these changes on Tuesday, November 6 in the New Smoker during lunch and dinner. Included on each section of the ballot will be the option to vote for yet another change in the particular amendment. The proposed changes are as follows:

Article III, Section 7, Student Union Board

As it stands:

B. Membership
The Student Union Board shall consist of four elected officers: Chair, Vice-Chair, Secretary, and Treasurer. All other membership is open to all students of Longwood College.

Proposed Change:

B. Membership
The Student Union Board shall consist of four officers: Chair and Vice-Chair elected campuswide, and Secretary and Treasurer elected from within. All other membership is open to all students of Longwood College.

Proposed:

Article IX, Section 3

Before any student body votes on a proposed amendment or constitutional change, said change must be submitted to The Rotunda for publication one week prior to the vote.

Article III, Section , Honor Board

As it stands:

B. Membership
The members of the Honor Board shall consist of the Chair, Vice-Chair, Secretary, and a representative from each of the academic departments including: Art, Business and Economics, Education and Psychology, English, Philosophy, and Foreign Languages, Health, Physical Education, and Computer Science, Music, Science, Social Work, Sociology, and Anthropology, and Speech and Dramatic Arts. (A hearing will proceed with nine members.)

Proposed Change:

B. Membership
The members of the Honor Board shall consist of a Chair, Vice-Chair, Secretary and nine representatives from the student body of Longwood College. (A hearing will proceed with seven members.)

.....

We have also changed the Elections Constitution to read that the Honor Board officers will be elected in the spring along with the other members. The question then is if the current officers serve until spring elections or do we re-elect officers just for the spring semester. We leave this entirely up to the student body to decide.

Text Of Keynote Address At Democratic Convention

have to. White collar and blue collar. Young professionals. Men and women in small business desperate for the capital and contracts they need to prove their worth.

We speak for the minorities who have not yet entered the mainstream.

For ethnics who want to add their culture to the mosaic that is America.

For women indignant that we refuse to etch into our governmental commandments the simple rule "thou shalt not sin against equality," a commandment so obvious it can be spelled in three letters: e r a!

For young people demanding an education and a future.

For senior citizens terrorized by the idea that their only security, their Social Security, is being threatened.

For millions of reasoning people fighting to preserve our environment from greed and stupidity. And fighting to preserve our every existence from a macho intransigence that refuses to make intelligent attempts to discuss the possibility of nuclear holocaust with our enemy. Refusing because they believe we can pile missiles so high that they will pierce the clouds and the sight of them will frighten our enemies into submission.

'Proud of Diversity'

We're proud of this diversity. Grateful we don't have to manufacture its appearance the way the Republicans will next month in Dallas, by propping up mannequin delegates on the convention floor.

But we pay a price for it.

The different people we represent have many points of view. Sometimes they compete and then we have debates, even arguments. That's what our primaries were about.

But now the primaries are over, and it is time to lock arms and move into this campaign together.

If we need any inspiration to make the effort to put aside our small differences, all we need to do is to reflect on the Republican policy of divide and cajole and how it has injured our land since 1980.

The President has asked us to judge him on whether or not he's fulfilled the promises he made four years ago. I accept that. Just consider what he said and what he's done.

Inflation is down since 1980. But not because of the supply-side miracle promised by the President. Inflation was reduced the old-fashioned way, with a recession, the worst since 1932. More than 55,000 bankruptcies. Two years of massive unemployment. Two-hundred-thousand farmers and ranchers forced off the land. More homeless than at any time since the Great Depression. More hungry, more poor—mostly women—and a nearly $200 billion deficit threatening our future.

The President's deficit is a direct and dramatic repudiation of his promise to balance our budget by 1983.

That deficit is the largest in the history of this universe: more than three times larger than the deficit in President Carter's last year.

It is a deficit that, according to the President's own fiscal adviser, could grow as high as $300 billion a year, stretching "as far as the eye can see."

It is a debt so large that as much as one-half of our revenue from the income tax goes to pay the interest on it each year.

'Mortgage on Children's Future'

It is a mortgage on our children's futures that can only be paid in pain and that could eventually bring this nation to its knees.

Don't take my word for it—I'm a Democrat.

Ask the Republican investment bankers on Wall Street what they think the chances are this recovery will be permanent. If they're not too embarrassed to tell you the truth, they'll say they are appalled and frightened by the President's deficit. Ask them what they think of our economy, now that it has been driven by the distorted value of the dollar back to its colonial condition, exporting agricultural products and importing manufactured ones.

Ask those Republican investment bankers what they expect the interest rate to be a year from now. And ask them what they predict for the inflation rate then.

How important is this question of the deficit?

Think about it: What chance would the Republican candidate have had in 1980 if he had told the American people that he intended to pay for his so-called economic recovery with bankruptcies, unemployment and the largest Government debt known to humankind? Would American voters have signed the loan certificate for him on Election Day? Of course not! It was an election won with smoke and mirrors, with illusions. It is a recovery made of the same stuff.

And what about foreign policy?

They said they would make us and the whole world safer. They say they have.

By creating the largest defense budget in history, one even they now admit is excessive. By escalating to a frenzy the nuclear arms race. By incendiary rhetoric. By refusing to discuss peace with our enemies. By the loss of 279 young Americans in Lebanon in pursuit of a plan and a policy no one can find or describe.

We give monies to Latin American governments that murder nuns, and then lie about it.

We have been less than zealous in our support of the only real friend we have in the Middle East, the one democracy there, our flesh and blood ally, the state of Israel.

Our policy drifts with no real direction, other than an hysterical commitment to an arms race that leads nowhere, if we're lucky. If we're not—could lead us to bankruptcy or war.

Of course we must have a strong defense!

Of course Democrats believe that there are times when we must stand and fight. And we have. Thousands of us have paid for freedom with our lives. But always, when we've been at our best, our purposes were clear.

'Our Allies Are Confused'

Now they're not. Now our allies are as confused as our enemies.

Now we have no real commitment to our friends or our ideals to human rights, to the refusenicks, to Sakharov, to Bishop Tutu and the others struggling for freedom in South Africa.

We have spent more than we can afford. We have pounded our chests and made bold speeches. But we lost 279 young Americans in Lebanon and we are forced to live behind sand bags in Washington.

How can anyone believe that we are stronger, safer or better?

That's the Republican record.

That its disastrous quality is not more fully understood by the American people is attributable, I think, to the President's amiability and the failure by some to separate the salesman from the product.

'Make the Case to America'

It's now up to us to make the case to America.

And to remind Americans that if they are not happy with all the President has done so far, they should consider how much worse it will be if he is left to his radical proclivities for another four years unrestrained by the need once again to come before the American people.

If July brings back Anne Gorsuch Burford, - what can we expect of December?

Where would another four years take us?

How much larger will the deficit be?

How much deeper the cuts in programs for the struggling middle class and the poor to limit that deficit? How high the interest rates? How much more acid rain killing our forests and fouling our lakes?

What kind of Supreme Court? What kind of court and country will be fashioned by the man who believes in having government mandate people's religion and morality?

The man who believes that trees pollute the environment, that the laws against discrimination go too far. The man who threatens Social Security and Medicaid and help for the disabled.

How high will we pile the missiles?

How much deeper will be the gulf between us and our enemies?

Will we make meaner the spirit of our people?

This election will measure the record of the past four years. But more than that, it will answer the question of what kind of people we want to be.

We Democrats still have a dream. We still believe in this nation's future.

A 'Credo' for the Democrats

And this is our answer—our credo:

We believe in only the government we need, but we insist on all the government we need.

We believe in a government characterized by fairness and reasonableness, a reasonableness that goes beyond labels, that doesn't distort or promise to do what it knows it can't do.

A government strong enough to use the words "love" and "compassion" and smart enough to convert our noblest aspirations into practical realities.

We believe in encouraging the talented, but we believe that while survival of the fittest may be a good working description of the process of evolution, a government of humans should elevate itself to a higher order, one which fills the gaps left by chance or a wisdom we don't understand.

We would rather have laws written by the patron of this great city, the man called the "world's most sincere Democrat," St. Francis of Assisi, than laws written by Darwin.

We believe, as Democrats, that a society as blessed as ours, the most affluent democracy in the world's history, that can spend trillions on instruments of destruction, ought to be able to help the middle class in its struggle, ought to be able to find work for all who can do it, room at the table, shelter for the homeless, care for the elderly and infirm, hope for the destitute.

'Peace Is Better Than War'

We proclaim as loudly as we can the utter insanity of nuclear proliferation and the need for a nuclear freeze, if only to affirm the simple truth that peace is better than war because life is better than death.

We believe in firm but fair law and order, in the union movement, in privacy for people, openness by government, civil rights, and human rights.

We believe in a single fundamental idea that describes better than most textbooks and any speech what a proper government should be. The idea of family. Mutuality. The sharing of benefits and burdens for the good of all. Feeling one another's pain. Sharing one another's blessings. Reasonably, honestly, fairly, without respect to race, or sex, or geography or political affiliation.

We believe we must be the family of America, recognizing that at the heart of the matter we are bound one to another, that the problems of a retired school teacher in Duluth are our problems. That the future of the child in Buffalo is our future. The struggle of a disabled man in Boston to survive, to live decently is our struggle. The hunger of a woman in Little Rock, our hunger. The failure anywhere to provide what reasonably we might, to avoid pain, is our failure.

For 50 years we Democrats created a better future for our children, using traditional democratic principles as a fixed beacon, giving us direction and purpose, but constantly innovating, adapting to new realities: Roosevelt's alphabet programs: Truman's NATO and the GI Bill of Rights: Kennedy's intelligent tax incentives and the Alliance For Progress: Johnson's civil rights: Carter's human rights and the nearly miraculous Camp David peace accord.

Democrats did it.—and Democrats can do it again.

We can build a future that deals with our deficit.

Remember, 50 years of progress never cost us what the last four years of stagnation have. We can deal with that deficit intelligently, by shared sacrifice, with all parts of the nation's family contributing, building partnerships with the private sector, providing a sound defense without depriving ourselves of what we need to feed our children and care for our people.

We can have a future that provides for all the young of the present by marrying common sense and compassion.

We know we can, because we did it for nearly 50 years before 1980.

'We Can Do It Again'

We can do it again. If we do not forget. Forget that this entire nation has profited by these progressive principles. That they helped lift up generations to the middle class and higher: gave us a chance to work, to go to college, to raise a family, to own a house, to be secure in our old age and, before that, to reach heights that our own parents would not have dared dream of.

That struggle to live with dignity is the real story of the shining city. It's a story I didn't read in a book, or learn in a classroom. I saw it, and lived it. Like many of you.

I watched a small man with thick calluses on both hands work 15 and 16 hours a day. I saw him once literally bleed from the bottoms of his feet, a man who came here uneducated, alone, unable to speak the language, who taught me all I needed to know about faith and hard work by the simple eloquence of his example. I learned about our kind of democracy from my father. I learned about our obligation to each other from him and from my mother. They asked only for a chance to work and to make the world better for their children and to be protected in those moments when they would not be able to protect themselves. This nation and its government did that for them.

And that they were able to build a family and live in dignity and see one of their children go from behind their little grocery store on the other side of the tracks in south Jamaica where he was born, to occupy the highest seat in the greatest state of the greatest nation in the only world we know, is an ineffably beautiful tribute to the democratic process.

And on Jan. 20, 1985, it will happen again. Only on a much grander scale. We will have a new President of the United States, a Democrat born not to the blood of kings but to the blood of immigrants and pioneers.

We will have America's first woman Vice President, the child of immigrants, a New Yorker, opening with one magnificent stroke a whole new frontier for the United States.

It will happen, if we make it happen.

I ask you, ladies and gentlemen, brothers and sisters,—for the good of all of us, for the love of this great nation, for the family of America, for the love of God. Please make this nation remember how futures are built.

Defense Writer Discusses U. S. Foreign Policy

Charles Corddry visited Longwood last week.

The so-called Star Wars defense system represents the first "radical change" in U.S. national security policy since World War II, a defense expert told a Longwood College audience recently.

"I don't know whether it would work, and I don't know whether it's needed," Charles Corddry said of the proposed system. "But I do know the Russians are worried. And I do know that you'll hear about this for a long, long time."

Corddry, defense correspondent for The Baltimore Sun, lectured at Longwood Oct. 24. He and his wife Marion, a public relations consultant and freelance writer, spent the week of Oct. 21-26 on the Longwood campus as Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellows.

The controversial system—dubbed "Star Wars" because it would be space-based—has become an issue in the presidential campaign. President Reagan favors research into the proposal, believing it might prevent a nuclear holocaust. Challenger Walter Mondale opposes the idea; during the recent debate he asked that we "draw a line to keep the heavens free of war."

Although the idea "seems rather fantastic," said Corddry, "it can't be dismissed out of hand." Even if Mondale wins the election, research into the Star Wars concept will continue, though at a slower pace than under a Reagan administration. The Soviets will try to match us, but currently they lag far behind in this technology, he said.

Corddry, who attended the Kansas City debate, said that President Reagan "scored a debating point" when asked whether he would share the technology with the Soviets. Reagan's response was "Why not?" Corddry quoted columnist William Safire, who wrote that Kansas City "will be remembered...as the place where a pregnant question was asked that could start to make the world a safer place."

Since World War II, our foreign policy has been marked by "a consistency and continuity. In nuclear terms, the policy has been retaliation to prevent war, deterrence by prospect of retaliation... Our policy is to deter by being prepared to retaliate if attacked."

The policy was developed by President Harry Truman and Secretary of State George C. Marshall shortly after World War II. The "critical day" occurred in March 1947 with the announcement of the Truman Doctrine, which vowed to support free peoples who were resisting armed aggression inside their country or from an outside group. The policy continued to develop with the Marshall Plan, the Brussels Pact, and the formation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

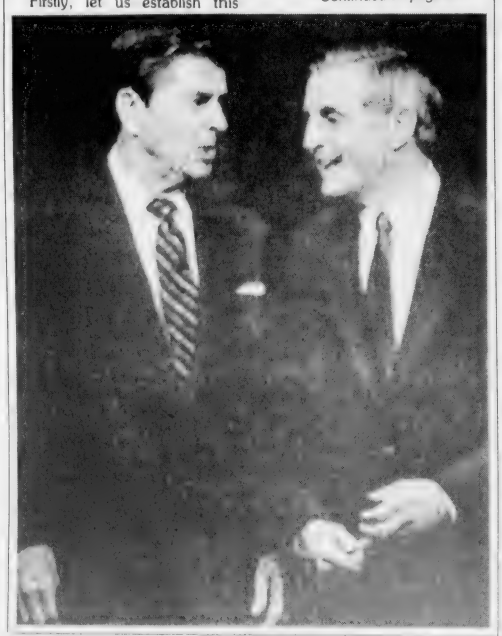
Thus far, Corddry said in an interview, this policy has borne fruit.

"I don't think nuclear war is the least bit imminent, I don't think it's the least bit likely. The post-World War II policy of deterrence has worked so far. This is a very long period without a major conflict. Nuclear weapons are a frightening thing, yet they deter war."

He described the nuclear freeze position as "a slogan rather than a policy," and said that "Mondale's not clear how he'd go about it. Reagan's policy on nuclear weapons, for the most part, is the same as President Carter's policy," he said.

Corddry argued that the U.S. military is stronger in 1984 than it was in 1980. "I don't see how you could argue otherwise. We have better troops; they're better educated, better paid, better trained. And we have better equipment than we did four years ago."

"It may be that we've never been more secure and felt less so." This feeling stems from uncertainty surrounding the intentions and sentiments of Soviet leaders, said Corddry.



Reagan Is Better Candidate

By Frank Raio

One week from today, barring any sudden earthshaking event and assuming that America has not been lying to its pollsters, Ronald Reagan will be re-elected to the highest office in the land. By all accounts, Reagan is very popular for a man who has served as President of the United States. Very few of our more recent Chief Executives have enjoyed this kind of confidence and support. What is it about Reagan that makes the people of America so satisfied?

Firstly, let us establish this level of satisfaction of the people with President Reagan. The most recent Lou Harris poll gives the incumbent a fourteen percentage point lead over the Democratic challenger Walter Mondale. An ABC News Washington Post survey gives Reagan a 54% share while Mondale can only count on 42% of the voting public. Peter D. Hart, Mondale's own pollster, reports that his findings are similar to the latter poll and comments about Reagan's "remarkable consistency [in the

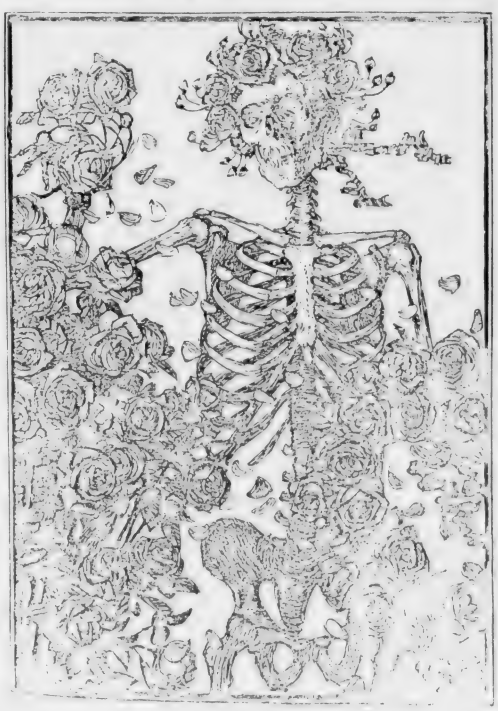
Research Project



A research project involving local business leaders is being planned and implemented by faculty and students of Longwood College's department of business and economics.

Dr. Larry Minks and Dr. Wayne McWee are directing the project which is co-sponsored by the Farmville Town Council, the Farmville Area Development Corporation, the Chamber of Commerce, and the department of business and economics.

A questionnaire has been developed to gather information that can be used as a basis for community planning and industrial development, according to Mike Lafoon, Town Councilman. "This is an important step in our community certification program," he said.

"It's going to take a little time to complete the questionnaire," Lafoon said, "but this is a very worthwhile effort. I would urge all business leaders who are contacted to cooperate."

Dr. Minks said that a research report, containing a summary of findings from the questionnaires, will be prepared. Copies of the report will be made available to all participants in the study.

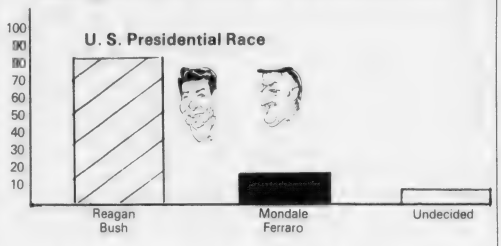
polls] over the past five months." This lack of variation in the polls during the campaign solidifies my confidence in a decisive mandate for President Reagan next week. I am not alone in this belief. The White House feels secure enough with its lead to dispatch George Bush around the country to aid Republican House members who are facing particularly heavy competition in their races. President Reagan will carry the bulk of the national campaign duties for the next seven days. I thought that I would give my candidate a little help on the Longwood front (as if our poll indicates the need for such boost).

The U. S. is the leader of the free world. As long as we maintain this role and as long as conflict-ridden areas require such support the U. S. will be morally obligated to lend a hand and, yes, sometimes even their lives to these troubled spots.



The President's foreign policy stance has been widely debated by the public. Americans will never agree upon how to insure security and peace among nations. Did we have an obligation to send troops to Lebanon as part of the allied peacekeeping force? Of course we did. The U.S. is the leader of the free world. As long as we maintain this role and as long as conflict-ridden areas require such support, the U.S. will be morally obligated to lend a hand and, yes, sometimes even their lives to these troubled spots. Most Americans accept these facts, take pride in our position in the why it is imperative for the United States to counter strong Communist influence in the unstable South American region with economic and military aid, negotiation assistance and military advisers? Shall I explain the difficulties of negotiating with the three Soviet leaders who have spent more time on bed pans and saline solutions than they have at desks near the red phone during Reagan's term?

I could go round and round with these foreign policies. What it boils down to for most Americans is that Ronald Reagan, the man, was decisive and strong during these crises. This is the kind of leadership that America needs today. A New York Times-CBS News poll last week showed mixed feelings about our policies in South America, Lebanon and toward progress in arms control, but the President scored extremely well on leadership abilities. With the world as complex and unpredictable as it is, voters must look at the leadership abilities of the candidates and pick the best person they can. I think this is what confuses the analysts and the Democrats. Americans are looking at the overall picture and are choosing Ronald Reagan for his decisiveness and confidence. We do not know what problems are ahead internationally, but we do know who we want to serve as our guide

On domestic policy, Reagan's position is easy, perhaps even unnecessary, to push. All economic indicators are Reagan's allies. The economy of the United States is in the best shape it has been in the memory of many voting Americans. Employment is up, inflation and interest rates are down. Most Americans agree that they are indeed better off than they were four years ago.

We more moderate Americans can rest easy about our concerns with Reagan's conservative views on social issues. Our system of checks and balances, giving the legislative branch a definite edge domestically, eliminates my only real doubt about Reagan as Chief Executive. The Congress, particularly the House, effectively neutralize Reagan's unpopular anti-abortion, and pro-prayer in school views. Also it seems that President Reagan doesn't push this type of legislation as hard as he does other, more widely accepted issues. Believing this, Americans can dismiss moral-legislation as irrelevant in the campaign.

In The Rotunda's first poll of the 1984-85 year, 219 on-campus students were asked their views of the upcoming national and state elections. The students surveyed were from every residence hall on campus and represent each academic class. Following are the results of the poll taken by Becky Etzler, Mike Harris, Frank Raio, and Steve Tilley.

LESLIE MOORE · FRESHMAN · DRAMA

I'm for Mondale because he's in favor of a nuclear freeze. He is more supportive of social programs than Reagan is. Reagan is so trigger happy.

SCOTT SCHMICK · SOPHOMORE · HISTORY

I'll vote for Reagan because of the job he's done with the economy. I also think he's got a good foreign policy because of his strength. He wants a better peace effort between the two major powers, but if push comes to shove, I think the Russians will be more likely to back away from war.

★ Campaign ★ 1984

J. D. ALMOND · SOPHOMORE · BUSINESS

Reaganomics are really starting to come around, but I think Reagan needs more time to improve himself. Mondale Ferraro haven't shown me anything really impressive yet. Besides, I think it's just a little too early to have a woman that high up in politics.

FRED GRANT · SOPHOMORE · GOVERNMENT

I'm voting for Mondale because Reagan means well, but he's going about it wrong. We don't need new weapons if what we already have will do the job. In a case like that, the defense budget should be cut to provide for something like school lunches. From a military standpoint, there'd be more tension under Reagan than Mondale.

COLLEEN REGAN · JUNIOR · ELEMENTARY EDUCATION

Oh, I would definitely vote for President Reagan. So far I think he's done a darn good job.

Your Turn: Rotunda Editorial Opposed

To the Editors:

This letter serves two purposes; it is an attempt to offer The Rotunda readers an opposing view to the articles that have proliferated The Rotunda in recent weeks and it is my attempt to see if The Rotunda is the kind of paper that prints opposing viewpoints.

This letter is in response to the onslaught of liberal Democratic articles which have appeared in The Rotunda in recent weeks. I have read articles which rave about Mr. Mondale and strongly satirize and degrade President Reagan. I have read articles written by passivists who are preaching pessimism and the policy of concession to the Russians. I have sat back and said to myself that each person is entitled to their opinion and that I should not let these liberal articles upset me. However, things changed abruptly last week when I read Jeff Abernathy's article entitled "Standing Tall in a Milk Pail. I read this article, which is plainly political and anti-Reagan, and decided that I could no longer ignore this barrage of Democratic passivistic articles. It is time that the students and the staff here at Longwood heard from someone who sits on the other end of the political spectrum. It is time that the staff of Longwood College became aware that there are students here who are proud to be American, people who realize the extent of the Russian threat and who are willing to defend our country against any enemy who dares to challenge our freedom. It is time that the students heard from someone who supports President Reagan and his policies. I am one of those people. I have served my country for three years in the United States Marine Corps and am presently enrolled in the Army R.O.T.C. program here at Longwood. I plan to dedicate my life to defending this great country against the Communist scourge that now threatens us. I am a right-wing Republican and proud of it.

I am in total disagreement with Abernathy on almost every serious aspect of his article except for the part where he points out that President Reagan's policies are alarming and hostile to our enemies. That is how it should be. The Russian Government is our enemy and should be treated as such. Abernathy says that "Ronald Reagan has done more to arouse the hostilities of countless nations than any U. S. President in decades...". I say "Good for him", it proves that President Reagan is the first President in decades who had the stomach to face the Russians and tell them, in so many words, that their days of expansion were over.

I want to express my disgust at the parallels drawn between Vietnam and Central America. Vietnam was roughly 10,000 miles away while Nicaragua is closer to Texas and Florida than Washington is to them. The parallel to Vietnam and Central America is totally false and unfounded. While it is true that we may lose many fine soldiers down there it is important to point out four major facts that MJA and those who agree with him conveniently overlooked. First, the distance to Nicaragua is so small that it would enable us to keep our supply and logistic infrastructure within the confines of the United States, where as in Vietnam we had to transfer it halfway around the world. Secondly, replacement of troops would be far easier because we would have the entire continental forces to throw at them and transportation to and from Nicaragua would take hours instead of days. Thirdly, the Russians would have to cross the ocean and come into our 'backyard' to supply their troops, a precarious situation to say the least, whereas in Vietnam we had to do the ocean crossing. Finally, we now possess a VOLUNTEER Army made up of people who WANT to serve their country, people who are WILLING to die for their country if need be, where as in Vietnam we had the draft. The parallel between Vietnam and Central America is non-existent and those who express it are wrong to do so.

I was amused at Abernathy's surprise that we have 1,900 whole troops in Central America (obviously he didn't count those in Panama). Did he bother to find out how many "advisors" the Russians and the Cubans have there? Probably not, but even if he did he did not think it important enough to mention.

Finally I want to say that Abernathy hit the nail right on the head, even though he sought to be sarcastic, when he said that there is no sense in fooling around in Nicaragua like we did in Vietnam 20 years ago. Let's inform them that their alliance with the Russians will not to be tolerated. Let's give them the chance to get rid of the Russians themselves. If they cannot do it let's send in the troops to help them. We have the power and the right to do so. Hopefully the liberal Congress, that is temporarily controlled by the Democrats, will allow the generals to do their jobs and run the war so that we can win. Liberal Congress messed Vietnam up for us and that in itself is reason enough to re-elect Ronald Reagan. We need a Commander-in-Chief who acts like a Commander-in-Chief. We need a man who will run the war like it should be run and not allow the politicians to mess it up with their rhetoric.

We NEED Ronald Reagan and I am sure that we will have him for FOUR MORE YEARS.

I, for one, am willing to defend my country and even to die for it if need be.

J. Andrew O'Connor

Editor's Note: I am overjoyed to find that killing, as well as dying, will be easier in a conflict in Central America. However, it still looks to me like Vietnam II, COMING soon to a draft board near you.

Colleges Take AIM During Alcohol Awareness Week

Focusing on the theme "Alcohol in Moderation," (AIM), campus activities throughout the state will urge responsible decision making regarding the use and non-use of alcoholic beverages in the second annual Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week.

The week highlights ongoing efforts by public and private colleges, government agencies involved in alcohol-related issues, and the state's malt beverage industry to inform college students and all Virginians about the personal and legal problems associated with excessive alcohol use.

At Longwood, a number of special events and contests are scheduled during Alcohol Awareness Week. A student who is a recovering alcoholic will speak, and the Alcohol Care Center will host an open house.

There will be a bulletin board contest in the residence halls, with the winning area receiving "fixings" for a non-alcoholic party. "Take AIM" buttons will be distributed to the students, and Residence Education Coordinators are planning special programs in their residence halls.

Barbara Gorski, interim director of student activities, is coordinating plans for the week. She said that more than 300 posters dealing with the responsible use of alcohol have been ordered from several different agencies. The posters will be displayed in classrooms and residence halls.

Strokers - Review

By Spencer Ferguson

The Strokers, who played at Longwood Friday night, were very professional in their performance; but, they need either to learn more cover songs and drop most of their originals or to spend more time on their original material. Their original songs, with the exception of about four tunes, could easily be dropped from their play list and not be missed by anyone except maybe the band members themselves. The original songs "Don't Tempt Me" and "Beyond the Blue" brought a smile to my face and continuous movement to my body. These two songs sounded so good compared to the other originals that they had to have been written by the same band member, and they must be the only two songs he wrote. Other of the band's songs lacked originality and drive. I realize that with all the music that is out today it is really hard to come up with something new, but there are bands that continue to do so. Why can't The Strokers?

The Strokers began their show with a great version of the Stones' classic "Paint it Black." Other Stones' songs were performed later, including "Sympathy for the Devil," "Dancing with Mr. D.," and "Honky Tonk Women." I have seen the Stones three times and even they never had the tightness that The Strokers had with these tunes.

Other covers that were performed during the night were also done with finesse and even a large degree of originality. There is nothing worse than seeing a band that plays covers exactly as the original performers on the record. The Strokers, however, added their own energy to all of these songs which brought a new sound to each of them. Any band that can do such a waste song as "Dance Hall Days" and make it sound good definitely has a future in the music business. The highlight of The Strokers' show was the fantastic version of David Bowie's "Ziggy Stardust" from the 1972 album of the same name. (Yes Longwood, David Bowie was around in 1972.) This song brought chills to my entire body. It was great. To further show my age I must mention the cover of "Closer to Home," the Grand Funk Railroad song from 1970. Grand Funk may be gone today but in their time they were hot, and The Strokers did justice to this song in every respect.

The overall show, with the exception of a few slow moments, was a success; but would I pay to see them again? Probably not.

IAA Update

The Intramural Athletic Association continues this week with flag football, indoor soccer, volleyball and pool.

Women's flag finishes up this week with four teams still competing for the title. Teams in the winner's bracket are the Crazy 8's and Fighters while L'espirit and the Dambanas are in the loser's bracket. Finals of the A and B bracket are Monday (Oct. 29) and championship game will be Tuesday (Oct. 30).

Four teams are also remaining in the men's indoor soccer competition. The Wanted and Team III are in the winner's bracket while Rowdees and Intoxicated Inc. are in the losers bracket.

Women's volleyball entered competition Monday (Oct. 29) with 20 teams entering the chase for the championship.

Entry blanks for men's volleyball are due Nov. 1 with a meeting at 8:30 p.m. in the JAA room in Lankford.

A weekend basketball tournament for men and women will be held on the weekend of Nov. 3. Entry blanks are due Wednesday (Oct. 31) with a meeting in the JAA room in Lankford.

LC Hockey Ends Season

Longwood's field hockey team closed out the 1984 season on a winning note last Tuesday with a 1-0 victory over Virginia Tech in Blacksburg.

Sharon Bruce tallied the decisive goal and sophomore Sharon Smith notched a shutout in her first start at goalkeeper.

Longwood totaled 25 shots to 11 for Virginia Tech and got seven saves from Smith.

"Sharon played well for her first start in goal," said Coach Bette Harris of Smith, who had just begun playing goalkeeper toward the end of the season.

Bruce ended up with seven goals and one assist to finish second behind junior Sue Groff in the Lady Lancer scoring race. Groff finished the season with 11 goals and three assists. She now has 28 career goals to rank fourth among Longwood's all-time scoring leaders. Just ahead of her is Julie Dayton ('81) with 34 goals.

Freshman Traci Strickland was Longwood's third leading scorer with five goals while Pam Esworthy collected two goals and three assists.

A pair of freshmen goalkeepers played well for Longwood during the season. Becky Hardin played in nine games before being sidelined with a broken finger. She notched two shutouts and had a goals against average of 1.44. Rookie Haidee Shiflet had four shutouts in eight games with a goals against average of 1.38.

Longwood should return as many as eight of 11 starters for next season.

Booters Closing Out Season

Longwood's men's soccer team will wind up its 1984 regular season over the next week against a pair of arch-rivals. The Lancers visit Hampden-Sydney Wednesday for a 2:30 p.m. contest and host Randolph-Macon next Monday (Nov. 5) at 2 p.m.

The Lancers, 10-5-2, suffered two losses last week and picked up a forfeit win. Radford handed Longwood a 3-2 setback Wednesday on the road and Saturday in the Gobbler Classic host Virginia Tech captured a 2-0 triumph. Coach Rich Posipanko's team picked up a forfeit win when Western Carolina did not show up for the tournament.

Since 1978 Longwood has won five of eight meetings with Hampden-Sydney. The last time the Tigers came out on top was 1979 when Longwood fell by a 1-0 margin. The Lancers won four straight until H-SC pulled off a 2-2 tie last season. In an earlier meeting this year in the Southside Soccer Classic Longwood took a 3-0 win.

Longwood and Randolph-Macon have played six times over the past six years with the Yellow Jackets holding a 4-2 edge. The Lancers, however, have won two of the last four meetings.

The Lancers will have to snap out of a recent slump if they expect to beat the Tigers and Yellow Jackets. Longwood has lost three of its last four games and has been shut-out in two of those losses.

"We played terrible against Tech," said Coach Rich Posipanko. "We still have an outside shot at postseason play in either the state or in Division II, but we'll have to play much better if we expect to win these last two games."

WUTA: Off Cue

By Barrett Baker

With Spanish teacher, Maria Sylvara, as its advisor, and a possible space allocation in the Lankford Building, the WUTA radio station will hopefully be getting under construction by late November, according to WUTA President Kevin Sneed.

"It probably won't be in actual operation until next semester," said Sneed. "Right now we're waiting to see where they are going to put us and how much money we can get from Student Activities." The money will be used for constructing a studio and for new items such as a mixer, new albums, and a phone. Other costs will come from moving and wiring the equipment.

"Educational radio is the key," states Sneed. "We want to include more information and a greater variety of music. We want to change the entire program. We want faculty involvement. We want Fraternity/Sorority involvement. We'd like to get Janet Greenwood to come in for commentary—a kind of 'fireside chat' thing. It's gonna be a totally redesigned program." Sneed would also like to change the Administrative structure so that all leadership of the station will not rest on one person. He'd like to maintain a system of checks and balances to keep the station functional. This would necessitate committees, and rid the station of the presidential and vice-presidential positions.

According to Moffet Evans, Technical Director of the Speech and Dramatic Arts Department, this change would be a welcome sight. "I like the idea of an educational radio station on campus," he said. "If it is run right—it can be a very rewarding experience. What they were running last year was nothing more than a party room. They'd go up there and get drunk, then they'd start jacking up the volume and tearing up the equipment. We finally had to close the place down."

Apart from the station itself, the people in question were apparently disturbing the atmosphere surrounding the Drama Department. Said Evans, "Props and scenery were getting torn up, equipment that was borrowed either came back broken or didn't come back at all, the doors to Jarman were getting left open, and the list goes on. These people were supposed to be serving the community and they were serving themselves. It had to stop somewhere."

Evans stated that the Jarman location must remain a working broadcast studio for the Department of Speech and Dramatic Arts' broadcasting classes. The equipment in the area must remain there for these classes. If the station can be run in a professional manner, Evans suggested that they continue to work in the Jarman studio.

Kevin Sneed, however, has plans for WUTA to complete the move—with the equipment in Jarman: "Replacing their equipment is not my problem," he said. "We are only taking what's rightfully ours. If the broadcasting people want to come use our studio, then great, maybe we can work something out. In the meantime, I'm in no position to go out of my way for them."

THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Today a law is made —
Next year it may be repealed —
A Constitutional Amendment provides a guarantee. . .

THE COMPLETE TEXT OF THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Section 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

This year as never before the EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT is one of several important campaign issues. In a country where the majority of those in poverty are women and children, the ERA assumes significance not only in terms of fairness and justice but also in terms of economics.

Listed below are the candidates and their position on the Equal Rights Amendment.

CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT, U.S.A.

Ronald Reagan - against (Mr. Reagan is the first president to oppose the ERA. The Republican Party had been a strong support of the ERA until 1980 when it was removed from the party platform when Reagan was running for president.)
Walter Mondale - for the ERA

CANDIDATES FOR VICE-PRESIDENT

George Bush - against Geraldine Ferraro - for

CANDIDATES FOR U. S. SENATE IN VIRGINIA

Edythe Harrison - for the ERA
John Warner - against the ERA

The Virginia ERA Ratification Council does not endorse candidates since it is a bipartisan organization composed of statewide groups who each have ratification of the ERA as a top priority. It does, however, provide information on the positions of candidates regarding the ERA. The Council urges each citizen to become informed and to vote on November 6.

Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Psychiatrist To Speak

Dr. George G. Ritchie, Jr., a well-known psychiatrist here in Virginia and elsewhere, will be speaking at the Wesley Foundation on Thursday evening, November 1, at 7 p.m.

You are invited to hear this very fine speaker talk about death and dying. Dr. Ritchie's topic will be "The Implications of My Near Death Experiences."

Dr. Ritchie holds a number of degrees, awards and prominent positions in many medical organizations. His medical and psychiatry practice, and surgical skills are known in this state. A very informative and exciting program will be shared by Dr. Ritchie and you will want to be there.

All are invited to attend this program.

The book "Return from Tomorrow" was written by Dr. Ritchie and is well known in the area of death and dying.

Lancaster Goes High Tech

By Lisa Jessup

Since the installation of the Virginia Tech Library System (VTLS), Martha LeStourgeon, director of Lancaster Library, has a goal to place computer terminals in the dormitories and in major academic departments at Longwood College.

Seen as a future possibility, the terminals would inable students and faculty members access to information on the library's holdings without having to come to the library.

This goal, however, is contingent upon Longwood's computer system. The library's VTLS, along with other users in the college, are all hooked into the college's mainframe, a Hewlett-Packard 3000. The college's decision to purchase an IBM computer would remove most of the users from the Hewlett-Packard and quite possibly, the Hewlett-Packard would then be donated to Lancaster Library for their sole use.

Currently, the VTLS houses more than 49,000 bibliographic records and more are constantly being added. Library acquisitions from 1977 were catalogued in machine-readable form and are now in the VTLS data base. The older materials are being added to the data base as they circulate. Periodicals are not in the data base.

Mrs. LeStourgeon sees the need for the card catalogue diminishing over time. No new cards were added to the catalogue after 1983 but were put directly into the VTLS data base. Mrs. LeStourgeon advises using both the on-line terminals and the card catalogue since the VTLS does not have access to the library's entire collection as of yet.

A library user can type in directions to the terminals located on the main floor to receive information on a subject area, an author, or a particular book.

The terminals display information similar to the cards in the catalogue. The system can tell the user if the book is available and its location—whether on reserve, on the

Will Finish Semester:

Dean Latta Resigns

By Frank Raio
and Jeff Abernathy

Dr. William Latta decided late last week to resign from his position as Dean of Students at Longwood College. Dean Latta came to Longwood in July of this year.

In an interview yesterday, Latta stated that his reasons for leaving have "nothing to do with this school," but concern a "personal matter ... it is a very unfortunate situation." Latta's resignation is effective shortly after the current semester.

In four months at Longwood, Latta has worked closely with the Inter-Fraternal Council (IFC), and the Resident Hall staffs. In addition, Latta assisted instituting the Community Development programs which were conducted on freshman halls.

In a letter of resignation to Vice-President Mable dated November 11, Latta wrote, "To confirm our discussion Thursday (Nov. 8), at which time I explained my decision to resign... It is a very difficult decision, and one that was given many hours of consideration ... due to the change in family circumstance it was necessary that I make this choice."

In a phone interview yesterday, Mable explained that Latta "has resigned because his wife has decided that she didn't want to move to Farmville." Latta's family is now living in East Lansing, Michigan, where he worked prior to taking the Longwood post.

Though numerous members of the faculty and administration have been aware of the situation since late last week, little effort has been made to inform the student body of Latta's decision. One professor responded, "Oh, is that out now?" and would only say that he is "disappointed that Latta is not finishing out the year." One administrator, however, denied knowledge of Latta's decision. Don Winkler of Public Affairs said yesterday that he "didn't know anything about it," and that his office had no statement on the matter.

Latta's resignation has also caused frustration among students. Marcel Jimenez, President of the IFC, said yesterday, "Dean Latta did a good job. He worked hard and I think we accomplished a lot during his time at Longwood. I am very disappointed that he is leaving."

Latta's resignation equally concerns the Residence Education Coordinators who must work closely with the Dean of Students' office. Doug Samuels, the REC in Cox Hall, said, "I'm sure that it will have a few rippling effects... [Latta] did achieve a lot while he was here ... it will have some effect on everybody." Amy Thompson, the REC in Frazier, looked ahead optimistically, "Hopefully the things that he has started will be able to continue. I think he has done an excellent job [with the Community Development Program], but there are a lot of faculty and staff members who will be able to carry it on and keep it going."

Colonial Top 40 To Air

The "top tunes" of Colonial Williamsburg will be the topic of this year's second Faculty Colloquium Lecture at Longwood College.

Dr. John W. Molnar, head of Longwood's music department for 25 years prior to his retirement in 1974, will give the lecture on Wednesday, November 14, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium. The public is invited to hear him discuss "Music in Colonial Williamsburg's Theather."

The lecture will be illustrated by live and recorded examples of the music heard and performed by Williamsburg residents in Colonial times. Singers will be Dr. Louard Egbert (head of Longwood's music department), Dr. Patton Lockwood (professor of speech and dramatics arts), and Janet Truitt Moore (a music student at Longwood); they will be accompanied by Dr. Paul Hesselink (associate professor of music) at the harpsichord.

There was a great interest in music in Colonial times, Dr. Molnar said. This interest "was stimulated" by the Williamsburg theater's presentation of the latest in stage fare from London.

The colonists were eager to learn these songs and dances. In addition to concerts and other stage performances, theater personnel also provided instruction. "The colonists and their children took lessons so that they could play the instruments and the music imported from England," Dr. Molnar said.

Dr. Molnar is the author of Songs from the Williamsburg Theater, published in 1972. The book is a collection of 18th-century theater songs, arranged for voice and piano, with historical and biographical information on each.

Longwood's music department was greatly expanded during Dr. Molnar's 25 years of leadership. Degree programs in music and music education were developed, the department's record library was begun (it now numbers some 2,000 recordings), and the Wygal Music Building was planned and constructed.

Dr. Molnar studied at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music and holds undergraduate and graduate degrees in music education from the University of Cincinnati. His orchestrations have been performed by the symphony orchestras in Cincinnati, Arlington, and Norfolk.

He continues to arrange music for choral and instrumental groups, including the Longwood band, the band at the College of William and Mary, and the Palace Orchestra in Williamsburg.

Constitution Changes Voted On

By Eric Houseknecht

Last Tuesday, November 6, while millions of Americans went to the polls, Longwood students were making choices here on campus which will affect our own system of student government. There were three proposed changes to the SGA's constitution on the referendum that afternoon, each of which needed a 67% (two-thirds majority) approval of the voters in order to pass.

The first proposal sought to see the Student Union Board's chairman and vice-chairman officers chosen through campus-wide voting while selecting its secretary and treasurer from within the board. This proposal was passed, receiving 77% of the votes in the affirmative.

Being the only proposal of three not to pass, the second item on the referendum intended to switch the membership of the Honor Board from one containing a representative from each of the academic departments to one which merely would be comprised of nine representatives from the student body. It was defeated by a narrow margin receiving only 64% of affirmative votes.

The final item voted on looked to have proposed amendments or constitutional changes submitted to The Rotunda for publication one week prior to election. This proposal passed readily with 98% voting in the affirmative and only 2% of those who voted opposed.

Lethargy and Longwood

Out of some 2,600 Longwood students, one hundred and forty-nine voted on the proposed changes to the Constitution of the Longwood Student Government Association Tuesday, November 6, a paltry 5.73 percent of the Longwod student body.

This vast minority approved a change in the election of Student Union officers, approved a proposal to have all future referendums on amendments or changes in the Constitution submitted to the student newspaper one week prior to the vote, and because a two-thirds vote is required for all constitutional changes, a proposal to alter the composition of the Honor Board was turned down. Sixty-four percent of the group voted for this proposal.

The changes which were made last Tuesday are not what is most important about the vote. The absolute lack of student support for the voting process is, however, critical. Try the numbers again: one hundred and forty-nine of 2,600 students voted. And the votes which they cast will affect the entire student body regardless of how most students would have voted. And only because Longwood students refused to take the time to fill out a ballot.

Perhaps we showed our true self last Tuesday, a self brimming over with lethargy. It is not as if the voting table was inaccessible to students: SGA workers were in the New Smoker for three-and-a-half hours, during both lunch and dinner. It's probably a good guess to say that 1,500 students passed by the table a week ago. And exactly one hundred and forty-nine of them voted.

Whether or not Longwood students are as apathetic as this vote indicates is difficult to establish, but the upcoming SGA elections will be yet another opportunity for the student body to show its true self.

Will we make the effort to vote responsibly, and in large numbers, in this election? Our lethargic self may say 'no'; our true one may speak otherwise.

Your Turn

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to your election issue two weeks ago, which was biased and obviously slanted towards Walter Mondale. One case in point was your lead story, which was a two-page commentary by Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York. What was printed was Gov. Cuomo's keynote address at the Democratic National Convention in San Francisco way back in July. I really don't understand why (The Rotunda) you wasted two pages of the school newspaper to repeat a speech that was broadcast by all of television's major networks and seen by millions of people. The Republican keynote speech wasn't printed. Jeff Abernathy went on to write an endorsement of the Mondale/Ferraro ticket.

The only counterpoint was a comparatively short article on page four supporting President Reagan's stands. Also, a letter to the editor was included supporting Ronald Reagan, although I am wondering if J. Andrew O'Connor was Pro-Reagan or Pro-War.

Here, I stop to weigh the coverage of the two sides. The paper clearly leaned to the Democratic side and I wonder how any reasonable person could be so obviously biased and frankly, unprofessional. Those responsible for publishing that issue abused their rights as "members of the press" and showed very poor journalism in their actions.

To be fair, I did find the poll of Longwood students very interesting and I imagine many of the Republicans on campus support my stance on your issue, since so many of those polled supported Pres. Reagan. I don't think the election issue swayed any intelligent person's vote, but the principle behind a biased issue is still wrong.

Animal Lovers Beware!

Sometime ago, my attention was brought to an article in a somewhat reputable women's magazine, describing the qualities of the ideal male. Chief among them was the notion that the "perfect 10 male" loves children and animals. I found this rather disconcerting, not that I'm striving for any type of social perfection, but only because I've been so openly opinionated about the whole matter.

You see, I do not like animals; of any sort. I don't even like the idea of animals. Animals are no friends of mine. They are not welcome in my house. They occupy no space in my heart. Animals are off my list. I will say, however, in the spirit of qualification, that I mean them no particular harm. I won't bother animals if animals won't bother me. At least I won't personally bother animals. I do feel that a plate bereft of a good cut of something rare is an affront to the serious diner.

Therefore, I might more accurately state that I do not like animals with two exceptions. The first being in the past tense in which case I like them just fine, especially in the form of veal cutlets or Bass Weejun loafers. And the second being outside, by which I do not merely mean outside of the house, but genuinely outside as in outside in the woods, or preferably outside in the South American jungle. This is after all, only fair. I don't go there, why should they come here?

The above being the case, it should come as no surprise that I do not approve of the practice of keeping animals as pets. In fact, I think it should be disallowed by law. Especially the keeping of cats, and dogs if you live in the city.

Having previously verbalized these sentiments in society, I have been the recipient of the information that even if dogs should be withheld from the frivolous, there would still be the blind and the pathologically lonely to think of. I am not totally devoid of compassion, and after much thought I believe that I have hit upon the perfect solution to this problem— let the lonely lead the blind. This would provide companionship to one and a sense of direction to the other, without inflicting on the rest of us the all too common spectacle of grown men addressing German shepherds in the respectful tones best reserved for elderly clergymen and Internal Revenue X agents.

As for the rest of you animal lovers, if actual friends are not within your grasp, may I suggest that you take a cue from your favorite celebrity and consider investing in a really good entourage. If this does not appeal to you, perhaps you should alter your concept of companionship. Living things need not enter into it at all. Georgian silver and authentic 18th century furniture make wonderful companions, as do a well-stocked bar and most types of gourmet foods. Use your imagination, study up on the subject. You'll think of something.

Just in case you don't, I've directed the remainder of my remarks to the pets themselves, in the hope that they might at least learn to disport themselves with dignity and grace:

If you are a dog and your owner suggests that you wear a sweater ... suggest that he wear a tail.

If you are only a bird in a gilded cage—count your blessings.

A dog who thinks he is man's best friend is a dog who obviously has never met a tax lawyer.

If you have been named after a human being of artistic note, run away from home. It is unthinkable that even an animal should be obliged to share quarters with anyone who calls a cat Ford Madox Ford.

Dogs who earn their living by appearing in television commercials in which they constantly and aggressively demand meat should remember that in at least one Far Eastern country they are meat.

Congress Sends Reagan A Higher Student Aid Budget

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Students locked out of 1984 federal financial aid programs could find some opened doors next year if President Ronald Reagan signs the fiscal 1985 education funding bill now on his desk.

Experts predict Reagan will sign H.R. 6028, which contains the federal education budget for the Oct. 1, 1984 to Sept. 30, 1985 fiscal year, and was passed Oct. 11 by both houses of Congress.

Student financial aid funds comprise nearly $8 billion of the total $17.9 billion education package, with $3.6 billion earmarked for Pell grants and $3 billion for Guaranteed Student Loans (GSL).

"We think the increases will loosen up financial aid substantially," Lou Dietrich, Department of Education spokeswoman reports. "The budget exceeds our request for 1985 and provides a great deal of aid."

Nevertheless, some aid directors around the country fear the increases may be too little, too late to help current students, and that they're not big enough to help students new to the aid programs.

Still, Congress's aid budget is $1.7 billion more than last year's, and nearly $1.5 billion more than the president wanted in the 1985 budget.

In his budget request, delivered to Congress last February, Reagan wanted to fund the Pell program at its 1984 level, eliminate Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants (SEOG) and State Student Incentive Grants, drastically cut National Direct Student Loans (NDSL) and increase Work/Study and GSL allocations.

In addition, the Office of Management and Budget earlier this year proposed letting inflation eat away more aid programs by keeping budgets the same through the next four years.

Congress instead has increased the total education budget by 14 percent and sent it to the White House for Reagan's signature.

"There are increases in just about every program for 1985," Dietrich notes. "It certainly provides students with more aid options."

The SEOG program would get $40 million more, NDSLs $35 million more and College Work/Study $37.5 million more than 1984 levels if Reagan signs the bill into law.

College financial aid directors around the country, battered by four years of aid cuts, seem relieved but unsated.

"We've always had a problem here with lack of funds," Alan Shipley of Northern Arizona University explains. "Any increase will make it easier for students to apply for and receive the dollars they need."

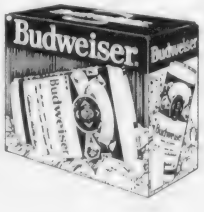
"The increases are good," Jeff Baker of San Francisco State agrees. "But I'd like to see more of them and more changes."

"We have a critical problem here," Montana State Financial Aid Director Jim Craig says, hoping the increases won't come too late. "Lots of students apply and we have no funds for them."

"The budget for financial aid has not grown with the cost of living," he adds.

But while education experts are happy about the increases, they note the funding is not as substantial as it looks.

"The budget restores the erosion of the last four years," Dallas Martin of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators says. "Funding still doesn't equal the real purchasing power of fiscal 1980."



The increases will cover inflation's effect on college costs, he predicts, and "maybe a little more."

Some aid directors maintain the increases, particularly for Pell Grants and GSLs, won't help new aid applicants much.

"The increase in Pell funds will go mostly to students already in the program," Pat Smith of the American Council on Education (ACE) stresses. "Maximum grants will be raised from $1900 to $2100, and there are nearly three million students in the program."

"It's pretty much arithmetic," San Francisco's Baker concedes. "I hope the Pell increase isn't eaten up by the additional maximum grants. I hope it means more students will receive Pell grants."

The GSL increases, he adds, primarily will cover defaults and differences between the nine percent student interest rate and the actual GSL interest rate.

The Dads: Fighting

By Lori Foster
and Gary Rader

"We're fighting for our lives," expressed Bryan Harvey, the lead vocal and bass player for "the Dads". With their album on a major label, they are up against artists such as Paul McCartney, Billy Joel, and Michael Jackson, and CBS does not need to promote a band like "the Dads" unless their album sells. "You've got to sell, that's the bottom line," Bryan continued. In a recent interview, Bryan and other band members stressed their concern that people who make tapes of albums instead of purchasing them are hurting new struggling bands as opposed to well known artists. "Once we're famous they can tape all they want, but right now we need all the support we can get" stated David Ayers, the lead guitarist.

"The Dads" are currently in a period of transition in their career, moving from a fraternity band to an opening act and touring with major bands. On November 11, "the Dads" opened for "Culture Club" at the Capital Center in Washington, D.C.

"The Dads" first album simply titled "the Dads" was released last September. The album consists of their original lyrics and song arrangements with no alterations by CBS. It's difficult to categorize the music of the Dads. It cannot be classified as reggae or Motown, but it seems to breathe new life into rock-n-roll. Whatever it is.... it's very infectious.

The album contains several good cuts, with the best one being "Imagination" which is being released as a single this week. The song has great driving rhythm and vocal work making it a dance song. With local radio stations giving it a lot of airplay, the tune is quickly becoming a big hit for the band. Another strong dance song, "Wonderworld", will probably do well on the charts as their next single. "Do What You Wanna", "Man With Machinery", "Radio 101", and "I Heard the News" are all enjoyable songs to get out on the dance floor and go crazy to. This is just what happened in the lower dining hall on November 9, as they drew a large crowd that was wound up throughout the entire concert.

Before their concert "the Dads" and I were face to face in their no-frills dressing room in the lower dining hall discussing their plans and attitudes as they constantly entertained me with their chalant humor and impressive character. The members of the band seemed to mold into the environment they encountered here at Longwood, in the dressing room and on the stage.

All the band members were involved with previous bands. The drummer, Michael Tubb, a former Longwood student, played in a band called "Headwinds" which played for campus functions. Michael and David were the band's originators and began playing as a street band on corners in Georgetown and Richmond. They soon found Keith Pittman and Bryan and the foursome then called themselves "the Dads". They chose this title to avoid a "bad boy" image, and are striving for a clean, suburban type shadow. Dressed mainly in black and white their similar appearance during the interview, on the stage, and on their album cover, portrays a cool rebel style.

After a bit of uproar when I confronted them with the rumors of their possible homosexuality they agreed that there is something about being an artist opposed to a football player that people tend to associate "with being gay". "The members are as red-blooded as they come" says Keith. After denying all tendencies of this kind, the members quickly changed the subject but continued to joke about it throughout the rest of the interview.

Rock-n-roll musicians are also frequently connected with drugs, yet "the Dads" have a silent attempt to disassociate the rock scene with drugs by not playing the industry's game. "The Dads" play it straight and they don't want to promote drugs in any way by action or in their music, however, "this doesn't mean they don't have fun from time to time" one of them remarked. They feel if you are successful you must also be responsible for any influence you have on the public. Some short term future plans of the band are to open for "the Fix" and "Chaka Kahn", and on November 21 they will be at 2001 Odyssey in Richmond for a big extravaganza.

CBS has been on hand to record, promote and deliver the Richmond-based band's music to the public. The "Dads" have begun to take control of their destination with the release of their album which will hopefully head them in the direction of success. Bryan says his idea of success "would be to be heard by a lot of people opposed to owning a yacht or a Ferrari." David's ultimate dream would be to be able to make records for a living. Either way "the Dads" are slowly earning their respect in the music business with their refreshing new style. The group has a few flaws, like most fairly new groups they have a lack of consistency and some superficial qualities. But if they mature like they should, they will gather a strong following and make a name for themselves in the music industry.

Bedroom Farce Reviewed

By Gwen Stephenson

"If S-E-X ever rears its ugly head, close your eyes so you won't see the rest of it." This line captures the theme of Alan Ayckbourne's Bedroom Farce which was staged by the Department of Speech and Dramatic Arts and the Longwood Players November 7 through 10.

The characters are four married couples. Trevor and Susannah provide the main marital conflict around which the plot revolves. Susannah has absolutely no self-confidence and does constant verbal reinforcement exercises to improve her situation. Meanwhile, Trevor concentrates on being the ultimate self-centered male. Their sexual relationship has "gone totally wrong," as Susannah says.

Nick and Jan are the next pair. Jan has married Nick on the rebound from Trevor. Trevor fancies himself as a destroyer as do most male chauvinists. This subplot lends itself to the comedy, for Jan is far from distraught about her lost love; and Nick is flat on his back due to a back injury. Jan treats her cynical, bedridden spouse with loving care, though liberally mixed with touches of sarcasm. Nick, in short, is not a good patient.

Malcolm and Kate are newlyweds who have just moved into a small house. They are both giddy with "love's young dream" and full of practical jokes. On the night the action takes place they play host and hostess to their housewarming party. Trevor and his mate disrupt the party (and the audience in what was the best scene of the show) by having a violent fight. Jan tries to reunite the couple by counselling Trevor, but in a spasm of passion Trevor kisses her just as his neurotic wife re-enters the room.

As Trevor attempts to mend all of the relationships he has damaged we finally meet the fourth couple, his parents, Ernest and Delia. Delia dominates the hen-pecked Ernest and espouses their marital theme: "Keep your husband well fed and comfortable. But the most important thing is not to tell him anything he doesn't need to know." Ernest trips through life content to let Delia make his decisions. He is more concerned about trivial things like the loose guttering on his house.

Curt Walker cuts a wonderful character as Ernest, with some great stereotypical carricatures of elderly traits. Walker's character was reminiscent of Tim Conway on the Carol Burnett Show. He was hilarious at times, but it was obvious that he was aiming solely for the laughs.

Linda Sauve also does an outstanding job as Jan, the cool and practical victim of Nick's back problem. Ms. Sauve's actions and lines were carried with a great deal of professional poise and her presence in some shaky scenes helped maintain some plausibility.

Connie Watkins as the spacy, neurotic Susannah brings her part to life in more ways than one. She not only looks like a potential fruitcake; she acts it as well. Jumping when anyone enters the room, holding frequent conversations with herself, becoming violent at a moment's notice—all her discomforts add to our delight in the production. Ms. Watkins was so into her part that she sometimes upstaged her fellow actors, and caused the audience to lose some of the lines while they were still laughing at Susannah's antics. However, she was the most believable character on stage, because of her intensity.

Jeff Flemming, as Trevor compliments his wife's zaniness with his own self-indulgence. If his character is somewhat unrealistic at times, like that of Nick played by Jerry Dagenhart, the audience must realize that this is a farce. Some characters must be exaggerated to give the story humor. Flemming did a very nice job of balancing Trevor's extreme character traits. Trevor is at the same time stupid and neurotic on one hand and stupid and arrogant on the other. The entire play revolves around this and it puts "a great heavy weight" on Flemming which could explain some of Flemming's shakiness. Not bad though, not bad at all.

Dagenhart also had a very difficult part, lying in bed the entire time. His sarcasm was almost a visible entity. Dagenhart has an obvious mastery of comedic timing and delivery and easily got the most laughs. Perhaps his voice is a bit too grating on the ears, but it blended well with his character.

Kate and Malcolm (Deanna Deitrich and Andrew Murtaugh) were bubbly and fun. Their antics brought relief from the friction caused by Trevor and Susannah. Murtaugh's delivery was off sometimes but he was well suited to the practical joker role. Ms. Deitrich was great as the "Straight woman of the show." She provided a much-needed balance.

Cathy Miller brought Delia to life as a mother hen guarding her chicks. Ms. Miller's British accent was without a doubt the most natural in the show which lended a great deal of credibility to her part.

The set by A. Mofatt Evans was simple and very realistic,

Yale University students were angered for being fined for opting to move off campus after the housing deadline, even though the school had a severe housing crunch. Students thought their rooms could be easily filled, making fines unnecessary. Housing officials say the fines are levied to get students to take the deadline seriously.

A Rule About Officers' Grades is kicking up dust at Syracuse University. The rule that student organization officers be in good academic standing is being enforced by the administration for the first time in recent years. It could affect the current Student Government president, whose grade point average is below 2.0, according to a local newspaper. SGA rules don't spell out grade qualifications, and administrators won't comment on possible sanctions against specific individuals.

A New Phone-In Registration System enabled over 6,000 Penn State University students to change their class schedules without leaving home. Those eligible to use the system received an incomplete class schedule in pre-registration. Their schedules contained a toll-free number to call, and a list of instructions for using the phone-in process.

A Seemingly Innocent Interview put the University of Pittsburgh student newspaper on sports pages nationally. The article, on Pittsburgh star Bill Fralic, included the gridder's comment that he likes to "go play golf and go (blank) girls and get loaded." That quote made the city paper, The Pittsburgh Press, and the wire services. Fralic took much of the heat, but the Pitt News also came under fire for running his obscene remarks. Striking back in its own editorial, the paper defended its right as a student paper to express ideas and take changes. The problem, said the News, was that the professional press distorted and overplayed a comment intended only for a college audience.

The Mysterious Disappearance of a Knute Rockne bust from the University of Notre Dame campus is still making headlines on that campus. The perpetrators of last spring's theft sent pictures of the missing bust—wearing a Purdue jersey—to the campus newspaper, The Observer, accompanied by a message from "Rock." Shortly thereafter, the paper reported that an ND graduate and two current students were responsible for the bust's disappearance. All three have denied the charges. ND police say they've passed on a lead to the Los Angeles Police Department to be checked out.

Pushing Students to choose a career is a mistake too many parents are making today, says Dr. Robert Kellogg, dean of the University of Virginia's College of Arts and Sciences. Parents of liberal arts students shouldn't pressure their children to a narrowly focused vocational field where entry-level jobs abound, warns Kellogg. Such training neglects skills for critical thinking, literate communication and problem solving—skills rare enough in American society, he says.

If Cornell Seniors decide to create a South African Divestment Fund as an alternative to the traditional Senior Gift, the Student Assembly is ready to administer it. The SA voted its readiness to accept the responsibility this month, clearing the way for creation of such a fund.

Students Can Campaign For Credit at Southern Illinois University-Carbondale. Political science majors and some community development interns will receive class credit for working in political campaign. One local candidate capitalized on that situation by advertising for student volunteers with the promise of class credit.

The Much-Publicized Vote by Brown University students to stock suicide pills in case of nuclear war was intended to draw attention to the threat of nuclear war, but may do just the opposite, according to Sanford Gottlieb, executive director of the United Campuses to Prevent Nuclear War. Thinking about suicide can cause students to adopt a defeatist attitude and actually drive them away from the campus nuclear freeze movements, he says.

Only Five Students asked to be placed with non-drinking roommates at the University of Iowa, housing officials there say. They had formally made that option available in August, although it had been informally used—through room transfers—in the past. The low number was attributed to students' ability to find compatible roommates on their own.

A Student Referendum on Student Senate funding of a gay student group is churning up the University of Kansas campus. Students opposing the funding collected 2,000 signatures on petitions calling for the referendum. One of those students subsequently came under fire for selling "Fagbusters" T-shirts. The senate has since rejected and then reconsidered holding the vote.

The State Supreme Court upheld Columbia University's suspension of two students arrested last spring for assaulting other students. The pair challenged their suspensions on the grounds they were denied due process in disciplinary hearings. The court said the two students were given the right to counsel, heard the charges against them, and had the opportunity to explain their side of the story.

Students Revive Boycott To Protest Cuts

Fort Collins, CO (CPS) — Colorado's statewide student association, reviving a tactic from the late sixties and early seventies, is calling on students to strike on November 1 to protest rising tuition and the "declining quality" of higher education in the state.

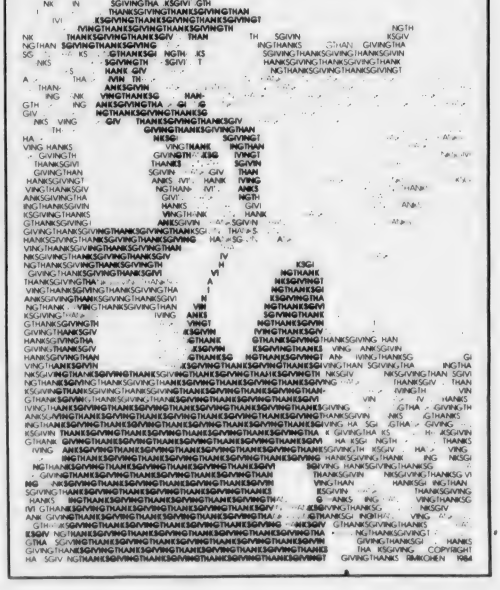
Strike organizers plan public discussions of state funding, tuition, financial aid and a proposal to raise the state legal drinking age to 21.

"Something needs to be done to dramatically grab the people's attention to show them that higher education is seriously underfunded in Colorado," says John Francis, co-president of the University of Colorado's student government.

"While I sympathize with students' frustration with the legislature and agree that higher education needs increased funding, I cannot condone a class boycott," Gov. Richard Lamm replies. "Instead, I suggest (students) voice their opinions at the polls November 6."

There were many student strikes during the student movement of the sixties and seventies, but they've been rare for the last decade, says Bob Bingaman, director of the State Student Association in Washington, D. C.

Such strikes, when successful, "educate students and heighten student awareness of issues in higher education. People on campuses start talking about the issues and the level of debate on the issues increases."



"Several years ago Pennsylvania students staged a broad-based class boycott and shut down eight of the 13 state campuses" to protest a proposed mid-year tuition increase, Bingaman recalls.

"The strike was very successful," helping increase funding for state colleges and raise faculty salaries, Bingaman says.

However, some activists see Pennsylvania Gov. Richard Thornburgh's subsequent gutting of the statewide student association's funding mechanism as retaliation for the political pressure he felt. The association now has desperate budget woes.

Except for the Pennsylvania strike, though, Bingaman is not aware of any statewide student strike "since at least 1975."

"It's a risky move," concedes Scott Houser, president of the Colorado State Student Association."And if we build it up to be something it doesn't become, we could lose credibility. If it works, the benefits far outweigh the risks." If the Colorado students are successful, notes Bingaman, who recently spent a week helping organize the strike, they could revive student strikes as tactics for gaining public and political support for higher education.

Cheerleaders Split Squads!!!

By Tim Fitzgerald

The 1984-85 Longwood cheerleading squads are on their way to becoming the best squads ever at Longwood. Joyce Phillips, in her third year as head cheerleading coach, is very enthusiastic about the squads this year.

There will be two separate squads this year, one to cheer at the men's basketball games and one to cheer at the women's basketball games. Coach Phillips feels that this should make a big difference in the overall performance. "We started with two squads last year but we lost a lot of people which forced the remaining members to cheer at both men's and women's games. It was too much work and we were burned out by January. We should not have that problem this year. With two squads we should be able to do a good job at every game."

In August the cheerleaders attended The Universal Cheerleaders Association Camp. The camp featured approximately 1500 cheerleaders from division I and II schools across the nation. "Attending camp really helped us a lot," said Phillips.

Campus Yearbooks Face Oblivion

By Susan Skorupa

(CPS) — Faced with student apathy, money woes and mismanagement, college yearbook staffs this year are finding it takes more than snappy copy and pretty pictures to sell yearbooks.

A number of colleges, weary of late yearbook deliveries and having to bail yearbooks out of financial trouble, now are demanding the books pay their own way.

Last week, for example, the University of Alabama simply slashed the press run of its yearbook to cut losses because it came out late.

The Corolla staff bitterly called the move "a lack of faith in our abilities."

But many of the yearbook ventures seem to be responding by installing more efficient, professional operations.

The University of Massachusetts yearbook staff, for instance, last month confronted an ultimatum to do better or junk its book by bringing out the 1983-84 Index three weeks ahead of deadline.

"Students were getting tired of the yearbook," says John Mooradian, U. Mass. Student Government Association (SGA) treasurer. "It was always late and the quality was bad. And the student fund can't support a late, expensive yearbook."

The SGA, after initially trying to withhold all funds for the yearbook, told the staff it had to prove it could produce a high-quality book on time, and then sell it.

"This year the book is of exceptional quality," Mooradian boasts. "Student reaction has been very good."

Yearbook staffs note they aren't always to blame for bad reaction or missed deadlines.

Alabama's Corolla staffers recall someone stole their computer and five disks that held a third of the book, forcing them to start over and change deadlines.

Yearbooks also have suffered from student apathy, observes David Honnold of Taylor Publishing Company's College and University Division, which prints many campus yearbooks nationwide.

"If a school with 10,000 students includes the yearbook price in its student activity fees, only about 40 percent will actually pick up a yearbook", he says.

"Students think, 'Why buy a yearbook when, for the same price, you can buy a couple of six packs?' " agrees Brian Mooar, 1984-95 editor of Kent State's yearbook.

Usually, the combination of high costs and the student apathy caused by poor quality can kill a yearbook without student government or administrative threats.

That's what nearly happened at Pacific Lutheran University in 1981.

"The quality was poor," admits 1984-85 Saga editor Dana Tigges. "But since then we've hired and maintained a good staff. The quality of the book has gone up and the administration is more enthused about financing it, so we're really encouraged."

Kent State felt the student apathy crunch in 1976 when the university transferred yearbook funding from the school budget to the Student Publication Policy Committee.

"Funding dropped from $15,000 to $1,500," Mooar recalls, forcing students to buy the books separately instead of paying for them as part of their tuition.

Since then, "we've had to change our thinking around," he concedes. "We've had to take a large step away from making it a photographer's gallery with no copy."

Kent State now publishes more color, more copy and more "names with faces," to entice purchasers, Mooar notes.

Arizona's yearbook staff hopes the same tactics and providing free coverage to all clubs, fraternities and sororities will convince more students to buy books this year.

Bradley University's staff expects a price cut and more student portraits will boost sales of the financially-troubled Anaga.

But at Stephens College in Columbia, Mo., student apathy is only part of a "domino effect" threatening yearbook financing, contends yearbook advisor Connie Beachler.

"We seem to start with a decent staff that dwindles, so quality goes down," she laments. "Fewer and fewer students buy the book and that exacerbates the financial situation."

While many schools face the same problems of falling subscription sales and declining quality, Taylor's Honnold says the number of colleges with yearbooks has remained fairly stable for the last five years, and has risen since the late sixties and early seventies decline.

During those years, "yearbook publication dropped off, probably because of student apathy, the same as with fraternities and sororities. It wasn't the thing to do at the time," he says.

Now schools that produce a quality yearbook find students are willing to buy it, he adds.

"You have to appeal to the masses and still cater to your own sense of journalistic excellence," Kent State's Mooar agrees. "There has to be a happy medium or you won't sell books."

Kersey Makes Blazer Roster

By Jim O'Hara

Former Longwood College basketball great Jerome Kersey became the first player from Southside Virginia to ever earn a spot on a roster on a National Basketball Association team this week when the Portland Trailblazers finalized its team for the 1984-85 pro season.

The All-American from Clarksville was assured a spot on the team Tuesday night when the Blazers place three-year veteran Pete Verhoeven on waivers bringing the total number of players on the roster to 12.

"I learned about it sitting in my room watching the news last night," Kersey said enthusiastically during a telephone conversation from Portland Wednesday. "Then a little later the team psychologist came by and told me."

"But I couldn't afford to go out and celebrate," he added. "We have practice at 10:30 this morning."

The all-time leading scorer and rebounder for Longwood, Kersey apparently sewed up his spot on the team with an outstanding pre-season effort. In Portland's eight pre-season games, Kersey averaged 14.1 points, 6.3 rebounds had six blocks and 11 steals.

"The coaches are very pleased with him," John White, public relations director for Portland said Wednesday afternoon. "We feel that it's possible that we may have gotten the steal of the draft this year.

"I was trying to prepare myself for the bad news and the good news," the 6-7 small forward for Portland commented. "The decision can sometimes be political, but I'm glad they kept me."

LC head coach Cal Luther, who guided Kersey for the last three years, was more pleased to see his former player make the Blazers than some former players he coached that played pro ball.

"I've had some of my kids make the NBA before," he said Wednesday morning, "but I've never had a kid more deserving than Jerome. Even if he doesn't play a minute this year, he'd be an asset to the team."

"I had talked with general manager Stu Inman recently and he said the coaches were looking for a player who knew the system and had some experience," Luther added. "So it was a herculean task for him to make it. He must have really impressed the coaching staff."

Portland opens up the season this Saturday when they visit the Kansas City Kings for the season opener. The only game in which area fans can get a chance to see Portland play this season is March 6 when they play the Washington Bullets in Landover, Md.

"I'll be playing small forward," Kersey said about his role on the team. "It's a good position and offensively allows you to get some shots." Pro standout Kiki Vandeweghe will more than likely start for Portland at that position.

"Getting hit when you're going up for a shot is a lot different than when I played at Longwood," Kersey went on to say about the different style of play."

Portland's roster may have one of the youngest benches in the league this year. Kersey is one of five rookies on the team. As far as getting some playing time this season, he pointed out that it all "depends on how I do in practice."

A Plea for Pluralism

By Bill Moore

While the dust appears to have settled after the rash of controversies at Longwood this fall, I believe there remains some unfinished business—what does it all tell us about ourselves? My training tells me that experiences usually need processing (not ignoring) to be most educational. Besides, the whole sordid affair reminds me of one of the Longwood goals, and since it's partly my job to keep these goals in our focus, I feel compelled to speak out.

The central theme running through all of these controversies is one of individual differences, primarily in lifestyle choices—greek or independent, gay or straight, the use of language termed by some "offensive." Obviously, even in a small-town, small-college environment, this microcosm of America reflects the range of different kinds of people in this country. And why not? America, after all, is the great melting pot, one of the very few nations founded on clearly defined principles of tolerance and pluralism. The range of pluralism may have stretched quite a bit since 1776, but the fundamental principles remain the same.

So what kind of pluralistic dialogue have we witnessed here recently? From the sidelines, all I see is narrow-mindedness, distortion, name-calling, and stereotyping coming from all "sides" of these controversies. It reminds me of this fall's presidential campaign, where on both sides, the "other" is attacked and vilified—there seems to be only sporadic attempts to address significant issues. As a recent Washington Post column suggests, "Reagan isn't running a campaign, he's running a rock video." The primary of imagery seems true on our local stage as well—all is attack and parry, hyperbole, unwillingness to engage in dialogue—but to paraphrase a current sage, where's the substance?

I promised a Longwood goal, and here it is—sense of awakening. This goal relates to the development of a greater understanding of our own values and sense of what's right and what's wrong, while at the same time coming to terms with the inevitability that other people will have other perspectives. The next step, radical to some people, is acknowledging that those different perspectives (values, lifestyles, political parties, etc.) can be accepted as legitimate in their own right at the same time you choose to believe in and strive toward your own absolute standards that may conflict with others' viewpoints. That continual engagement with ambiguity and variety is at the core of a pluralistic, free society; while such a society sets limits through its laws, there are very few areas in which absolute standards are applied. Sense of awakening thus involves learning to define one's own commitments in the face of this diversity and not automatically condemning different commitments. The public discourse about our recent controversies at Longwood does not display much of this sense of awakening, unfortunately.

Controversy can be healthy if it leads to open discussion and debate; it helps us to engage our minds and reflect on our viewpoints (and justifications). But we need to keep a sense of awakening in mind while we engage and reflect, otherwise we add little to any meaningful dialogue. The theologian Reinhold Niebuhr once said that the highest form of religious tolerance was based on the belief that "all actual expressions of religious faith are subject to historical contingency and relativity"—in other words, express your faith but understand that your absolutes are not necessarily the same as for everyone else. As Benjamin DeMott, an English professor at Amherst College writes in the latest issue of Harper's (October, 1984):

> You have it in you to fight off reductiveness and trivialization. You have it in you to be impatient with oversimplification—indeed, to be sore enough about it to stand against it. . . Dancing to an extraordinary variety or rhythms in the world simultaneously is feasible. (emphasis added)

That is what we are asked to do when confronted with such complexity in a pluralistic world—if not dance, at least cope with the "extraordinary variety"- of lifestyles we will inevitably encounter. Why is that so much to ask?

Goals and Realities

By Bill Moore

As part of the Longwood Goals Project, I've been involved recently in interviewing freshmen students about their college goals, and it's clear that the concept of goals, let alone THE 14 GOALS, evokes lofty and abstract images. Students have a hard time relating them to the real world, and thus they tend to ignore or ridicule such notions. But as this political campaign grinds to a halt, I am prompted to make some connections between goals and the cold, hard realities of life.

Be honest with yourself—have you taken the time to become responsibly informed about the candidates and their views, or is your preference determined by media images and other people's (like your parents) values? Nowhere, I think, is our intellectual sloth more evident than in our approach to voting decisions; too many people watch television ads or the 30-second bits on the nightly news, accept candidates' rhetoric at its face value, and let our prejudices take over. How does that relate to the goal of critical thinking? Or responsible citizenship? A major national newspaper reported a list of inaccuracies in the presidential candidates' statements during the first debate: Reagan's list was about twice as long as Mondale's, but they both had distorted facts in their rhetoric. Did you even bother to question their statements, or did you let your initial preference rule who you believed and who you didn't? How do you decide? That's part of what THE 14 GOALS are all about, and if you ignore it, you could be living with mistakes and poor judgments--both in terms of voting, perhaps, as well as in one's personal life.

Take other areas—how's your world consciousness, for instance? Did you know the world spends an average of $19,310 per year per solider on defense, but only $380 per year per school-aged child for education? That there are 556 soldiers per 100,000 people, but only 85 physicians? Meanwhile, the U.S. remains one of the world's largest weapons dealers. These are realities that need to be confronted; are these the priorities we'd like to see for the "global village"? But we can't even begin to grasp these realities until we address these goals—world consciousness, sense of awakening, critical thinking, and so on. They may be lofty to you, but this political season brings them down to earth—they're real.

1,000 point mark for career scoring. Holmes averaged 11.8 points and 8.1 rebounds.

Johnson averaged 6.5 points and 3.5 rebounds while seeing action at both guard and forward.

Sophomores Karen Boska and Caren Forbes were starters a year ago and should be even better in 1984-85. Sophomore Melanie Lee was a top inside reserve in her rookie season and junior Kellie Jordan also got in for considerable action.

Longwood freshmen include 5-4 Annette Easterling, 5-8 Angie Hill and 6-2 Barbie Burton, sophomore Pat Irvine, a 5-9 forward, transferred from Southern Seminary.

Duncan feels the newcomers are capable of playing right away and bolstering the team's depth.

"We should be improved in all areas," said the Longwood coach. "With a year's experience, the veterans will be more effective executing our running game and player-to-player defense.

"We want to continue the success of last year, and we'd very much like to win the Mason-Dixon Conference championship."

except for one thing: It slanted about two feet from front to back, and dipped in center stage. Not only did this help the audience to see the actors' heads while they were in bed but aided the psychological slant of the play.

So, in the end did Susannah and Trevor get their act together? Have they destroyed all the other relationships? Only the audience knows, hopefully you were part of it. This was an excellent production put on by a fine cast and crew. Thanks to director Douglas M. Young and the Longwood Players for saving some of us from another typical Longwood evening.

SCHEDULE OF EXAMINATIONS - FALL SEMESTER 1984

Examinations for the fall semester 1984/85 are scheduled at times determined by the regular class meeting time. For example, the examination for the classes normally meeting at 2:00 Tuesday and/or Thursday will be held 2-5 Thursday, December 13 in the regular class meeting location.

Examinations for evening classes will be held during examination week at the time and on the day of the regular class meeting, except that examinations for Wednesday evening classes will be held Saturday, December 15, from 2 to 5 p.m.

This schedule provides makeup periods on Saturday, December 15, and Tuesday, December 18. Makeup periods have been established so that students with valid reasons may arrange with the instructor to make up a missed exam.

Richmond Sonfonia Not on an Elevator!

By Barrett Baker

It was a classic example of what my Journalism teacher calls "missing the point." I was heading towards the snack bar for a burrito and to figure out what I should write this week when the sound of trumpets reached me from Jarman Auditorium. I had two tickets to the Richmond Sinfonia and the show was starting in 20 minutes—good deal! I no longer needed to worry about a story and I didn't have to eat that burrito...

I was a little disappointed to find that most of the crowd attending were not Longwood students—despite the fact the Student Union offered free tickets to the first 250 students who requested them as opposed to the $12 that everyone else had to pay. That alone should have encouraged people to enjoy a night out. It was also a bit discouraging to find that the students that did show up seemed to be there for a class. "Let's get this over with" was a commonly expressed phrase.

And why should young people go to a show like this? It was the kind of music my brother and I always referred to as "elevator music" when we were younger. But there is something special about seeing a symphony in person, if nothing else, only to be impressed by the precision involved with a production like this. If the Richmond Braves were anywhere near as well orchestrated, they would never lose a game.

Apart from the fact that conductor, Peter Bay had to wait for the Longwood Towers to finish tolling 8:00 just as he was ready to begin, and that one of the chairs in the orchestra had a Coor's Beer Wolf sticker on it—not to mention that no wine was served during intermission—the Richmond Sinfonia put on an excellent show featuring pieces from Mendelssohn, Elgar, Mozart, and Ludwig von Beethoven. It was a pleasant, relaxing change from today's modern, electronic rock 'n roll.

The program was made possible in part by grants from the Virginia Commision for the Arts, and the National Endowment for the Arts, and was sponsored by Longwood's Teacher Education Centennial Committee, the Student Union and Alpha Delta Kappa.

Dance Company Performance 'Enjoyable'

By Lori Foster

The Longwood Company of Dancers opened their Fall Studio Concert last weekend with a colorful and lively performance—due largely in part by the choreography of Dance Company members and by some very interesting lighting effects.

The show opened with "Starlight," a jazzy, upbeat piece choreographed by Gayle Arpe featuring music by Madonna. Arpe, personally, danced with energy and style. Her cast, however, whether inexperienced, nervous, or both, did not seem as enthusaistic and thus the dance did not come across as well as it could have.

The second piece, "Terpsichore in Zephyrus" choreographed by Carol Moran, was probably the most precise and fluent piece in the show. Featuring music by Alan Parsons, the dance combined both modern dance and classical ballet with three experienced dancers piecing together some very special moments into a very enjoyable performance.

"Laisser-Faire," the third piece choreographed by Angie Smith, featured a jazzed-up piece by Tchaikovsky. The piece had definite bright spots from individuals but was still somehow lacking as a whole.

Choreographed by Laura Cawthorne, "Bustin'" with music from the title song of the soundtrack, "Ghostbusters," was the most enjoyable performance of the show involving both dance and theatrics. Every dancer involved made this piece a real crowd pleaser.

"Bitter-Suite" choreographed and performed by former Dance Company members Horace Scruggs and Nance Nuckols, was an excellent bridge from "Ghostbusters" to the following dance, "Typically Western," by slowing the tempo down. Featuring music by Cole Porter, Carey-Fisher, Carter, Susselelorf, and Worth, the dance begins with a solo by Scruggs, followed by a solo by Nuckols, and ending with a duet by the two.

The finale, "Typically Western" was originally choreographed by Ann Czompo of Cortland State College and featured music by Aaron Copeland. Adapted with permission by Dance Company Director, Nelson Neal, this piece involved everything from barroom brawls and train robberies to a hoedown and a rodeo. It was a really fun piece made better by various members "hamming it up."

All in all, the whole performance, which lasted about an hour, was well worth seeing and thoroughly enjoyable.

Currently, Lancaster is the only four-year, academic library in Virginia equipped with a functioning VTLS except for Virginia Tech's library where the system was developed. Other college libraries are getting the VTLS or already have it but have not put it into use yet. Several public libraries have the VTLS, including the State Library in Richmond. Lancaster Library has the ability to read the State Library's catalogue and when other academic libraries put the VTLS in use, Lancaster Library will be able to read their catalogue as well.

Soccer Team on the Wire

Well the Longwood Lancer soccer team really brought it down to the wire this year. Originally thought to have a good chance at gaining a bid to the twelve team national tournament, the Lancers went into their final game unsure of even a state tournament bid.

Last Wednesday, in their final regular season game of the year versus Randolph-Macon the Lancers were at the top of their form. On the day of the game the Lancers had moved up in the national rankings from twentieth to sixteenth. The Randolph-Macon Yellow Jackets had fallen from their lofty tenth position to just beneath Longwood ranking seventeenth. For the Lancers this meant that either a win or a tie would send them on to the state tournament.

Well, the Lancers brought it all the way down to the wire, fighting to a scoreless tie at the end of two overtimes. "It was a great game. We would have liked to have won it," commented head coach Rich Posipanko. "The way it was played though, either team could have won it." And both teams very nearly did on several occasions. Behind some superlative performances by goal keeper Rob Liessem and three-time All-American defensive back Darryl Case, the Lancers were able to blank the Yellow Jackets the entire game. Unfortunately on the other half of the field, the Jackets were also able to hold the potent Longwood attack scoreless, with Randolph-Macon goalie coming up with several strong plays as did his center fullback. John Kennen, Craig Reid and Tim Ford all had chances to score but the Yellow Jacket goalie always managed to get in front of them. The one shot that did get by him, a Case rocket, apparently happened too fast for the umpire to see and he did not rule it a goal. The umpire distinguished himself on this sunny afternoon by keeping the roughness of play at about the same level as a high school football game.

After playing to a scoreless tie at the end of regulation, the two teams went into overtime. With the skies darkening and rain beginnning to fall, the Lancers dominated play but were unable to put Randolph-Macon away. When the second overtime period ended and the game was still tied Longwood had earned its second invitation to the VISA tournament in three years.

The state semifinal game pitted Longwood against the Roanoke College Maroons. Earlier in the year the Lancers had battled Roanoke to a 1-0 victory. The Maroons had outshot the Lancers and it was only the play of Liessem along with a Clay Mullican assisted John Kennen score that provided the difference.

In last week's game against Roanoke the Maroons scored first and Longwood had to fight from behind all through the game. When Case scored with eight minutes left, the momentum of the game shifted to the Lancers. Longwood controlled the remainder of the game and went into the overtime with the momentum behind them. In the second overtime period, the Maroons were awarded a penalty kick. When Roanoke failed to capitalize on the opportunity, the two teams continued through three more overtime periods. Longwood continued to dominate the action but when Reid was ejected in the middle of the fourth overtime period the Maroons started to threaten. The fifth overtime period saw the Maroons press their one man advantage but they were unable to score. With darkness falling, the two teams went to a shoot-off. Case, Mark McArdle and Jeff Robinson all made their penalty kicks so that when Scott Thoden came to the line the game rested on his final kick. The senior defensive back had the goalie convinced he was going one way, kicked it the other way into the back of the net and the Lancers advanced to the state championship game against Mary Washington Wednesday at 2:30.

The last time they met, Longwood led 2-0 most of the game. With four minutes left the Lancers let it slip away and Mary Washington tied it up 2-2. Two overtime periods later the score remained 2-2 and went into the record books.

"This is one of our stronger teams," Posipanko noted going into the championship game. "I think our chances of beating Mary Washington are good. We're capable of winning it. It all depends on how well we play. We have to keep playing like we have our last two games."

Longwood won its first state title in 1982 when the Lancers went 15-4-1 and beat Lynchburg 1-0 in the VISA finals.

Lady Cagers Look Strong

Longwood's women's basketball team would like to keep a good thing going when the Lady Lancers open their 1984-85 season at home November 26 against the University of District of Columbia.

Coach Shirley Duncan's squad collected a record number of wins last season while ending a string of five straight losing seasons. The Lady Lancers would like to improve on that mark this year.

With seven of its top eight players and four starters back from last season, Longwood could field its strongest women's basketball team in history this year. Only point guard Robin Powell is missing from last year's main cast of characters. Powell graduated in May.

Second year coach Shirley Duncan led the Lady Lancers to a 16-10 mark in 1983-84. Duncan is optimistic about this year's squad but she is also mindful of a schedule which is considerably tougher.

"I think we helped ourselves by recruiting some good players," said the coach. "We could have a better team this year but not as good a record because of the schedule."

Longwood, Mount St. Mary's, Pittsburgh-Johnstown, Liberty Baptist and Maryland Baltimore County will take part in the first year of women's basketball for the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference. The teams will compete for a regular season conference crown.

The Mount, in Division II, and UPJ, in Division III, have ranked among the top teams in the country in recent years. The Lady Lancers will be playing District of Columbia, another strong Division II club on opening night November 26.

"We have a very challenging schedule," said Duncan, "but, I believe our team has the ability to respond to the challenge."

Strong leadership and experience will come from a trio of seniors who have been with the Lady Lancer team three years. Forwards Valerie Turner and Florence Holmes and swing player Mariana Johnson have been the backbone of the team the past two seasons.

Turner blossomed into one of the top women cagers in the country last season. The 5-8 senior averaged 18.4 points and 14.5 rebounds while reaping a truck load of post-season honors. Both Turner and Holmes are good bets to top the

Riders Compete

FARMVILLE, VA—Last Friday, the Longwood riding team traveled to Virginia to compete in a show with nine other colleges.

Bethanne McCarron led the team in points with a first place in novice over fences and a third place in novice on the flat. Lisa Nelson placed second in intermediate over fences and third in intermediate on the flat. Newcomer to the team, Rainey Bishop placed fourth in novice over fences and fifth in novice on the flat. Mary Brockwell finished fifth in novice over fences and sixth in open on the flat. Leanne Lawson and Robin Levy placed third and sixth respectively in advanced walk-trot-canter. Cynthia Settle placed third in beginner walk-trot-canter

The Lancers next riding show will be December 2 at Lynchburg College.

Lancer Basketball to Open Season

Special to the Rotunda

Longwood's men's basketball team, with four returning starters and eight veteran players, opens its 1984-85 basketball season this week with an exhibition contest against Court Authority and an appearance in the Coalfield Progress Tournament at Clinch Valley.

The Lancers will host Court Authority, an AAU team of former Richmond-area college stars, Tuesday at 7:30 in Lancer Hall. Top name players on the squad include Kevin Wood, Ren Watson, Monty Knight, Danny Kottak, Mike Owens and Ray Epps.

Longwood will open regular season play in the Clinch Valley Tournament Friday-Saturday. The Lancers will take on Brescia at 7 p.m. and Clinch Valley will play Piedmont at 9 p.m. in opening night action Friday. Consolation and championship games are slated for Saturday at 7 and 9 p.m.

Life After Kersey?

Longwood's basketball program will find out this year if there is life after Jerome Kersey. Lancer coach Cal Luther says it is a gross understatement to say that the Portland Trailblazer rookie will be difficult to replace. And, he's not just talking about the 19.6 points and 14.2 rebounds the 6-7, 220-pounder averaged for Longwood last season.

"We have already missed him as much in practice as we will in games," says the coach. "He was such a great competitor that he made everyone around him hustle every day."

"This could be the most challenging year for us since I came to Longwood," said Luther. "We've got to try and replace Kersey's ability inside, but we have only four players on our roster who are taller than 6-3."

On the plus side Luther says Longwood should be an improved shooting team in 1984-85.

"We had three new faces in the lineup last year, and those three players should be more confident with the experience gained last season."

Stan Hull, a 6-3 junior, Kevin Ricks, a 6-3 sophomore, and David Strothers, a 6-6 senior, will be counted on to help Longwood better its shooting percentage. Strothers, who averaged 5.7 rebounds and 11.7 points, is the top returning rebounder, while 6-3 junior Lonnie Lewis scored most of his 14 ppg. from outside last season.

Hull, a probable starter at guard, has missed a week of preseason practice with an ankle injury.

Providing depth at the guard positions will be veterans Frank Tennyson, a 5-8 junior, and Eric Pittman, a 6-2 sophomore. Senior Tim Wilson was a valuable reserve last season at small forward and could break into the lineup with more consistent play.

Dave Edwards, a 6-6 junior, appears to have the best shot at filling Kersey's position in the middle. He played in 24 games last season, averaging 3.3 ppg.

Four Newcomers

If Longwood is to equal or improve on last season's 15-12 record, incoming junior college players 6-2 Kenneth Fields, and 6-3 Lionell Ogburn and 6-7 Boudewijn van Beest and 6-5 Mike Leake, both freshmen, will have to make major contributions.

Fields, a strong leaper and rugged player inside, is in contention for a starting position. Ogburn has also played well and may be a starter.

Longwood will be pointing toward play in the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference which begins in January. The Lancers, 7-3 and runner-up to Randolph-Macon last season, have been picked sixth by the coaches and fourth by the conference sports information directors in a preseason poll for the six-team league.

All-American Case: All Business?

By Michele Williams

The Longwood College soccer team, which has lost only 15 games in four years, has never had one of its members play professional soccer. However, Darryl Case, Longwood's only three-time All-American soccer player, and recipient of numerous athletic awards, will soon be eligible for professional soccer tryouts. Case has been at Longwood for five years and will graduate in December 1984, thus qualifying him for a professional tryout in the spring.

Case began playing soccer his sophomore year of high school in Cincinnati, Ohio where he was born and raised. "I never picked up a ball before than (sophomore year) but, when you quit growing you can't play much football," he said jokingly. Now, seven years later, Case's natural skill on the soccer field have proven beneficial to his future outlook.

Case withdrew from the University of Cincinnati after one semester, and his cousin, who played soccer for Longwood at the time, talked him into pursuing his talents on the Lancer field. Even though Longwood was considerably smaller than the University of Cincinnati, Case said that he "liked the 'smallness" of Longwood because I am more of a standout student playing here then I ever would have been at such a large school as the University of Cincinnati." Evidently, he has been and continues to be a standout student. With a 3.0 average he has been on the athletes honor roll for five semesters, and at the same time has been an important link in Longwood's defensive team.

Even though graduation is quickly approaching Case is undecided as to what his future plans will be. "A few pro coaches have talked with me, but, right now it's up in the air as to what I'll end up doing," he said.

Rich Posipanko, the head coach of the Lancer soccer team, believes that Case has a good chance of making it professionally. Coach Posipanko said that "Darryl will definitely be offered a couple of tryouts, but, whether or not he will make it I can't say." Posipanko feels that Case is a natural athlete but needs "a slight readjustment of his attitude so that he really wants, because the ability to do is there," Posipanko said. Since Case is the only athlete in the history of the All-American team to be chosen three consecutive years his shot at the pros is greater. Whatever Case decides to do "he will be successful at it—business, soccer—anything," Posipanko said.

New P.E. Courses Announced

Why not do something different with your Physical Education credit next semester?

Downhill Skiing, PED III, will be traveling to Killington, Vermont, on Jan. 6-11, 1985. Included in the price of the trip is: five days lodging in a condominium with kitchen, five days of lift tickets on six mountains, five days of lessons and seminars, round-trip bus transportation and local shuttle bus at Killington. Other activities are included as part of the college ski weeks at one of the nicest ski resorts in the East. Whether you are a beginner, intermediate or expert skier, you will find this an excellent opportunity for the price: $328.90 (includes taxes). There will be an informational meeting in Lancer Hall on Monday, November 12 at 7 p.m.

For water enthusiasts, a course in Advanced Scuba and Coral Reef Ecology (PED 312) will be offered in the Bahamas over spring break, March 8-18, 1985. From the Dive Shop in Richmond, students will travel to Fort Lauderdale, fly to Nassau, and board the dive boat "The Bottom Time". Participants will spend five days in the Exumas (southern Bahama Islands), practicing Advanced Open Water Scuba skills, and studying the environment of the Atlantic coral reefs.

Another aquatic course, Canoeing and River Paddling (PE 126), will be offered during the last half of the second semester. Students will spend time in the pool and the classroom learning basic skills. On several weekends in the spring the class will travel to local rivers and experience the challenge of whitewater. An informational meeting will be held in Lancer Hall on Tuesday, January 15 at 7:30 p.m.

Grapplers Compete in N.C.

By Jim Winkler

The 1984-85 edition of the Longwood wrestling team had its second competition in the Winston-Salem State Tournament last week-end with three members placing well.

Junior Tim Fitzgerald placed second in the 118 weight class, sophomore Pete Whitman third in the 142 weight class and junior Tommy Eaves fourth in the 158 class. Senior Steve Albeck made it to the semifinals in the 150 class but defaulted due to an injured shoulder.

Also competing for Longwood Friday-Saturday were Mark Cary 118 weight class, 126 pounder Long Phan, 142 pounder Tommy Gilbert, 158 pounder David Moffett, 167 pounder Billy Howard, 177 pounders Kenny Lewis and David Taylor, 190 pounder Tracy Kilby and heavyweight Jesus Strauss.

"For the first time we have balance in all weight classes and are fairly competitive in upperweights," said Nelson. "Although the team is inexperienced, the wrestlers have a good team attitude and are working to improve."

The Lancers returned eight from last year with Fitzgerald, Albeck, Gilbert and Howard leading the way. William Mitchell, a 150 pounder, and 158 pounders Jim Seltzer and Moffett, and Timmy Chastain, 134 pounds, also returned.

Three state champions head the newcomers to the squad—freshmen Taylor and Lewis who are competing for the 177 weight class and Strauss, who was the private school state champion.

Other newcomers include 150 pounder Neal Sweeney and 167 pounder John Bellflower. Sweeney suffered an injury in the spring, but should be able to compete in January. Cary, Whitman, Eaves, Kilby and Phan round out the list of newcomers.

Coach Nelson has set two goals for his team—one is to have a winning season and the other is to be one of the top two teams in the region.

"If we wrestle well we have the potential to reach these two goals," said the Lancer coach. "We face our toughest schedule ever including Division I schools, Virginia Tech, VMI, William and Mary and Brown, so it will be a challenge," added Nelson.

Longwood will next compete in the Pembroke State Tournament November 16-17. The team's first home match is set for November 27 against Lynchburg and Chowan at 6:00 p.m.

Strauss Named Player of the Week

FARMVILLE, VA—Freshman heavyweight Jesus Strauss won the heavyweight title in the James Madison Takedown Tournament November 3 and for his performance, Strauss has been named Longwood College Player of the Week. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Strauss pinned Chowan's Gannon in the second period after trailing 13-4 to win the tournament title. In compiling a 3-0 tourney record, he decisioned Cowne of Virginia Tech in the semifinals and beat Gross of Elon 12-0 in the opening round.

"Jesus wrestled very well in his first collegiate competition," said coach Steve Nelson. "He is extremely quick and mobile for his size."

"We are very fortunate to have a wrestler of his experience and ability in our program. As he matures, I anticipate he will become an outstanding heavyweight."

Strauss, is a graduate of Fork Union Military Academy and he was State Private School champion last year in the heavyweight division.

Lady Golfers Break Records

Longwood's women's golf team finished up a record-breaking fall season Wednesday afternoon at MacGregor Downs Country Club in Cary, North Carolina with a fifth place finish out of seven teams in the North Carolina State Invitational Tournament.

Duke won the 54-hole event with a 306-317-308-931. Longwood scored a 329-332-334-995.

Competing for the Lady Lancers were Lanie Gerken 80-85-77-242, Tina Barrett 82-82-85-249, Marcia Melone 85-78-87-250, Nancy Ryan 84-87-85-256 and Carol Rhoades 83-90-90-263.

The tourney was Longwood's last until the spring season begins in March.

Top individual golfers were Barrett, a feshman and Gerken, a senior co-captain. Barrett had a fine stroke average of 78.1 for 17 rounds while Gerken was close behind with an average of 79.5 for 17 rounds.

The Equal Rights Amendment: A Lifetime Guarantee

What does the ERA provide?

Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

The ERA provides that women and men are equal under the law. This does not mean that women and men are the same, but that the law cannot treat them differently solely because of their sex. ERA applies to government action, but not to private action.

Constitutional amendment is our highest form of lawmaking. It is a method used sparingly (only 26 times in our 200 year history), and only when there is a need to establish a principle not yet included in the Constitution. For example, race discrimination was not illegal under the Constitution until 1868, the year the fourteenth amendment was adopted. The principle that women and men are equal before the law is not now expressed in the Constitution.

Because our Constitution does not contain a guarantee of equal rights for women and men under the law, the nation's statute books and government practices have always closed doors and limited opportunities solely on the basis of sex. Throughout our history, legislators have passed numerous laws that mandate or presuppose different roles for men and women. These laws harm all people whose talents, preferences, or life situations make them unable or unwilling to conform to the stereotype for their sex. Until five years ago, the Supreme Court consistently upheld even the most blatantly arbitrary and unjust laws—laws that said women couldn't be lawyers or bartenders, laws that effectively kept women off juries, laws that limited women's working hours and thus denied them overtime pay and promotions. In 1971, the Court began to find some sex discriminatory laws unconstitutional, but the Court's position vacillates from case to case. In 1974, for example, the Court held that it was not even sex discrimination to deny pregnant workers disability payments for their pregnancy-related disabilities when all other workers were entitled to disability payments, whatever the cause of their disability. Men, too, felt the impact of unequal laws when the Court ruled that same year that needy widowers could be denied property tax exemptions available to widows.

Such laws are unjust because they use gender rather than ability or need to determine an individual's rights, responsibilities and benefits. The effect of these laws is to steer people into sex tracks and to deny them freedom to choose the path marked out by their own capacities and aspirations. Some sex discriminatory laws were intended to serve worthy purposes, but those purposes can be accomplished more effectively by legislation based on what people do, rather than who they are—women or men. Laws can treat people according to their function rather than their sex. For example, laws that keep women off juries have been premised on the belief that mothers want to stay home to take care of their children; such laws can be rewritten to excuse from jury service any person (man or woman) actually engaged in caring for a child or other dependent relative. A law written in this manner protects women and men who need to stay home because of the job they are doing there. At the same time, a law so written would assure that greater numbers of women, including all those without dependent care responsibilities, will serve on juries. Similiarly, tax exemptions designed to help needy elderly people can be written to help all such needy persons (whether male or female.

Adoption of the ERA is necessary to safeguard to all persons the right to pursue their individual talents and capacities free of sex discrimination. This assurance will be accomplished by the ERA's firm direction for an end to outmoded sex-role stereotyping in laws and governmental practices. Government should not pigeon-hole people on the basis of their sex. Rather, it should respond to the needs of individuals and the functions they perform. Only by amending our Constitution to provide for equal treatment for men and women under the law can we thoroughly and comprehensively wipe out the sex discrimination that has pervaded our legal system for the past two hundred years, and insure equal justice in the future.

Does the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment eliminate sex discrimination?

No. The equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment was adopted after the Civil War for one central purpose—to prohibit race discrimination. In the current century, the United States Supreme Court has interpreted that clause in race cases with unyielding vigor; race discrimination is consistently declared impermissible under the equal protection clause. This is not the case with sex discrimination. Not until 1971 did the Supreme Court rule in favor of a woman who complained of unconstitutional sex discrimination. Since then, the Court has upheld sex discrimination in some cases and rejected in others. This inconsistency shows that the fourteenth amendment, though it supplies a clear principle to guide the Court's action in race discrimination cases, does not provide such a principle in cases of sex discrimination. The ERA would provide that principle—it would reflect the public consensus that sex discrimination is a matter of national concern and that its eradiction is a national priority.

Why not eradicate sex discrimination through statutory reform?

First, there is a fundamental difference between statutory reform and constitutional amendment. Only the latter provides a basic principle, cutting across all areas of official, governmental action, and superseding all sex discriminatory laws, regulations, policies and practices. Much of the sex discrimination people encounter is the result not of sex discriminatory statutes, but of unwritten policies and practices. For example, failure to give the same vocational training to women in prisons as is given to men is not generally the result of a discriminatory statute—it is generally a matter of practice. Statutory reform would not necessarily change it. The ERA, however, would provide a firm legal basis for challenging that sex discrimination.

In addition, statutory change is often a slow process. Legislatures generally undertake basic reform only in response to irresistible pressure. The ERA would provide that pressure. It has already provided the impetus for significant change in many state legislatures. If the ERA dies, we can expect reform efforts to be shelved while legislatures turn to business they consider more urgent.

Finally, it is easier to pass a sex discriminatory law than to repeal a constitutional amendment. Only a constitutional amendment provides protection for the future, insuring that government will not attempt to reinstitute old forms of discrimination.

What will the ERA do?

The most important across-the-board effect the ERA will have is to outlaw sex discrimination by government in much the same way the fourteenth amendment outlaws race discrimination. No longer will courts have leeway to uphold sex discriminatory practices as they have, often casually or even flippantly, for the past hundred years. As recently as 1976, for example, a United States Court of Appeals ruled that girls could be barred from a public, all-male, prestige high school even though that school offered science facilities—such as a planetarium and cyclotron—not available in the supposedly "comparable" girls' school. Under the ERA, "separate but equal" public schools would be as illegal for boys and girls as they are now for blacks and whites.

The ERA would reach a broad range of widely used sex-discriminatory laws and government practices. For example, the ERA would outlaw securely and permanently these practices harmful to women:

•all discrimination in public schools, from de facto segregation of vocational schools to exclusion of women from athletics programs;

•discrimination in public employment such as that which relegates women to the lowest-paid jobs;

•discrimination against pregnant workers which denies them such government benefits as unemployment compensation when they are able to work anp temporary disability payments when they are unable to work;

•denial of social security and other government benefits to the families of employed women, when those benefits are paid to the families of employed men;

•denial to women prisoners of education and recreation benefits commonly given men, such as law libraries, physical exercise facilities or training for more highly paid "men's" jobs;

•prosecution of female (but not male) juveniles for minor offenses like staying out late;

•quotas on women's enlistment in the military, and bars on such vocational opportunity as pilot training;

•requirements that married women use their husband's surnames, rather than their own birth names, for such purposes as voting or motor-vehicle registration;

•all sex-based legal presumptions with regard to the ownership or control of marital property, for example, presumptions that all household goods are owned by the husband; and

•statutory age differences which, for example, subject girls to juvenile offender laws punishing non-criminal behavior until they are 18 but boys only until they are 16, or establish different ages of majority for various legal purposes.

The ERA would also end the attitude embodied in the law that women are second-class citizens with second-class responsibilities. If a military draft is reenacted, both men and women will be subject to the draft; parents with child-care responsibilities could be exempt, of course, as long as the exemption applied to both men and women. Similarly, women will be equally responsible for jury duty, and men and women alike will be excused when child or other dependent care obligations conflict with jury service. Finally, alimony (maintenance) and child support laws will not rest on the notion that all men are independent breadwinners and all women are dependent caretakers of home and children. Dependent men who have fulfilled homemaker and child-rearing roles will be entitled to maintenance and child support if their wives are family breadwinners; dependent women in the same situation would continue to be entitled to maintenance for themselves and support for children in their custody.

Will the ERA wipe out the right of a woman and her children to be supported by her husband?

No. This scurrilous misrepresentation has been advanced by ERA opponents to scare the public. The ERA would require that any support be written in a sex neutral fashion—i.e., that support flow from the spouse able to give it to the spouse who needs it. In most cases, this means support will run from the husband to the wife and children. No spouse who needs support would be denied it as a result of the ERA. As a practical matter, most states have already conformed their support laws to this sex neutral principle. Thirty-three states now have support laws that do not designate the sex of the spouse on whom the support obligation is placed.

The dwindling minority of states that still have sex-discriminatory support laws will have two years from the day the ERA is adopted to rewrite their law in a sex neutral fashion. It is preposterous to suggest that any sane legislature would repeal support laws altogether,rather than extend the right to support to dependent men. Not only would that be senseless from a public policy point of view, it would also be political suicide for any legislator who voted for repeal.

In the unlikely circumstance that a state does not rewrite a single-sex support law, a court might have to do the job. Opponents of the ERA say that courts would invalidate nonconforming support laws, leaving needy women and children bereft of support. This too is not true. In deciding what to do with nonconforming laws, courts would be guided by the ERA's legislative history—that is, by favorable Congressional committee reports and statements of the ERA's Congresssional sponsors or of committee members supporting the ERA. The ERA legislative history on support laws unequivocally states that

> . . .where one spouse is the primary wage earner and the other runs the home, the wage earner would have a duty to support the spouse who stays at home in compensation for the performance of her or his duties.
> (Senate Judiciary Committee's Majority Report, as reprinted in the Congressional Record, March 22, 1972).

Guided by this legislative history, courts would extend a single-sex support law to the previously excluded sex in order to save its constitutionality. Thus, a genuinely dependent husband would be able to seek maintenance payments from a breadwinner wife under this extension principle. If a breadwinner husband were to try to avoid paying maintenance to a dependent wife, by arguing that a single-sex support law should be invalidated under the ERA, the court would likely find he was not the proper party to raise the issue, since he was not arguing for extension of support as Congress intended.

Lancaster Offers Online Search

By Lisa Jessup

Online searching or literature search, a service offered by the Reference Department at Lancaster Library, gives a person a choice between manually searching a printed index or abstract and having a computer do the searching.

Usage of the online search provides access to over 300 data bases. The data bases are reached through different commercial vendors.

Currently, Lancaster Library has access to DIALOG Information Services, Inc., located in California. The library is in the process of acquiring access to the Bibliographic Retrieval System (BRS) in New York.

The online search provides the user with a comprehensive bibliography on the specific topic searched. The bibliography can be printed online at the library or offline at the data base and mailed to the library. Having the bibliography printed offline is cheaper because computer time is the basis for the price of the service.

The library charges the user of the service the same amount they are charged. The price is determined by connect time with the computer. Mr. Stwodah, head of the online search, estimated costs by the connected hour ranging from $25 to $300 depending on the data base. However, most searches usually average $10 to $15. A communication cost of a long-distance telephone call to California is also added because the computer terminal communicates with the one in California by ordinary telephone lines.

Comparing the cost with a manual search, the advantages of the online search are speed, current information, and a printed customized bibliography. Online searching takes only 5 to

SGA Presidential Candidates Express Views

By Kelly Sickler

When I was asked to write this essay, I had a hard time trying to decide what to write about. I decided not to dwell on my list of qualifications because I believe that there are probably a lot of people who are better qualified than I am to be SGA President — but they are not running. I also don't want to slander my opponent for no reason because I feel that anybody concerned enough to commit themselves to something as important as an SGA office deserves the utmost respect. In addition, I didn't want to go on and on with campaign promises that I probably wouldn't be able to keep. So what I am left to write about is what I believe and what I would like to see happen.

First of all, I think that there are some problems on campus which I would like to see lessened if not completely resolved. One of these problems is the parking situation. I don't want to focus specifically on this issue, and I know that there are a lot of people who have tried to improve the situation. However, I feel it is time to do something about it. Possible solutions may include restricting incoming freshmen from having cars on campus or improving the current parking plan.

In addition, I would like to see the students work with the Administration on problems such as overcrowded housing. It just isn't logical to me that we allow students to live in residence hall kitchens while others are refused permission to live off campus. Possible solutions to the situation include allowing fraternities and sororities off-campus housing. I don't feel that, in its current state, Longwood can continue to increase it enrollment without improving the housing and dining hall situations.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that this College exists for the students; we must improve it or live with it. These are but a few of the ideas which I would like to see implemented. It is not as important that you agree with them, as it is that you consider them and vote wisely on Thursday.

By Garth Wentzel

Since this is the first opportunity any candidate at Longwood has had to express his or her opinion on what the SGA can do for the students, I will be brief but to the point.

Most students don't realize how much an active and strong SGA can help their own lives here at Longwood. The college is scheduled to begin a strategic planning process next year to make basic decisions about the direction of the college for the next decade. I would like to ensure that the opinions of the student body will be heard during this process, and that we will have our say on such matters as revision of the academic program, the growth of the college, off-campus housing, meal plan options and other matters which will affect student life at Longwood.

I have always voted in school elections in the past but the whole election process seemed to be little more than a guessing game. After all, how can one honestly vote for a candidate just by reading what that person has accomplished and why he or she feels they can do the job better. Those are qualities which every candidate should have, or why run for office in the first place.

I feel that a large part of the lethargy shown by Longwood students during elections is due to the election process itself. It is in need of basic revision and elections should be scheduled and publicized far in advance so the students learn more about the candidates and the issues put before them.

Finally, my only involvement with SGA has been serving on the Judicial Board; however, if elected I will do my best to make SGA work for all of us.

Speaker Challenges "Southern Belle" Image

By Kent Booty

Many 19th-century Southern women conformed in appearance but not in reality to the "Southern Belle image," said the keynote speaker at a Longwood College symposium on Feminist Self-Expression.

Dr. Elizabeth Baer, an administrator and English professor at Sweet Briar College, gave the keynote address during the symposium, held Nov. 9-10. She used Scarlet O'Hara, the heroine in Gone With The Wind, as an example of this dichotomy between "outward image and inward reality."

"Outwardly, she conforms to this image of the Southern Belle. Inwardly, though, Scarlet keeps her own counsel. She's true to herself... She's split between outward image and inward reality. There's something different inside."

Despite her "outward appearance" as a stereotypical Southern Belle, Scarlet opened the first female-owned business in Atlanta after the War, defended her home by shooting a Yankee soldier and could count figures quicker than any man in the novel, said Baer.

Campus Images

By Carol Wilson
NOCR Editor

Two images of campus life have dominated the media this fall: One portrays college students as serious-minded political conservatives, dressed in natty pinstripes, and firmly entrenched in the Reagan camp. The other depicts them as beer-craving fools, rioting for the right to party to excess, angrily opposing anyone who expects them to behave as adults.

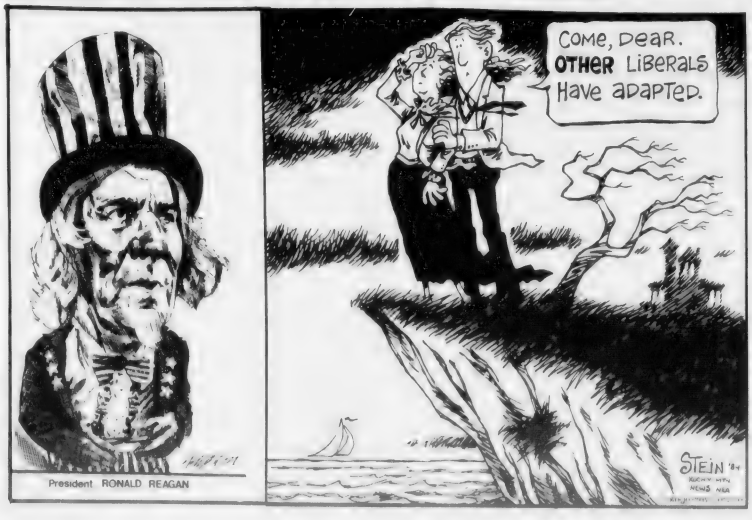
It's not surprising that the student rioters have been universally panned, by the national and campus media. But there's also an undertone to coverage of the conservative movement on campus which implies that it's merely a reflection of growing selfishness and materialism.

Though contradictory, both of these images are grounded in truth. Yes, today's active young politicos seem more interested in corporate profits and a strong national defense than in rallying for peace, love, and universal happiness. And yes, disturbances at Illinois State U., Purdue, and Kansas State, among other schools, have given administrators everywhere reason for concern.

These two images can even be seen as different sides of the same coin—or should I say the same dollar bill. It's well documented that today's college student enters school knowing that jobs are tight, facing intense pressure to succeed, and craving the high-priced lifestyle our consumer society so actively promotes.

Perhaps those students heavily involved in the GOP cause are more hopeful about the years ahead. They believe in what Reaganomics has accomplished thus far.

The rioters, whose "protests" often start out as parties, don't seem to share that hope. The future they see doesn't merit sacrificing the here and now, especially their right to get drunk. Is it coincidental that many of the student riots have occurred in the industrial Midwest, an area particularly hard hit by the recession, and one which hasn't felt many of Reaganomics' benefits?



But if both these viewpoints come in for criticism, is there any way a college student can win?

One has to wonder. Several college administrators have spoken out this fall, blasting students for not taking a greater interest in the threat of nuclear war. Yet the most publicized protests along that line—the now-famous "cyanide pill" referenda at Brown and Colorado State—have been criticized as being too defeatist.

If ever there was a time for administrators, especially those in student services, to speak out about the good things happening on campus, this is it. I realize I may be setting this publication up for criticism on that score, for we don't back away from covering negative stories. But we also talk a lot about what students are doing for others. And they're doing a lot.

Young people are still active as volunteers, they are increasingly involved in making decisions on campus, and in such efforts as peer advising. While the much-publicized few are in drunken riots, many under-publicized efforts are under way in Greek organizations and elsewhere to curb student drinking.

It's impossible to control what the media will cover. The negative always seems to be more newsworthy. But at the rate things are going, a good word will be so rare, it just might rate headlines.

President RONALD REAGAN

"Southern Belle" Fallacy?

Gone With The Wind, "very intentionally set up this (dichotomous) character. This is a theme which runs throughout women's literature and, in fact, throughout women's lives."

The symposium was part of Project Feminist Self-Expression, directed by Marilyn Simpson-Johnson, associate professor of social work at Longwood. The project is supported by a grant from the Virginia Foundation for the Humanities and Public Policy.

Several other women also spoke, including Dr. Carolyn Craft, president of the Farmville Ministerial Association and professor of English at Longwood; Vera Allen, president of Church Women United of Farmville; and Delegate Mary Sue Terry. A panel of 13 local women, most of whom are active in the community, discussed their lives and charitable service.

The symposium was intended to focus on "the average, ordinary, everyday woman who has accomplished a great deal against the odds," said Mrs. Simpson-Johnson.

In conjunction with the symposium, two special exhibitions were on display in Room 127, Wynne Building, on the Longwood campus. "Black Women: Achievements Against the Odds" is a traveling exhibition, and "Portrait of Private and Public Lives" is a collection of artifacts that illustrate the life of women in Prince Edward County. The latter exhibit will remain until around Dec. 1.

Dr. Baer noted that fewer than 10 percent of women in the antebellum South lived on plantations. They often were physically "worn out" from bearing and rearing children, they were isolated, and they received little education.

The "myth" of the Southern Belle was created in the 1830s-40s when many white Southerners thought their society was falling apart, said Baer. Also, many Southerners felt threatened by the abolition movement and women's rights movement which were growing at that time. "The deference of chivalry was very imprisoning for women."

Southern women were "completely conscious of the split between external image and inward reality. They knew it was impossible to live up to the ideal." Unfortunately, Baer added, women in the South still have to live with this image.

Dr. Craft and Mrs. Allen discussed Christian . feminism. Religion historically has been "a source of liberation and inspiration but also a source of oppression for women," said Craft, an Episcopal minister. Although Christianity has been marked by a "continued teaching of spiritual equality," society has "mitigated" against that goal.

Jesus was a "great liberator" up women and elevated them to an equal status with men, Craft said. This led to them having leadership roles in the 1st-century Church. By the fourth century, however, women had lost that influence, and had to settle for serving as "confidantes and spiritual guides" to men, she said. Women who wanted to be ministers were usually "pushed aside."

Mrs. Allen described Christian feminism as "international, intercultural and interracial." Church Women United of Farmville works for a "just and caring society," she said.

Dr. Baer offered this advice to women: "We must continually look inward to look outward and achieve a sense of wholeness."

10 percent of the time it takes a manual search. Also, current information is available through the computer because new information is loaded at the end of every day at the data bases whereas printed versions of some indexes are as much as six months behind in publications.

Computer searches may be conducted by contacting Stwodah or any reference librarian on duty. The topic will be reviewed and a strategy will be developed which includes what data base to use. Total time involved includes a 20-30 minute preparation and usually less than 15 minutes actually searching the computer.

The Stripping has stopped at Idaho State University football games, simply because the pep band has stopped playing "The Stripper" during football games. Past pep bands played the song at the end of the third quarter, accompanied by five to six impromptu student strippers. This year, however, a majority of band members objected to the tradition, and the band director agreed to cut the song.

An Enrollment Cap is being pushed by the Duke University Association of Students. Its senate passed and sent to the trustees a resolution calling for limiting enrollment at 5,700. So far, the trustees haven't acted on the request. Duke's current enrollment is just over 5,800.

Citing an "embarrassing lack of student interest," the California college's trustees have decided to junk the student government. Texas and Georgia briefly dissolved their student governments in 1980, but only by a student vote. Both schools have installed new governments.

Student Use of cocaine is up, in part because more college-bound high school students are experimenting with the drug. Research from the University of Michigan, Arizona State University and the University of California-Davis shows a steady increase in college use of cocaine, as the cost of the drug drops. Drug treatment centers report higher usage in rural areas than many suspect, and are encouraging colleges to develop better drug abuse policies.

The Black Student Union at the University of Northern Illinois is pushing for a separate activities/programming fee for blacks, saying they aren't adequately represented in the current Student Association budget. In response, the SA is discussing a plan to guarantee minority representation on its programming committees.

To Improve Faculty-Student Relations, the University of Southern California Office of Residential Life is sponsoring a "take a professor to lunch" program, in conjunction with academic departments. The Faculty Entree program encourages students to invite a professor to lunch in a campus dining hall, with the program picking up the guest's lunch bill. Since most faculty members are on campus for lunch, it's hoped that Faculty Entree will encourage more informal contact.

A Mock "Citizen's Arrest" of recruiters from a nuclear weapons firm temporarily halted the company's presentation at a Brown University career informational session. Students were protesting the presence on campus of Electric Boat, a subsidiary of General Dynamics, and producer of the Trident Submarine. Despite the protest, the firm will hold placement interviews at Brown. At Kent State University, about 20 protestors marched on campus to oppose Central Intelligence Agency recruiting, while at Yale University, angry students fired hostile questions at CIA representatives attending a career information session.

Bolding Chosen For Committee

Longwood baseball coach Buddy Bolding has been picked to serve on the South Atlantic Regional Selection Committee for NCAA Division II for 1985.

The Committee will determine which teams from the South Atlantic Region, which stretches from Pennsylvania to Georgia, are to participate in the NCAA Division II Baseball Tournament in May.

Bolding is no stranger to the committee, having served as a member two of the past three years. Co-incidentally, both years the Lancer coach was on the committee, his team received a bid to the playoffs.

Bolding has guided Longwood to a fine 144-66-1 record in six seasons with the 1984 edition winding up 32-11. The Lancers ended up third out of four teams in the regional tournament.

In 1982 Longwood advanced to the Division II World Series in Riverside, California and finished up 31-10-1.

Longwood will field another playoff contender in the spring with the majority of last year's top players returning.

Cagers Press On

By Hoke Currie

Norfolk, VA—For the second time in a week Longwood's 6-6 senior forward David Strothers came through with some late game shooting heroics, and the result was a heart-stopping 73-71 victory over Christopher-Newport Saturday night in the Virginia Wesleyan doubleheader.

With the score tied 71-71 and six seconds showing on the clock, Strothers picked up a loose ball under the Captains basket and headed up court at break-neck speed. The Lancer cager put up a running one-hander that seemed to go in, come out, and then drop through the basket as the buzzer sounded.

The win, which avenged a 63-57 loss to Christopher-Newport last Tuesday, was a big one for Longwood, now 3-2. Friday night a talented Virginia Wesleyan squad had handed the Lancers a 74-69 defeat.

After playing their first five games on the road, the Lancers return home this week to host always strong Virginia State Wednesday night at 7:30 and then the Par-Bil's Tip-Off Tournament Friday and Saturday.

Longwood has yet to beat Virginia State in four tries and the Trojans beat Livingstone 101-98 in their opener last Monday.

The Lancers will face Coastal Carolina Friday night at 7:00 and High Point will meet Francis Marion at 9:00 in opening round Par-Bil's Tournament action. The consolation tilt is set for 6:30 and the championship for 8:30 Saturday night.

Longwood may need some more of Strothers late-game heroics this week. It was Strothers who scored eight of his game high 24 points in overtime to lead the Lancers by Clinch Valley 77-68 Nov. 17. But, just like in the win over Clinch Valley, Strothers had plenty of help from his friends Saturday night against Christopher-Newport.

While Strothers scored six points on an off-night, guard Kevin Ricks pumped in 18, hitting seven of 10 from the floor, and sky-walking forward Kenneth Fields also tallied 18 points on seven of 11 shots from the floor.

It was Ricks and Fields who kept Longwood in the game and set the stage for an amazing comeback in the final 1:42.

With Christopher-Newport leading 70-65 the Lancers got some unexpected help from the Captains head coach C. J. Woollum. Fields appeared to walk while diving for a loose ball at CNC's end of the court. When no call was made and Longwood got possession, Woollum let the officials know what he thought of the non-call.

Woollum was whistled for a technical and Strothers calmly dropped in two free throws, making the score 70-67 with 1:42 left. The free throws extended Strothers string of consecutive charity tosses to 38 in a row over two seasons. He's 14-14 this year.

Junior guard Frank Tennyson made Woollum pay double for his hasty words when he dropped in a shot from the baseline 10 seconds later, bringing Longwood within 70-69.

Captains scoring leader Buck Moore, who ended up with 27 points, hit the first of a one-and-one with 1:13 left, but missed the second. Longwood had the rebound with a chance to tie.

Lancer senior Tim Wilson, who sparked his team off the bench, knotted the game at 71-71 with a jumper from the lane at the 0:50 mark.

Disdaining a timeout to set up a last-second shot, Christopher-Newport tried to get the ball to

David Strothers

Moore in scoring position. Finally, as the clock wound down, 5-6 point guard Rodney Myrick drove toward the basket. Ricks blocked Myrick's shot and Strothers came up with the ball before taking off downcourt for the winning shot.

"This was definitely a big win for us," said Longwood coach Cal Luther. "After losing two in a row we're really glad to come back and squeeze out a victory."

"Our defense has been very good, but our offense is still inconsistent," said the coach. "I was pleased to see our shooting improve (Longwood shot 53 percent Saturday night), but we're still missing too many easy shots.

"I was delighted to see Kevin (Ricks) give us some outside shooting. That had been lacking the last several games. Fields (Kenneth) improves with each game, both offensively and defensively. We're going to be taking advantage of his abilities more in the future.

"We also got some good play off the bench for the second night in a row. Tim Wilson got some timely baskets for us and Frank (Tennyson) came in and played good defense. Dave Edwards also played better tonight. He shot the ball the way he's capable of doing."

Edward scored nine points and pulled down seven rebounds despite being hampered by foul problems.

While Longwood lost to Virginia Wesleyan 74-69 Friday, the Lancers staged a late comeback keyed by Wilson's play off the bench. In all Wilson scored 11 points. Twice he stole the ball, drove the length of the court and jammed it. A third steal resulted in a driving layup. Lonnie Lewis backed Wilson with two steals and six points.

With about five minutes left the Blue Marlins held a 69-53 edge. Longwood got fast-break layups from Wilson, Fields and Lonnie Lewis to begin a 12-0 run that nearly caught VWC. Strothers, who scored 18 points, tallied the last six in the rally that chopped the lead to 69-65 with 1:22 still left.

Virginia Wesleyan held on for the win behind Ed Cowell, who scored 18. Deadeye shooting guard Kevin Smith scored 25 for the winners.

Junior Lionell Ogburn scored 14 for Longwood with 10 coming in the last half.

Soccer Team Ties For Co-Championship

By Mark Holland

Coming from behind twice, the Longwood Lancers proved their ability to hang tough and earned a state co-championship with Mary Washington when they tied them 3-3 following two overtimes. In the first half the Lancers spotted Mary Washington a 2-1 lead. All-Division forward John Kennen netted his fifteenth goal of the season to keep Longwood in the game. The Lancers were fighting the double disadvantage of not only playing in front of a very rowdy Mary Washington crowd but also of being down a goal in an intense State Championship game. Goals rarely come easily at this level.

Longwood tied it up when halfback Clay Mulligan brought the ball up the left side and passed inside to freshman Mike Harris. Harris heard Mark McArdle, another member of the All-Division team, call for the ball. After McArdle cut past his man Harris passed to him with the goalie coming out quickly. McArdle knocked it into the right corner for the goal and a tie.

Lancers celebrate after teammate Kremmen's tying goal.

Going into the first overtime period, Mary Washington had the momentum behind them. Strong play by co-captain Dan Bubnis and All-Division back Eric Karn kept Mary Washington from breaking the tie. The Lancers started to shift the momentum and McArdle, Tim Ford and Mark "The Earl" Kremen began to put intense pressure on the goalie. The Lancers were challenging hard with three minutes left when Mary Washington was finally able to clear the ball out. Taking the ball the length of the field they scored on a sliding Brian Sprinkle.

With the minutes ticking off the clock Kremmen decided to take charge, taking the ball off of Kennen's foot, Kremmen dribbled right past four defenders and then rocked a left footer right past the goalie to save the game for the Lancers.

The second overtime was dominated by Longwood. They started off with the momentum behind them and very nearly won the game on a powerful near miss by Kremmen. They continued to control the flow of the game and Mary Washington only threatened once on another long breakaway. Longwood's senior All-Division goalie Brian Sprinkle came sliding out and saved the goal, the tie, and the State Championship.

1984 All-VISA Teams Named

Roanoke College, Western Division VISA champ, landed four spots on the 13-player first team All-State squad chosen by the coaches of the Virginia Intercollegiate Soccer Association. Longwood has three booters named to the squad while Mary Washington and Randolph-Macon had two selections.

The only repeat choice from last season is Longwood midfielder Mark McArdle while teammate Darryl Case was chosen for the third time in four years.

Search Begins For New Dean

Gorski, Weibl to assume some duties

The duties of the Longwood Dean of Students were partially assigned last week for the spring 1985 semester. The resignation of Dean William Latta in mid-November necessitated the assignments which are effective December 16, a day after Latta will leave Longwood.

Interim Director of Student Activities Barbara Gorski will, says Vice President for Student Affairs Phyllis Mable, "be supervising the Residence Education Coordinators and working with residence halls." while Director of Housing Rick Weibl "will be picking up disciplinary duties."

A national search will be conducted for a new Dean of Students in the spring, and Gorski expects a candidate for the job to be hired "right after the school year ends."

Despite some doubt expressed by some about the atttrition rate of Longwood administrators and the process of hiring, Gorski says "This system allows us to be selective in the search. [The hiring of interim administrators] is a good way to keep all the systems running ... while we don't often gain much, we don't lose ground either."

Wentzel Elected SGA President

Run-Offs Held Today

By Eric T. Houseknecht

Fourth year Government major, Garth Wentzel received 57% of the popular vote in last Tuesday's SGA election, defeating junior Kelly Sickler in the race for the Student Government presidency. Wentzel, who last year lost a run-off election to current SGA president Randy Chittum by a narrow margin, had a somewhat easier time of it this year, getting 266 votes from a total of 466 voters.

Eighteen students ran for the thirteen other offices on the ticket, nine of them unopposed. Two of the most hotly contested races saw Nancy Beane and Scott Estes taking 49 and 48 percent of the votes (respectively) for the Vice Presidential office and Teresa Alvis and Craig Hardy receiving 45 and 48 percent of the respective votes for the Residence Hall Life Chair position. Both of these positions constitute major offices and none of the candidates having received a majority of the vote has necessitated a run-off election. Today, until 6 p.m., students can once again vote to determine who will hold these offices for the following year.

Additional contests saw Chris Wright elected as Honor Board Vice Chair with 228 votes while his opponents, Mary Ann Schraf and Denise Goudelock pocketed 112 and 84 votes respectively; and Terry Raum defeated Chris Stott in the race for SUN Vice Chair by a 261 to 149 vote margin.

Finally, nine students ran uncontested and were unilaterally elected to the following positions: Renay Bradshaw, Treasurer; Denise Legg, Communications Coordinator; Rudy Hull, Honor Board Chair; Frank Raio, Campus Life Board Chair; Benji Smith, Orientation Chair; Darryl Keckeslager, Student Union Chair; Sally Storey, Corresponding Secretary; Lora Bleutge, Recording Secretary; and Susan Hawthorne, Honor Board Secretary.

Fellows Program Announced

Governor Charles S. Robb has announced that the Governor's Fellows Program, first created in 1982, will be repeated during the summer of 1985.

The purpose of the program is to offer first hand experience in the process of state government and to bring fresh ideas into the Governor's Office. The program is also designed to strengthen ties between the state government and Virginia's academic community.

Interested students must be graduating seniors or must be enrolled as degree candidates in a graduate or professional school, public or private, regardless of their state of residence. They also must be willing to commit at least two months to fulltime work in the Governor's Office. The normal period of fellowship would be from June 3 to August 2. Fellows will be assigned to work with members of the Governor's Cabinet or personal staff.

Virginia Governor Charles Robb

Applications must be received by February 1, 1985 and should include a letter of application, a resume, and transcripts of undergraduate grades and of graduate school grades, if any. Letters of recommendations may also be helpful.

Applicants should submit either in the letter or the resume, the following information: Name, address and telephone; Schools attended (with dates) and degrees, if any; Extra-curricular activities; Awards and recognitions; Work experience; Voluntary community activities.

Applicants may submit such other information as they deem relevant and should send applications to: A. E. Dick Howard, Governor's Fellows Program, Office of the Governor, Richmond, Virginia 23219.

Fall Break To Return

By Lori Foster

This year, by order of the Academic Affairs Council, our fall schedule was changed so that our October Fall break was deleted and our Thanksgiving holiday, which occurs in late November, was extended. Part of the reasoning behind the move was that out-of-state students spent a good part of their two breaks driving between home and school. However, ten weeks of Longwood without a respite is enough to send anyone to the funny farm.

Dr. Vail of the Academic Affairs Office has sympathized with the students and feels that "it is important for students to have some breathing time." The general opinion held by professors and students alike was that a break was long overdue. Teachers who made assignments to be completed during break, as one junior sarcastically remarked, "I suppose they (teachers) thought a taste of pure relaxation would make it too hard for us to want to return." More than any other group the Freshmen have felt the pressure of the prolonged stretch. Accustomed to six weeks' grading periods, ten weeks proved to be quite a test for the newcomers, perhaps to large a test. The University of Virginia follows the same fall schedule that has been sustained here at Longwood. Several suicide attempts there recently have gotten the authorities questioning the long schedule and the stress buildup that accompanies it.

With a part-time job, relatives, homework and an obsession with food taking up much of the time, nine days went by very quickly. For everyone who survived the Fall of '84 and is still returning next year, there is good news. The new fall calendar, not yet approved, will include a break in October and one for Thanksgiving. Remember, two more weeks until Christmas.

Legislating the Beast

In a paranoid frenzy last Friday, I spent the afternoon calling student government presidents around the state. I called and called, screamed and pleaded, and made much the fool of myself as I sought to find a new wave of protest forming among Virginia college students. For the final blow to the college community—at least in the eyes of many students—is soon to be laid out upon us like a chunk of rotting meat on the butcher's table.

The elixir of college society, the working god of The Omnipotent Weekend is being threatened. The Virginia General Assembly will soon mull over raising the minimum drinking age to 21, and college students' right to drink will surely be in question.

So the chances of mass protest on the part of Virginia students—and in fact students across the nation—seemed very good. In fact, Russ Thomas, president of the Student Government Association of Virginia Tech, told me that Tech students are "going to work very closely with the Virginia Student Association to defeat it.... We [the Tech SGA] will have six or seven people lobbying against it."

In addition to such individual efforts being carried on, a policy statement was issued at a Student Leader Conference for student government presidents held in early August. The statement denounced any legislation to raise the minimum drinking age, proposed stricter drunk-driving laws, yet offered suggestions for social programs in anticipation of the minimum age being raised. So much for student optimism.

Mike Gardner, SGA president at George Mason University, had few hopes that the bill would be rejected: "I don't think there is the support for a lower drinking age which there was a few years ago [when similar proposals came before the General Assembly]. It has become important to believe in alcohol awareness... The time has probably come for the law to change—like it or not."

It seems, however, that the primary reason the law will change with this General Assembly session is the $32 million dollars the Commonwealth of Virginia will lose in 1986 if it fails to enact legislation raising the minimum drinking age to 21 by that year.

Predictably, Virginia will likely fall right in line with the wishes of Congress, right in line to the point of enacting a bill which is by nature unjust in its treatment of 18-21 year-old U.S. citizens.

Those who fall in that category, however, and those who support that group, should ask the Virginia General Assembly to take a stand for its own citizens; the enactment of this law is no such stand.

The federal legislation itself attempts to cure a body riddled with bullets with a few band-aids. Would any responsible practitioner do the same?

Travel Hints Revealed

By Eric T. Houseknecht

These hints are the result of exhaustive and painstaking research conducted during the all too few vacations which have been allotted to us, the students, over the past two and a half years. Even if your travel plans include nothing more than procuring a ride home, you should not disregard this information. Simply adjust the hints to fit your personal needs, allow for a certain amount of pilot error and you will benefit enormously.

1. No matter how desperate the circumstances, absolutely, positively, and by no means should you leave the driving to Greyhound.

2. It is imperative when flying coach that you restrain any tendency toward the vividly imaginative. For although it may momentarily appear to be the case, it is not at all likely that the cabin is entirely inhabited by crying babies smoking inexpensive domestic cigars.

3. When flying first class, you may frequently need to be reminded of this fact, for it all too often seems that the only discernible difference is that the babies have connections in Cuba. You will, however, be finally reassured when the stewardess drops your drink and the glass breaks.

4. If, by chance, your mother suggests that instead of flying you take the train, risk being rude.

5. Whether or not you yourself indulge in the habit, always sit in the smoking section of airplane. The coughing will break up the trip.

6. If you're going anywhere west of Philadelphia, bring your own food.

7. Never relinquish clothing to a hotel valet without first specifically telling him that you want it back.

8. If while staying at a stupendously expensive hotel in Northern California you observe that one of your fellow guests has left his tennis shoes in front of his door, try to behave yourself.

9. At more moderately priced hotels, twenty-four hour room service generally refers to the length of time it takes for the club sandwich to arrive. This is indeed disheartening, particularly when you've ordered scrambled eggs.

10. Leaving a wake-up call for three P.M. is certain to result in a loss of respect from the front desk and over-familiarity on the part of bellboys and room-service waiters.

11. Under no circumstances should you order from room service an item entitled "The Cheese Festival" unless you are prepared to have your dream of colorfully costumed girls of all nations rolling enormous wheels of Gruyere and Jarlsberg replaced by three Kraft slices and a lot of toothpicks dressed in red cellophane hats.

12. Calling a taxi in Texas is like calling a rabbi in Iraq.

13. Without exception, wait until you get back home to have your hair cut.

14. Carry cash.

15. Stay inside.

16. Call collect.

17. Forget to write.

Going To Court

By Lee Richards

It wasn't my fault - really! But now I have to spend the next twelve months constantly checking my speed and making sure I come to a complete stop at each stop sign.

You see, I had to go to court last Friday to defend myself against reckless driving charges. It seems that one of Virginia's finest didn't consider a lane change that I executed as being one of Virginia's finest. Therefore, I had to blow off a day of school to seal my fate in court.

Unfortunately, or fortunately as the case may be, the officer did not appear in court that day and instead of throwing the case out, the judge gave me three options: reschedule the trial for another day - which I really didn't want to do; plead guilty to a lesser charge and just get it over with; or take the chance of driving very carefully for the next year and have all charges dropped. Well, being the fool that I am, I went the odds—after all, how hard can it be...?

Driving home with my mother, I soon discovered the answer to that question—not so much in the execution, but in my level of tolerance..."Watch your speed, look out for this guy up here, put your turn signal on," etc., etc., etc. And that was only in leaving the parking lot. Mothers have always been famous as back seat driver, but this was getting a little out of hand.

Driving back to school, I realized just how boring 55 miles an hour is. So as I settled down to a long, dull drive, I started to make a list of things you can do for fun while driving, as I watched other cars flash by at 75. If you ever get in this situation, or you often get bored with driving, you might want to remember a few of these helpful hints:

•Discover that each cloud is like a rainbow as the sun shines through them: (You'll need a pair of sunglasses to get the full effect of this one!)

•Pick out a cloud and see how many different shapes you can recognize in it.

•Make the strangest, ugliest faces at the motorists passing you by and see what kind of reaction you can get out of them.

•Play the air guitar along with the radio, or just sing at the top of your lungs with as much feeling as possible (it doesn't matter if you don't know the words—make some up if you have to) and look at the strange, ugly faces that people make at you.

•Play air drums and watch the truckers smile at you because they think they know what you're really doing.

•Pretend that you are a state trooper and trump up imaginery charges for all those people who left Washington after you did, but will still arrive in Richmond 20 minutes before you do.

•Think about what you want to be when you grow up.

Remember, as my good friend John Jeans always used say, people will come from all over the state to run into you, so always be on the defensive. It's a real jungle out there...

Novel Lovers: Catch Up!

By Michael Lund

December will be a good month for serial fiction lovers to catch up with the only installment novel currently being published: Tom Wolfe's The Bonfire of the Vanities, appearing a chapter at a time in Rolling Stone.

Through a variety of programs in recent years, Longwood has promoted new interest in the installment novel, a major form for classic fiction of the last century, from Thackeray's Vanity Fair Tolstoy's Anna Karinina. Next semester, for instance, freshmen in Longwood's English 101 will be studying in depth Charles Dickens serial classic of 1852-53, Bleak House.

When Wolfe announced that he would publish his new work, a novel, in Rolling Stone last summer, many on the campus excitedly bought the first issue and subscribed to the magazine.

Readers have not been disappointed in what Rolling Stone characterizes as "a tale of conceit and deceit in the City of Ambition," New York. The novel is about midway through its story at Chapter 13, "The Hoople: Noxious Auras . . . Loathsome Strategies . . . and a Moment of Truth."

The December 20th-January 3rd Special Double Issue of Rolling Stone is a good opportunity for students, faculty, and administrators to take up Wolfe's tale if they haven't been reading since the summer when the story began. The author includes a thorough recap of the first twelve chapters before proceeding with his story.

Wolfe's story offers many of the special features of classic serial tales, including cliff-hanging endings, building suspense, and multiple subplots with a variety of characters.

Student Development

By Barrett Baker

As an effort to help students get the most out of Longwood, the department for Student Development has created a project involving the 14 goals outlined in the new college catalogs to stress self-improvement.

According to Student Development Educator, Kathe Taylor, a lot of students are under the impression that they have to go to college in order to succeed in today's ultra-competitive society. But they need more than just a degree.

"We are trying to get students to answer the question, 'What am I doing here?' by helping them understand why they are here and to focus them on where they are going. We want students to see what they can accomplish while they are here and to understand how they'll be different—in a positive manner—when they leave."

The program, which actually began at the beginning of this semester, is geared towards getting students to realize how they can make a difference. In order to do so, a survey called TASK or Test for Attitudes, Skills & Knowledge was passed out to 300 Freshmen during orientation. The survey was taken from a cross section of the 14 goals involving four specific areas: effective communication, sense of awakening, interpersonal effectiveness, and critical thinking. In conjunction with the surveys an "opportunity map", which is designed to show students how to go about achieving their goals, has been developed and soon will be distributed throughout the campus.

"This system really is unique," says Taylor "because it states what it means to be a well rounded person and it tells you what it takes to get there while still stressing education. Most schools are too vague as to what it means to be "well-rounded"—after they give you your degree you're on your own. Most people just aren't well enough prepared to handle that."

The follow-up to this project is personal interviews with each of the 300 Freshmen involved with the survey along with "floor workshops" in each residence hall involving upper classmen and any Freshmen who missed the original survey.

"The end result of all of this," states Meredith Strohm, Director of Student Services, "is to identify personal strengths and weaknesses and then formulate personal goals from these. We also want to stress personal relationships between faculty and administration with the students. The students will have a much easier time here if they know how to work the system and if they have people to go to with questions."

"More than that," states Strohm, "I think this program is a real confidence booster. It gives the 'college' students a chance to compete with 'university' students on the basis that a job interview is a chance to really sell yourself to an employer. If you've got the experience and the confidence to do that well, then you're on your way to becoming a more successful person."

Age Of Artifact Found Locally Is Confirmed By Smithsonian

Alex Kambis displays his 10,000-year-old projectile point he found at Smith-Taylor mound site.

Tuesday, July 17, began like most days at Longwood College's Summer Field School in Archeology for Alex Kambis.

Kambis, a sophomore from Richmond, was patiently digging for artifacts with a trowel. He had participated in the first five-week session and now was taking part in the second session, which had begun eight days earlier.

But he found something that day which distinguished it from the rest.

Kambis uncovered the oldest artifact—it is dated at 10,000 years before the present—that has been found in three years of excavation at the Smith-Taylor Mound site. The age of the artifact, which is a Hardaway-Dalton projectile point, recently was confirmed by a branch of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D. C.

The anthropological process laboratory at the National Museum of Natural History examined the projectile point and found that, indeed, it dates from 10,000 years before the present, said Dr. James Jordan, field school director and associate professor of anthropology.

It is one of only 18 Hardaway-Dalton projectile points that have been found in Piedmont Virginia, Dr. Jordan said. It probably was used by hunting and gathering Indians as a blade on a spear, or possibly to cut meat.

"Clearly, it was the tool of a hunter and gatherer," Dr. Jordan said. "And it definitely was used on animals rather than on vegetation . . The projectile point is old and relatively unusual for this part of Virginia."

The artifact is of the common quartzite rock, is slightly reddish, and its shape is described in anthropological terms as "lobed." A small part of the rock is missing. Hardaway-Dalton projectile points were first discovered in North Carolina, and are more common there than in Virginia.

Asked if he knew the artifact was unusually old when he found it, Kambis said, "I didn't know it was particularly old, but I could recognize what it was (a Hardaway-Dalton)." After extracting it from the ground, he checked a reference book to make sure it was that type of projectile point. It will be kept on campus.

Kambis, a 19-year-old physics major, said that archeology is "just something I have an interest in." Thirty-eight students participated in the field school this past summer. The Smith-Taylor site is located off U.S. 460, not far from Southside Community Hospital. Approximately 900 artifacts—200 of them projectile points—have been found at the site.

Most of the projectile points found at the site date from about 7,000 years before the present, so there is a 3,000-year "gap" in the case of the projectile point found by Kambis, said Dr. Jordan. Surprisingly, it was found only about 12 feet from the tent where the students eat lunch, meet for class, and sometimes sleep overnight.

"It's hard to believe," Dr. Jordan said, shaking his head. "Probably all 98 students who have ever worked at the site, and myself, tramped right over that spot dozens of times."

Christmas Water Show

This weekend, the Longwood College Catalinas will present their annual Christmas water show in the Lancer Pool. The event is entitled "A Catalina Classic Christmas" and will feature eight (8) routines to the music of "The Nutcracker" by Tchaikovsky.

The Catalinas chose the classical music for the theme of the show because of its popularity during the Christmas season. "We also wanted to do something different and unique—a real "water ballet!" said Cindy Peake-Heath, Catalina coach and adviser. Routines will include the familiar tunes of the "March," "Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairies," and "Waltz of the Flowers." One of the highlights of the show will be the "Pas de Deux" performed by the co-ed duet of Ilkka Keskinen and Joey Faries.

Show times are: Thursday, Dec. 6 at 6:30 p.m.; Saturday, Dec. 8 at 2 and 3 p.m.; and Sunday, Dec. 9 at 2 p.m. Admission is free. Don't miss this Christmas classic!

Court Appeals Linking Registration and Admission

CPS — A court okay of a law forcing Tennessee students to prove they've registered for the draft before they can enroll at a state school could mean students in other states soon may have to prove it too, draft opponents say.

But at the same time, the U.S. Department of Education last week said students' honesty in signing military registration forms has been so complete the department won't require colleges to prove their students' registration in order to get student aid.

Until now, students' signatures on a form swearing they'd registered for the draft had been proof enough that they'd actually signed, but as of January 1, colleges themselves would have been responsible for proving students who wanted federal aid had registered.

Tennessee's new law requires students to sign forms certifying they've registered with Selective Service just to enroll in a state school, much less to qualify for federal student aid.

As a result, Memphis State University refused to let 19-year-old Thomas Vogel start classes because he refused to sign the compliance form.

Vogel then sued the University and the state, claiming the law unconstitutionally involved the state in enforcing federal Selective Service laws.

Pointing to a controversial July 1984 Supreme Court ruling upholding the Solomon Amendment—the federal law which requires students to prove they've registered for the draft before they can get federal aid—U.S. District Judge Thomas Wiseman recently approved the Tennessee law.

"As the nation's defense goes, so goes that of the states," Wiseman ruled.

No one is sure how much such laws help. "I don't believe we've ever found a nonregistrant because (he) refused to sign a college compliance sheet," says Selective Service spokeswoman Joan Lamb. "There is no requirement for colleges to do anything like turn over the names of students who don't sign a compliance form.

In fact, the Selective Service has prosecuted only 17 of the estimated 500,000 nonregistrants, Lamb adds.

Both Lamb and the Education Department say they're impressed with the number of students who have complied with the registration law and the Solomon Amendment.

Edward Elmendorf, assistant secretary of education, last week said he was so impressed with students' "honesty" that he was relieving colleges of the chore of proving students were telling the truth when they signed their compliance statements.

Still, registration opponents say they expect more states will keep trying to link college to the military in other ways.

A number of states—Massachusetts, Maine, Pennsylvania, California, and West Virginia among them—already have toyed unsuccessfully with laws to keep nonregistrants from getting aid, says Nora Leyland, a spokeswoman with the Committee Against Registration for the Draft (CARD).

"I foresee more states enacting Solomon-like bills tying all kinds of aid and access to draft registration," she says. "It's not going to automatically happen in every state because the political horizons are so different. But I think some states will definitely try."

The Selective Service's Lamb, however, doubts such state laws will affect many students.

"The Solomon Amendment was terrifically helpful (in getting students to register)," she says. "We saw a tremendous jump in registration in the fall when many students were returning to school and applying for aid."

"It's very difficult at the national level to tell if the Tennessee law has made much of a difference," Lamb says, since only a small percentage of eligible students have failed to register.

Indeed, Vogel is the only student who has refused to sign the Tennessee state compliance form so far, says John Eubank, Memphis State's dean of admissions.

Beginning this fall, students "who were eligible to register were merely required to sign a statement saying they've registered for the draft," Eubank says.

"It means some extra time and expense, and just one more haadache during enrollment," he says.

Saturday Matinee

A Review
By Jerry L. Dagenhart

Sunday night, December 2, The Series of Performing Arts (in association with The Chamber Theatre Repertory) presented Double Billing, a play in two acts.

The play was narrative literature in keeping with the "Chamber" style of theatre. The first act dealt with Edgar Allen Poe's, The Telltale Heart, The Facts in the Case of Madame Valdemar, and The Black Cat. The act was titled Telltale Poe. However, it would have been more aptly titled, Melodramatic Poe as the audience, including myself, perceived the series pieces in just that way.

The second act, Icabod's Last Ride, obviously based on Irving's The Legend of Sleepy Hollow, appeared to be an excerpt from some children's show in the Saturday morning lineup.

The acting of the troupe: Neil Gustafson, John Stobaeus, Bill Tripician, Janine K. Venable, and Gail M. Wheeler, was quite superb. Each member of the company showed a great deal of versatility in their ability to portray multiple characterizations.

The technical aspects, both due to the "Chamber Co." and "The Longwood Series of the Performing Arts" were handled very professionally. There is no question as to the abilities of either group.

The major problem with the evening entertainment is that the production, as I determined from one of the actors, was geared toward middle and high school students. It seems poor judgment in selection to provide this type of production for college and community audiences. The audience seemed to feel cheated in some way and as one little old lady exclaimed, "It certainly wasn't like last year's A Christmas Carol. I would hope that in the future the series will continue with more wide-appeal productions as has been a key to their professionalism in the past.

Student Activities
Fee Committee

Students Travel to NYC

Dr. William Montgomery, associate professor of music at Longwood College, and 35 students traveled to New York for the weekend of November 9, 10 and 11.

The initial fee of $90 for the "New York City or bust" weekend included the bus transportation, and hotel accommodations for three days and two nights.

The purpose of the trip was to give students an opportunity to see a broadway production live on stage, although the broadway play was not a requirement in order to participate.

Both music and non-music majors attended and approximately 98% of the students saw either a Broadway or off-Broadway show. Unfortunately, a few people could not get tickets Saturday night because the box office was sold out. Tickets were purchased in Times Square and the lines were unbelievably long but the wait in line was well worth it.

The two most popular plays among the students were Dreamgirls, released in 1982, and 42nd Street, released in 1981. These two shows in particular are musicals but have a great deal of dancing and a consistent flow of energy.

Greenwich Village and Soho (meaning south of Houston) were two of the many "spots" that were found to be interesting to all. What made these two areas so attractive was the diversity of interests that could be explored without traveling back and forth over the city. During the day you could go antique shopping or find some good buys street shopping. Nightfall brought out the city life in everyone and the alluring drinking establishments in Greenwich and Soho were experienced. The outdoor cafes and jazz parlors were perfect for resting or people watching!

The weekend was successful in every sense of the word but three days was just not sufficient for thorough exploration of such a hopping, happening city. After much thought, the word "chaotic" was the best word to describe the bustlin' city life, although overpopulation did cross our minds.

The trip was eventful for most and everyone seemed to think that the $90 was an incredible bargain. "You just couldn't beat it for the price," Lisa Bowie said.

On Sunday night, Farmville was a welcome sight as the bus pulled in the parking lot. If anyone has the chance, New York is an exciting, unusual place to visit for the weekend, but as the old saying goes, "I wouldn't want to live there."

Christmas

This month, instead of a statue of Joan of Arc, the Rotunda will be graced with the presence of a towering Scandinavian maple tree. The Peace Tree, as it is to be called, was dedicated to World Peace in a ceremony last Tuesday by the freshman class. The ceremony, which was led by freshman class president Mike Clements, featured Episcopal Campus Minister Allen Breckenridge as well as Dr. Carolyn Craft of the English, Philosophy, and Foreign Language Department.

Reading from a prepared text, Breckenridge described how down through history, man has looked upon the tree as a symbol of life, strength, peace and faith. In summing up his remarks Breckenridge said, "May this tree and its beautiful lighting be a force for dispelling the darkness and fear of our hearts and minds and bring us all to a desire to work for peace and justice in our time."

Pat Benatar — Tropic

A Review

By Barrett Baker

Watch out faithful Benatar fans—if you think you're going to find the same belting tunes that you've come to expect from renditions such as "Heartbreaker," "Hit Me With Your Best Shot," and "Hell is For Children," or if you're waiting for Patty to go completely new wave, then you're in for a small shock—but by no means is it a disappointing one!

With her recent marriage to lead quitarist, Neil Geraldo, and with the onset of motherhood sometime early next year, Benatar has matured into a more mellowed, yet nonetheless hauntingly powerful performer.

Except for the tracks, "Ooh Ooh Song," which has a '50s flavor and "Takin' It Back," which begins with a Ragae influence and then flows into the more traditional hard rocking Benatar style, the album keys more on past Benatar tunes like "Wuthering Heights," without being quite as boring. "We Belong," her current radio hit, tends to capture the mood of the album in a nutshell.

Although they may not make the radio, as so many of the best Benatar tunes don't, special attention should be paid to "Temporary Heroes" and "Love in the Ice Age," which come close to the old style that made her so famous and "Painted Desert," which reflects her initial training in classical music in a modern sense.

Even if you're not a Benatar fan, this album is definitely one that deserves a listen to. If you are a Benatar fan, it might take a couple of takes to get used to, but once you do, it'll be a classic album that'll get a lot of playing time.

Lady Lancers Start Play

Longwood's women's basketball team which beat District of Columbia 84-74 last Monday in its season opener, faces four games over the next six days and three of those contests are on the road.

After Monday night trip to Catholic, Longwood plays at Virginia Commonwealth Wednesday at 7:30, at Navy Friday night at 7:30 and returns home to host Guilford Saturday night in a 7:00 tip-off. Coach Shirley Duncan's team visits Radford next Tuesday in its final pre-Christmas action.

Lady Lancer Valerie Turner (left) swipes ball away in 84-74 win over UDC

Coach Duncan felt her team played extremely well in its season opener at home last week.

"I told the girls after the game that this was the best total team effort I've seen in a long time," said Duncan. "We got help from our experienced players, the bench and the new players. They're adjusting quickly and that's vital for us."

Three Lady Lancer cagers topped the 20-point mark for the first time in history against the Firebirds, who came into the contest with a 2-0 record. Valerie Turner had 22 points and 13 rebounds, Florence Holmes had 20 points and Caren Forbes notched 21.

Senior Mariana Johnson had a fine all-around game with 10 points, 11 rebounds, and four assists.

Longwood took the lead in the first half 14-4 behind a 12-0 run and led by as many as 19 in the second half (76-57) before UDC cut into the deficit at the end.

The game featured rough play (62 fouls were called) and turnovers (a total of 61), but the Lady Lancers hit 46 per cent of their shots from the floor to 26 per cent by the visitors.

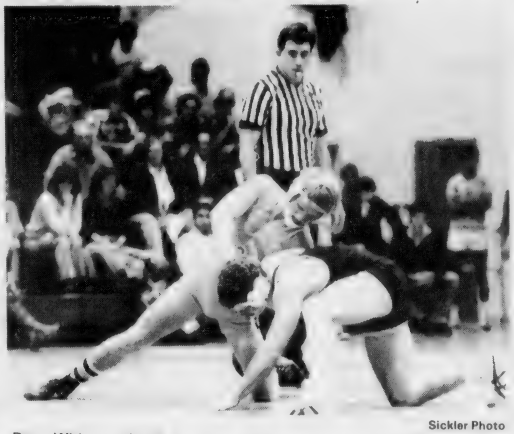
"We knew it would be a physical game," said Duncan. "Plus, they like to go one-on-one against teams and once we saw it we were able to shut them down."

Longwood used a tough player-to-player defensive set-up for much of the contest. The Firebirds had difficulty getting good shots.

Duncan was also pleased with the play of three freshmen whom she had hoped would be able to contribute right away.

"I'm especially pleased with the way they played tonight," she said referring to guards Annette Easterling, Angie Hill and center Barbie Burton.

Coach Duncan feels her team will be in good shape if it can continue the fine play exhibited in the win over UDC.



Wrestlers Open Season

The Longwood wrestling team opened its season on Tuesday, November 27, with a tri-match again Lynchburg and Chowan. The Lancers defeated Lynchburg 47-9, but then suffered a 42-7 loss to Chowan. In the opening match against Lynchburg, Timmy Fitzgerald, Kenny Lewis, and Jesus Strauss all won their match by pins. Tommy Gilbert won by a Technical Fall in the 150 pound division by beating his opponent by 15 points and Billy Howard won by a decision of 16-2. Peter Whitman, Dave Moffett, and David Taylor all won by forfeit, Lynchburg not having opponents for them to wrestle.

The Lancers did not do as well against Chowan. Only Fitzgerald and Howard could manage victories, Fitzgerald beat his opponent 16-5, while Howard won 7-5. Whitman wrestled an excellent match a 142, but still lost 6-4. Gilbert also wrestled well, but he too lost 6-4. Coach Nelson was pleased with the team's performance against Lynchburg but did not feel that the team wrestled well against Chowan. "We did not win the close matches and it hurt us."

On Saturday, Dec. 1 the Lancers traveled to Washington and Lee for the Washington and Lee wrestling tournament. The Lancers had four wrestlers place in the top four of their weight classes, but could still only manage a sixth place team finish. Fitzgerald paced the Lancers by placing first in the 118 pound division. Whitman again wrestled well and placed third in the 134 pound division. Whitman lost a very close semi-final match, but came back and dominated his opponent from Washington and Lee for third place. Gilbert placed fourth at 142 pounds. He had a chance to take third, but had to default because of an injury. The other Lancer to place was Howard who placed third at 167. While the Lancers improved on their eighth place finish of last year, Coach Nelson still feels that the team can wrestle better. "We wrestled well, but we are still losing the close matches. We need a tougher mental attitude, and when the guys realize this, there will be an improvement. We have the talent to do well, but we need to get tougher."

The top wrestlers for Longwood are, Fitzgerald (7-1), Whitman (10-5), Howard (10-5), and Gilbert (8-6). The Lancers will travel to VMI on Tuesday, Dec. 4, and William and Mary on Thursday, Dec. 6.

Cagers Even Up At 4-4

Longwood's men's basketball team hopes its performance in last weekend's Par-Bil's Tip-Off Tournament was a case of losing the battle but perhaps winning the war.

The Lancer cagers, now 4-4, put together their top performances of the season Friday and Saturday before a large and appreciative home crowd, but lost the tournament title to a solid High Point team 66-63 in overtime. Longwood rallied from an 11-point deficit in the second half before falling in OT Saturday night.

This week Coach Cal Luther's squad winds up pre-Christmas play hosting a tough Guilford club (3-1) Monday night and visiting always strong University of District of Columbia Saturday afternoon at 3:00. The contest at UDC was originally slated for 8:00, but was changed to an afternoon start last week.

In the second Par-Bil's Tip-Off Tournament Longwood defeated Coastal Carolina 89-72 and High Point nipped Francis Marion 61-58 in first round action Friday night.

The Lancers came up with 19 steals, got double figure scoring from five players and blitzed the Chanticleers with an 11-0 run in the first half and a 12-2 surge in the second half. Longwood held a 63-39 edge with 8:18 to go in the game before Coastal closed the gap at the end.

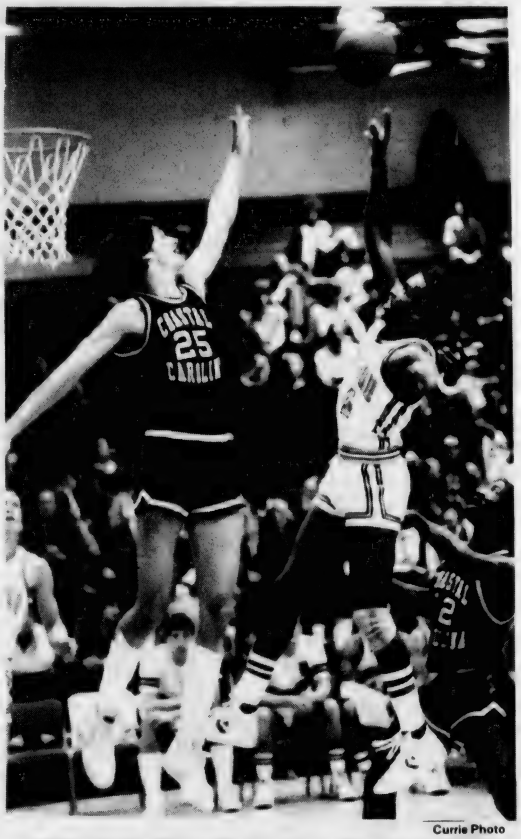
Junior Kenneth Fields topped the Lancers with 21 points while Tim Wilson scored 16, David Strothers had 14, Kevin Ricks scored 12 and Frank Tennyson had 10.

Ricks had perhaps the finest all-around game by a Lancer this season with nine rebounds, five assists and four steals to go with his points. He also hit 4-5 field goals and 4-5 free throws.

Wilson played a super game off-the-bench sparking Longwood in both halves. He scored 12 in the second half and came up with four steals. Tennyson, who scored 13 points in a 75-65 loss to Virginia State Wednesday night, notched six assists along with his 10 points and also had four steals.

Heading into Saturday night's championship contest, Longwood coach Cal Luther knew his team would have to limit its turnovers and play tough defense. The Lancers came through on both counts but were hurt by inconsistency on offense.

"We played good defense, as we have all season, and we limited our mistakes, but we just couldn't get the shots to drop when we needed them," said Luther.



After an excellent first half which ended with High Point up 28-27, the visitors went on a 10-0 tear at the start of the second half for a 38-27 lead. The Lancers played catch-up the rest of the second half.

A gutty defensive performance helped bring the Lancers back. High Point's deliberate, ball-control strategy back-fired as Longwood tied the game at 54-54 with 1:44 to go on two free throws by Tennyson. Regulation play ended at 56-56 as both teams blew chances to win in the final minute.

High Point forward Odell Walker scored four quick points in overtime and the Panthers made the lead stand up to claim the tournament title. Walker, the tourney MVP, headed the All-Tournament team along with teammates Danny Murphy and Hugh Gelston, Fields from Longwood and Patrick Callaway from Francis Marion.

Fields scored 11 of his 13 points in the second half Saturday night, but fouled out with 2:47 to go. His absence hurt Longwood's chances in overtime. Strothers added 12 points with eight coming in the second half. Ricks and Wilson added eight points and Lonnie Lewis scored seven in the second half, including the bucket at 1:11 that eventually brought on overtime.

Francis Marion captured third place in the tournament, beating Coastal Carolina 65-62 in Saturday night's opening contest.

IAA Swinging

The IAA is in full swing this week with action in indoor soccer, pool and volleyball.

There are six teams remaining in the women's indoor soccer competition. The Crazy 8's and Dambanas are in the winner's bracket while The Fighters, Alpha Gams, Totally Awesome, and L'espirit are in the losers' bracket.

Four participants are remaining in Women's Pool. Allison Arthur is the only undefeated one left while Kathy Walsh, Brit Terry, and Amy Cook each have one defeat.

Men's Volleyball enters its last week of competition with four teams still in the fight for the title. Encore and Death From Above are in the winners' brackets with the Zucchinies and Keggers I in the losers' bracket.

Men's Pool finished up last week with Jim Steve being crowned as champion. Andy Hamilton finished second while Jim Black took third place.

Keggers I and K D Ladies took first place in mens' and womens' divisions, respectively, of the swimming relays which were held last week. Keggers II finished in second place in the men's division while the Frogettes took second place in the women's competition.

Riders Close Season

By Tina Popernack

The Longwood riding team closed their fall season Sunday by turning in a strong performance at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg.

Lisa Nelson placed first in both intermediate on the flat and in intermediate over fences and earned the High Point Rider honors of the day. Bethanne McCarron placed third in novice on the flat. Loraine Bishop placed fourth in both novice on the flat and in novice over fences.

Mary Brockwell placed fifth in intermediate over fences. Mike Carey placed sixth in novice over fences. LeaAnne Lawson and Robin Levy placed third and fourth respectively in advanced walk, trot, canter. Cynthia Settle placed fifth in beginning walk, trot, canter. Christina Popernack placed sixth in advanced walk, trot.

The Longwood riding team looks forward to a strong spring season with many returning riders.

Construction To Begin On 'Recreation Center'

By Michele Williams

Longwood College will have no campus pub next semester but, instead construction of a student recreation center will begin. The recreation center will include a parquet dance floor and raised stage, a large-screen TV, a V.C.R., a large lounge and a bar which will serve beer only. It will not be labeled as a pub.

Phyllis Mable, Vice-President for Student Affairs, believes that "the intended purpose of the center is not primarily for drinking but, for socializing, meeting new people, and relaxation," she said. Therefore, the campus pub has been renamed The Student Recreation Center.

The construction of the center will begin on December 10 when "Longwood's physical plant employees begin demolition and removing debris," Mable said. On December 17th, the carpentry work will begin, and by January a big screen television will be in use. Although the new furniture and other equipment will probably not be installed until March. The center was originally projected to be complete by last October.

The new recreation center will be a part of the snack bar, both being joined by a side walkway. The snack bar area will also have some helpful renovations made in order to become more efficient for the students needs.

Student Activity Fees will finance the refurbishing along with a hefty donation by the student government association, who held a fundraising mixer last spring for what was then called a pub. The exact cost of the center is unknown. "I have no idea at this point what the final bill will be," Mrs. Mable said.

The final decision concerning how the center will function will be made by the alcohol task force, chaired by Student Development Educator Barbara Gorski and consisting of "selected students." The group will decide what beverages will be served and how the center will be managed.

Classes Offered In Spain Students Will Study In Madrid

Longwood recently completed arrangements for students to take classes in the summer of 1985 at the University of Madrid in Spain. The program, under the direction of Dr. Maria Silveira, is in conjunction with a national group, FORSPRO (Foreign Study Program, Inc.). Hampden-Sydney College also participates in the program.

Students can take courses in Spanish or in English—for which they may receive academic credit at Longwood. Spanish language courses are available at the elementary, intermediate, and advanced levels, as well as courses in all periods of Spanish literature. Other courses will be taught in English by American university professors in art, photography, geography, history, sociology, education, and international business.

In addition, there are several travel options available to students. Prices for all educational and travel options compare very favorably with those of programs sponsored by other groups. For example, Plan A—a four weeks program from July 11 to August 8—will cost $1495, including: round-trip air fare from New York to Madrid, transportation to and from the Madrid airport, lodging in student dorms or with a Spanish family, three meals per day, Spanish Tourist Health Insurance, access to laundry facilities and services of Resident Physician in dorm, six semester hours of College credit, and a variety of cultural programs and lectures by Spanish University professors.

Students interested in study and travel in Spain should see Dr. Maria Silveira in Grainger 104.

Have A Safe Holiday

Anthropology Major Off To Study In Bahamas

Becky Ansell, a junior anthropology major from Richmond, will be spending some of her 1985 spring semester on San Salvador Island in the Bahamas.

Ansell will attend archaeological field school there, and then will continue study at a visiting student program at Hartwick College in Oneonta, New York, for the remainder of the semester.

Ansell first became interested in visiting student programs after completing a required occupational and career sociology course. Ansell realized that she "had to eventually go to an anthropology school and I knew from my careers course that opportunities don't just come to you," she said. So, she borrowed a Guide to Anthropolgy text from her professor, Dr. James Jordan, Associate Professor of Anthropology, which listed special programs at cooperating schools. She then "searched the book for special programs that I found interesting and were related to my particular field," she said. Ansell has already attended field school at Longwood, and she has accumulated 10 weeks of experience that most students will not have had in the Bahamas.

A few months later Ansell received a phone call from Professor Berman of Hartwick College who said that her resume was impressive, and would enjoy having her as a student at Hartwick. "I never intended, at the time, to leave for the semester but, when I found that it was possible, I wanted to go even more," Becky said. First, permission had to be granted by Jordan, and Ansell also made sure that her credits could be transferred back to Longwood for accreditation. After cutting through all of the red tape involved, she accepted Hartwick's offer, and looked "forward to the trip more everyday," she said. It is important to note that Ansell prepared everything that was required for her trip personally.

Ansell will spend January 7 to February 1 in the Bahamas on San Salvador Island and upon completion will earn six credits for her work. February 11 to May 24, she will spend in New York at Hartwick College where Becky will be enrolled in classes. Currently, she plans on taking the following courses: the development of anthropological thought, art and technology in pre-industrial society, museums and society, hunters and gatherers, and aspects of museum management.

Hartwick College, a private school, is smaller than Longwood, with approximately 1400 students, and it is located in the small, suburban town of Oneonta, New York. "One of the reasons I chose Hartwick was because it appealed to me academically and geographically," Ansell said.

Dr. James Jordan, Ansell's advisor and Associate Professor of Anthropology was very pleased that Ansell took the initiative toward building a career. "This will probably be one of Becky's most memorable experiences, and I know she will do a great job," Jordan said. Dr. Jordan feels that in order to be successful in any career one must search for any available opportunities. "It would be ideal if all 23 of my majors could travel, and be exposed to different cultures," he said. By traveling to the Bahamas Ansell will "get a feel for the archaeological world, which she never could have gotten here at Longwood alone," he said. When Ansell returns to Longwood in the fall, Dr. Jordan plans to have her speak to the Anthropology 100 students and "bring new thoughts to us, sort of a transfusion from the outside world," Jordan said.

It's That Time Again!

By Lori Foster

"The week" has finally approached us, the week we have all dreaded from the beginning. The week our research papers, projects and notebooks that our professors informed us about, when going over the class syllabus, are due. If you haven't felt the stress from the preceding factors, because you're one of the organized students or a procrastinator with a book of golden excuses, you may still be affected by the approaching exam depression syndrome. During the process of reaching deadlines, especially for those cramming weeks of study into these last few nights, it is important not to "burn yourself out." Along with getting a good night's sleep and decent meals, it would be well advised to spend some time doing constructive activities other than constant studying. Of course, a balance is in order and exam studies should have first priority over extra activities.

If you look around, sometimes hidden in the collage of information on the walls around campus you can find programs, performers and activities that might surprise you if you give them a try.

One of the best ways to relieve the pressure from upcoming anxiety attacks is to get out of your dorm room, take a walk, and/or visit the Student Union. The Student Union provides us with video games, ping pong and pool tables and is complete with a bowling alley.

The snack bar has added public favorites such as pizza, baked potatoes with toppings and Nachos to their menu. They have also expanded and now give us an on-campus Beegles-Perphitz atmosphere on Tuesday nights.

Going back to the flyers scattered around campus, you can find concerts, performers, cash for books, and many other topics that may be of interest. If you are on the more active side, a leisurely swim is always refreshing. For those who find a bit of exercise and circulation a health hazard, and would rather not leave their room, a magazine or book to let their mind wander momentarily from examination preparation may be of interest to them. With a little imagination and motivation you can find plenty of study-breaking activities.

Lancaster Library will be open until 11 p.m. Friday, December 14, and from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday, December 15.

All materials need to be returned to the Library by December 18.

Eddie Murphy: Back In Town

a review of Beverly Hills Cop

By Pablo Duke

Eddie Murphy is back with a hit comedy, Beverly Hills Cop, in which he plays a Detroit detective, Axel Foley, searching for the killer of a childhood friend. His search takes him to posh Beverly Hills, where he finds help in the attractive form of Jenny Summers, played by Lisa Eilbacher, but Murphy is hindered by Beverly Hills policemen Billy Rosewood (Judge Reinhold) and Sergeant Haggart (John Ashton).

Foley finds the Beverly Hills Police Department to be a rigid, by-the-book organization with money to back it. He says of a squad car: "This is the cleanest and nicest police car I've ever seen in in my life ... this thing's nicer than my apartment." He sets out to loosen up the detectives in the Department with such pranks as shoving bananas up a squad car's exhaust pipe and sending his hotel room service out to detectives waiting to follow him. The Department isn't amused, however, and Foley doesn't impress them until his police skills are revealed as he unravels a drug ring led by Victor Martland (Steven Berkoff). As he discovers each clue, Foley's unorthodox style of police work gains him respect within the Beverly Hills police force.

BEVERLY HILLS Cop now showing at the State Theatre in Farmville.

The film exhibits Murphy's unique brand of comedy, yet it shows no great changes in his style as an actor; Foley resembles the same characters Murphy played in both 48 Hours (with Nick Nolte) and Trading Places (with Dan Ackroyal), if a little more street-smart here than in those roles. Beverly Hills Cop places Murphy in his first solo lead, a position which enables him to play off of every character with whom he has contact. In this commanding spot, his comedy is very successful. He is, however, not as comfortable with his comedic lines as he is with his more serious ones. Here, Murphy often edges the unbelievable as he attempts to play the tough Detroit cop. Much of the problem here, though, may be caused by Murphy's popularity as a comedian. No one will go to see this movie expecting Shakespearian drama, and, if Murphy's tongue seems trapped with endless one-liners, it is forgiveable.

Judge Reinholt plays the same naive character he did in Fast Times at Ridgemont High, and he is good at it. He provides good balance with Murphy, yet he should be good in this part; he's played it before.

John Ashton's performance in the role of the slow-to-move detective Haggart is mediocre. His scenes with Murphy are fun, but something is missing. His dry humor provides an adequate sounding board for our hero.

Director Martin Brest might credit himself with the top-money film of this year's Holiday season if ticket sales can maintain their feverous first-week rate.

Beverly Hills Cop is, primarily, Fun with a capital F. The plot isn't completely insulting as are so many plots in today's comedies, and the action of the film is captivating. It is, of course, Murphy's comedy which holds the film together, but then, that's why this "Saturday Night Alive" veteran is receiving top billing as the Beverly Hills Cop.

Luther Ranks 13th

According to records compiled by the NCAA, Longwood head basketball coach Cal Luther ranks 13th in victories among active Division II coaches. Before the current season Luther's total of 331 career wins was 13th best in Division II.

Luther, a head coach at the college level for 23 years, held a 286-194 career mark when he came to Longwood in 1981. Many of those wins were compiled at Division I Murray State.

Longwood stands 50-35 as Luther takes part in his fourth season with the Lancers. His current overall record is 336-229.

There are single acres in Europe that house more first rate men than all the states south of the Potomac, than there are probably single square miles in America. If the whole of the late Confederacy were to be engulfed by a tidal wave tomorrow, the effect upon the civilized minority of men in the world would be but little greater than that of a flood on the Yang-Tse-Kiang. It would be impossible in all history to match so complete a drying-up of a civilization.

It's Christmas Time In The Town. . . .

By Eric T. Houseknecht

The yuletide season is once again upon us and with its inherent joys of giving unto others. Every year, seasonal shoppers bring the spirit of Christmas as well as unparalleled economic stimulation to the streets of their cities; and Farmville is no exception. Heading for the northern end of town, my photographer and I pushed our way through the bustling crowd of anxious consumers towards our first destination. A day of shopping in Farmville's northern district without a trip to Walker's Diner for lunch represents a serious breech of social protocol to all except the truly culturally inept.

Once the center of the city's greatest cluster of eating establishments, the closing of The Captain's Favorite and The Hobo Palace has left Walker's standing alone in this popular shopping region, a citadel of epicurean delights. Tony, a renowned connoisseur and my photographer for the day, described the local canteen as "a beehive of activity." Obviously both a place to see and be seen, we procured two seats among the fashionable crowd as I reveled in the culinary pleasure of one of the chef's creations, enticingly titled "No. 9."

From there it was on to the Chicken Shack for a post-meal cocktail and then out onto the pavement where we were immediately accosted by street venders. Posing a serious threat to the door-to-door technique of the sorority girls, these colorful local characters are always willing to haggle over the price of Krispy Kreme donuts. Turning our attention to more serious shopping matters, we headed for the stores to find out what's hot this season.

If its New York fashions you're looking for, then look no further. Indeed no local shopper's day would be complete without at least stopping to browse through the beautifully decorated Christmas room of this quaint shop of crafts, where even the most unfeeling Scrooge could not help but be caught up in the spirit of Christmas.

"If I had the world to give—
I'd give it to you long as you live:
Would you let it fall, or hold it all in your arms?

If I had a song to sing—
I'd sing it to you long as you live.
Lullaby or maybe a plain serenade.
Wouldn't you laugh, dance, and cry, or be afraid at the change you made?

I may not have the world to give to you, but maybe I have a tune or two.
Only if you let me be in your world—could I ever give this world to you.
But I will give what love I have to give."

A. Moffat Evans: A Profile

By Jeff Fleming

Prior to the opening of A Bedroom Farce, the last of the Longwood Players' two fall productions, The Rotunda interviewed A. Mofatt Evans, the Technical Director in the Drama Department here at Longwood College. Responsible for all the sets, lights, design, and construction in Jarman Auditorium, Evans usually remains in the background. His is not a position that gains much recognition and he has often gone without notice, when credit for successful shows is given out usually the cast and General Director receive most of it. He is a well-trained professional though and his work is invaluable for the success of the shows.

Evans received his Masters of Arts Degree and Bachelor of Science Degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1971. After graduation he taught drama classes for three years in New Jersey at Ocean County College. After deciding to bring his family and career back to his home state of Virginia, he worked as Technical Director for the Showtimers and Mill Mountain Playhouse in Roanoke. In 1979 he decided to obtain his Masters of Fine Arts. Following his 1981 graduation, he worked in Norfolk as Master Carpenter for The Virginia Stage Company. It was at this point that Patton Lockwood, former head of the Drama Department of Longwood, suggested he come down for an interview.

In his three years at the college he has shown us a variety of stage constructions. This year is no exception. The stage for Three Penny Opera had to be designed so that it could be set up and taken down before and after each practice because other organizations booked the stage just prior to its opening. In the most recent play the stage had to be rebuilt on platforms. This complex set had walls, carpet, working telephones and doorbells. The specially designed stage had to be completed in just three short weeks. Three individual platforms, sloping one and one-half inches per foot were joined together to create what is known as a raked stage. These had been used when theaters were built with a flat seating arrangement. The raked stage was used with A Bedroom Farce because a large portion of the lines were delivered from actors practically lying flat on their backs. Those who saw the show can appreciate the fine work done in that short time.

One of the first projects that Dr. Evans started work on was the reconstruction of the Studio Theater. It had formerly been used primarily for one act plays.

Evans felt that this should be available to students. Before this, students were rarely ever allowed stage time since the main stage in Jarman is almost always booked.

A large portion of the reconstruction was done this summer. He has used the main stage striplights as houselights. The permanent seating was made available through special arrangements with the Job Score Center in Monroe, Virginia.

Regardless of whether the plans for the museum are ever fulfilled, the talents and contributions of Evans are many; and while these may only be noticed by a select few, they are, nonetheless, greatly appreciated.

Merriment, Misery, Mush Raio On December

By Frank Raio

Ah December, what a great month. Winter is here. We think of cuddling in front of a crackling fire, roasting chestnuts, sipping hot cider and brandy. The air is crisp and fills our lungs deep while we throw snowballs and build snowpeople. We rush to the mailbox to send and receive seasons greetings to and from the ones we love best. Cold November nights are made bearable by our anticipation of spirited Christmas parties and sucking face under the mistletoe. December is truly a month of merriment.

Wrong slater-breath. December is a highly over-rated month. Let us take a moment and examine the various shortcomings and frailties of the final month of the year.

In the first place, let's dispel all this month of "good cheer" stuff. December is the month of break-ups, particularly in long-distance relationships. Yea, I hear you: "But Frank, girls dump you year-round." I am speaking of general trends here. You can see it on their faces as they leave the mailbox area, "walking-papers" in hand. You can hear it in their voices as you pass the phone booth. There are two main factors that make December the dumping month. The first one is that after four months of faithful letter-writing, phone-calling and wall-flowering at parties, one partner gets fed up with the whole thing. "It's not you, it's me," "I need some time," are terms frequently used in place of "I am fed up." There seems to be something about the four-month period of separation that ends in December. That "smooth-talking" guy or girl who has been pestering you all semester suddenly becomes a "sweet-talker" around late-November and December. A second factor must be added for those individuals who were never faithful wallflowers. These people break-up in December because they know that they will see their partners over the Christmas break and could not resume the same close relationship.

I make these observations to enlighten the Longwood campus; I do not want to see people hanging around the mailbox area checking faces and looking for dates.

I think that the weather of the season adds to December's bleakness. While many of Longwood's more wealthy leisured may welcome winter and the prospect of ski weekends, I associate Farmville's snowless Decembers with runny-noses and subsequent crusty sleeves. A constant source of amazement for me is Farmville's "head-on-winds" which change direction to insure frozen mustaches both to and from class. The highly unflattering apparel worn to accommodate this frigid month has scopers of both sexes down on December, driving even the most faithful leerers from their perch in front of the dining hall.

And how could I forget the academic tone set for December? Pages and pages of term papers are due during this month; many students visit the library for the first time during December. Students read the Honor Code in December, searching for a loophole to aid in those papers. This month also will bring an introduction of amphetamines to many freshmen, as visions of final examinations dance in their heads. One bright spot of December is the opportunity to evaluate the teachers on their performance, as they have done to us all semester. I always bring crayons to class during that week or bring the forms back to my room so I can provide a more detailed essay in the margins.

December, despite its one major benefit, is a miserable excuse for a month. The Japanese were just waiting for December to roll around to lay the big hit on Pearl Harbor. It is December which should have twenty-eight days, twenty-seven on leap years (even though it would shorten the hangover recovery time between Christmas Eve and New Year's.)

Next month: January

Involvement Is Key To Many College Difficulties

By Bill Moore

I talk to most of the students who withdraw from Longwood, and the topic of wasting money (and/or time) is a frequent refrain. "I don't know what I want to do," "I don't want to waste my folks' money," "I wasn't ready for college work," etc., etc. But what about the rest of you? My guess is that there's a lot of time-wasting going on out there, even while you're bitching about rising tuition costs and board costs and so on. You may be feeling some heat from your parents, too—is this investment of thousands of dollars in your college education going to be "worth it?" Well, the answer to that question depends on how you choose to define "worth"—but the bottom line is that an affirmative answer is not just Longwood's responsibility, it's a shared responsibility between you and the college. And the key to that responsibility is the whole issue of involvement.

A recent report on excellence in undergraduate education entitled "Involvement in Learning: Realizing the Potential of American Higher Education" (reproduced in the October 24 issue of the Chronicle of Higher Education), makes a compelling argument for student involvement in learning being the most significant factor in improving the quality of higher education in this country. By involvement these education experts mean the amount of time, energy, and effort, as well as the quality of that effort, that you as students devote to the learning process in college, both in and out of the classroom. The authors of this report proceed to make a series of challenging (some might say radical) recommendations for increasing the general quality of higher education, and they direct their proposals to administrators, faculty, and students. Yes, the college is accountable for striving towards quality—but so are you, otherwise the whole deal's off. So what does the report suggest that you can do about it?

To begin with, the authors believe that your time is your most precious asset in college, so you need to ask yourself some hard questions about how you are "spending" your time:

- Are you using it to get to know one or more faculty members really well, as friends or informal advisers rather than just lecturers? Or are you cutting classes, doing the minimum amount of work, and avoiding all contact with faculty, in or out of the classroom? Professors themselves, not just the academic content of their classrooms, are probably the most significant commodity academe has to offer—but you have to make the effort to interact with them.
- Do you take advantage of the formal advising and counseling services available at Longwood? Or are you one of those folks who don't really know who their adviser is or where the counseling center is? And if you find your adviser to be inadequate (unconcerned about you, too hurried, inaccessible) what are you doing about it? Complaining to your friends, or trying to do something constructive to change the situation—like switching advisers or discussing the problem with the Academic Vice-President?
- Outside of the classroom, are you making an effort to become active in a club or organization that interests you and allows you to develop your skills? Do you think about ways that you can contribute through your involvement? Or are you sitting back, drinking your beer, going home every weekend, and bitching about there being nothing to do at Longwood?

Ultimately, this issue of involvement is self-serving; it is the most fundamental vocational education today. Why? Because let's face it: in and of itself, a Longwood diploma and 50 cents (or is it 60 cents now?) will get you a cup of coffee, no guarantees beyond that. If you want a decent return on your investment—of money, time, and effort—then think about spending your capital wisely and efficiently; it will likely pay off for you down the road.

Soccer Players Named All American

Longwood senior back Darryl Case has been named to the Coaches Division II All-America soccer team for the fourth year in a row and teammate Mark McArdle has also been picked for the 1984 All-America squad.

Case, a second team pick for the past three years, was named to the first team for 1984. He ended the season with seven goals and three assists and had 15 career goals. McArdle, a midfielder who totaled four goals and four assists, earned a spot on the second team All-America squad.

Both Case and McArdle and teammate John Kennen had earlier been chosen for the All-South Atlantic Region Division II - NAIA squad. Kennen scored 18 goals and added four assists in leading Longwood to a 12-5-4 record and a co-State Championship. McArdle and Kennen are juniors.

Grapplers Struggle In Away Matches

The Longwood wrestling team traveled to Williamsburg on December 6, for a match against tough Division I foe William and Mary. William and Mary won the match 43-9, but in coach Steve Nelson's opinion the match was not as lopsided as the score. "This was obviously not our best match of the year, but we did not wrestle that badly either. There were some matches that were very close and then our guy would get caught in a throw and get pinned."

While the Lancers wrestled some good matches, they could manage only two wins. In the 118 pound class, Timmy Fitzgerald defeated AA state champion Jimmy Green by a score of 20-8. "Timmy wrestled a good match tonight," said coach Nelson. "He had too much respect for Green at the beginning, but once he started to wrestle his style he dominated the match."

Billy Howard earned the second Lancer victory with a 10-1 decision over his opponent. "Billy dominated the match. He wrestled this guy earlier this year and had to come from behind to win. Tonight Billy showed everyone what he is capable of doing. He wrestled the way he is capable of wrestling and if he continues to do so he will be hard to beat."

Other Lancers who did well are Pete Whitman and David Taylor. According to coach Nelson, "There is improvement on the team but is is inconsistent. One match we will have four or five guys wrestle well and the next match we will have four or five different guys wrestle well. If we establish some consistency we can be a good team. The talent is here, it is just a point of getting each individual to wrestle up to his capabilities on a consistent basis."

On December 4 the wrestling team traveled to Lexington for a match against Division I opponent VMI. Although Longwood lost, coach Nelson was pleased with the team's performance. "VMI is a Division I school with a very strong wrestling program. They have a large budget and therefore they have some of the best wrestlers in this area. When you take these factors into consideration, our guys did well against them. We were not scared of their name or reputation. We wrestled tough against them and we surprised them."

In the 118 pound division Fitzgerald revenged an earlier loss with an 8-4 victory. The score was tied with only three seconds remaining when Fitzgerald hit a four point throw to seal the victory. "Timmy showed the mental toughness that this team has been looking for. He never gave up and as a result he came off the mat as the winner."

In the 150 pound class, Steve Albeck dominated his opponent before winning on an injury default. "Steve wrestled one of his best matches of the year," said Coach Nelson. "He forced his opponent to wrestle his style and therefore he controlled the entire match."

At 177, David Taylor won by a score of 7-5. "David finally found the mental toughness that we have been stressing so much. In the past, he would wrestle well and then lose in the last minute. Tonight he wrestled tough for the entire match. If he keeps wrestling with this attitude in the future he will be a big help to the team."

Jesus Strauss won by a pin in the heavyweight division. Jesus was able to use his speed and quickness against his bigger opponent. He pinned him in the first period with a headlock.

Coach Nelson was also pleased with the performance of Whitman in the 134 pound class. "Although he lost 7-6, Pete still wrestled a great match. He wrestled hard the whole time. It's a shame to see him lose such a close match."

Lady Cagers Start Up Strong

Continuing a strong start, Longwood's women's basketball team won three of four games last week behind standout performances from seniors Valerie Turner, Florence Holmes and sophomore Caren Forbes.

Now 4-1, Longwood visits strong Division I Radford Tuesday night in what should be a tough challenge. The Lady Lancers won't play again until January 10 when they visit North Carolina Wesleyan.

Last week Longwood beat Catholic 68-51 Monday, nipped Virginia Commonwealth 70-68 Wednesday, fell to Navy 63-56 Friday and whipped visiting Guilford 89-61 Saturday night. The week's first three games were on the road.

Longwood's top three scorers from last season teamed up to lead the rout of Guilford, a team that came into Lancer Hall with a 4-3 record. Turner, one of the nation's top rebounders, scored 22 points and grabbed 12 rebounds, Holmes tossed in 21 points with 11 rebounds and Forbes scored 17 points while handing out 10 assists.

The Lady Lancers led 44-34 at the half after a 14-2 run put them in control. Turner had 19 first half points. Holmes and Forbes keyed Longwood's second half effort.

Also making contributions to the win were freshmen Angie Hill and Annette Easterling. Hill scored nine points while hitting 5-6 free throws and Easterling handed out six assists.

Longwood coach Shirley Duncan was especially pleased with the win after Friday's loss at Navy.

"We played pretty well in the first half at Navy," said Duncan, "but our players must have felt they just had to walk on the court to get the win in the second half."

Longwood led 31-28 at the half, but was outscored 35-25 in the second half.

Forbes topped Longwood at Navy with 24 points while Turner chipped in 16 and Holmes 8.

In the win over VCU Easterling and Turner combined to hit three free throws in the final 20 seconds to sew up the win. Longwood trailed for much of the game until rallying near the end.

Turner collected 24 points and 15 rebounds, Forbes 15 points and center Karen Boska 10 points.

Turner had 19 points and 18 rebounds, Forbes 14 points and Mariana Johnson 12 points in the victory over Catholic last Monday.

Turner, Holmes Closing in on 1,000 Points

Turner and Holmes are closing in on a major career milestone in their last campaign at Longwood. Holmes (925 pts.) and Turner (838 pts.) should pass the 1,000 points mark in career scoring this season, perhaps as early as January.

Only four players in Longwood history have accomplished this feat. Sue Rama (1974-78) is the leader with 1,471 points, followed by Maryjane Smith (1,167, 1976-80), Brenda Fettrow (1,117, 1977-80) and Cindy Eckel (1,029, 1979-83).

Turner and Holmes appear capable of passing Eckel, Fettrow and Smith, but Rama's total is probably out of reach.

When the first NCAA Divsion II statistics come out this week Turner and Holmes figure to rank near the top in two categories. Turner is averaging about 15 rebounds per game and Holmes is hitting over 94 per cent of her free throws.

IAA Update

The Intramural Athletic Association finishes up for the semester with champions being declared in men's volleyball, women's soccer, and women's pool.

Encore won men's volleyball with 16-14, 15-12 win. Team members are: Tim Zirkle, Ira DeGrood, Mike Alers, Jay Worthington, John Rusevlyan, Dee Tucker, Mike Passcrel, Rodney Cullen, Jimmy Livesay, and Steve Allen.

The Dambanas were victorious over the Crazy 8's in the women's soccer finals. Team members are: Gena Streensland, Betsy Kornieck, Susan Wilkerson, Beth Peat, Linda Coleman, Melanie Bert, Collean Stives, Beth Blakely, Bobby Shuler, Lois Kinch, Jeanette Schroder, Tami Whitlock, and Jean Yancey.

Allison Arthur won the women's pool championship.

Basketball Team Searching For Consistency

A hard-to-swallow 72-71 loss at District of Columbia Saturday afternoon capped off the 1984 portion of Longwood's 1984-85 basketball schedule. Now the Lancer cagers will work hard to get ready for 1985 and the Mason-Dixon Conference season.

"We could have easily won Saturday's game," said a disappointed coach Cal Luther. "We just did not shoot the ball well. We played good defense and we kept our turnovers down in the second half, but we couldn't get a bucket when we had to have it."

The Lancers rallied from a 12-point second half deficit and almost overtook the Firebirds. Working patiently on offense, Longwood had two good opportunities to take the lead in the final two minutes, but both shots failed to drop.

Longwood, now 5-5, won't play again until January 5 when they visit Armstrong State in Savannah, Georgia. Mason-Dixon Conference play begins January 16 when Randolph-Macon pays a visit.

Real Improvement

Reflecting on the first part of the season, coach Luther believes the team has gotten better.

"Before the season began I felt we would be fortunate to be 5-5 at this point," said the Longwood coach. "The team has shown real improvement since the beginning of the season. I don't know at this juncture that we're going to be strong enough to compete like we would like to in the Mason-Dixon, but we have learned some things about ourselves.

"We know who our best players are now and we know in which areas we need to continue to improve if we expect to be competitive in the league."

Strothers Has Hot Hand

In Saturday's loss at UDC senior David Strothers tossed in 22 points with 14 coming in the second half.

Tim Wilson, Longwood's other senior, scored a career-high 18 points while junior Kenneth Fields had an off-night but still managed to score 11.

Wilson has averaged 14.3 ppg. over Longwood's last four contests and has earned himself a spot in the starting lineup.

"Tim has given us points, something we were hurting for," said Luther. "We have more scoring punch with him in the lineup and he has made some big steals out of our pressing defense."

Fields, a 6-2 swing player, has been Longwood's most consistent scorer. Averaging 14.1 ppg., he has been in double figures in eight in Longwood's first 10 contests while shooting 59 percent from the floor and over 70 percent from the free throw line.

"Kenny has done an outstanding job for us in his first year with the team," said coach Luther, "Not only is he our leading scorer, but he's played well in the clutch and given us a first-rate job on defense."

Strothers Free Throw String Ends

For Strothers, last week's double overtime 63-55 win over Guilford had a bitter-sweet ending. Longwood canned 16 of 17 free throws in the second overtime to beat the Quakers last Monday, but Strothers' string of 49 consecutive free throws came to an end on the last shot of the game. His streak ended just 16 short of the Division II mark of 65 straight.

Strothers made seven of eight in the contest and scored 13 points, but he missed his last attempt. The miss ended a string which began in the last six games of the 1983-84 season and continued through the first nine contests this year.

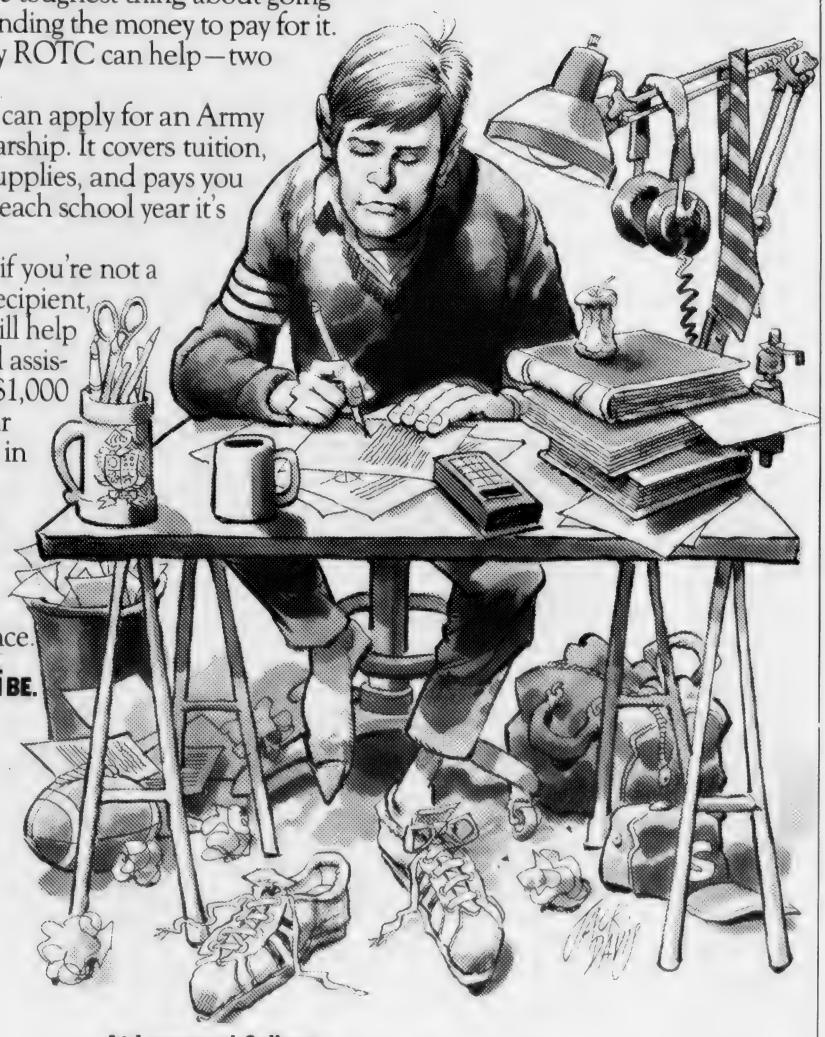
With a career mark of 92-102 (90.2 percent), Strothers has made 29 of 30 this season for 96.7 percent, a figure which is sure to rank near the top in Division II statistics. Strothers is averaging 13.3 points per game.

Another player who has made steady contributions is sophomore Kevin Ricks. The team leader in steals with 29, Ricks has averaged 9.8 ppg.

"Kevin has played well for us defensively," says coach Luther. "For a sophomore, he's doing pretty well."

EVEN STRAIGHT A'S CAN'T HELP IF YOU FLUNK TUITION.

Today, the toughest thing about going to college is finding the money to pay for it.



But Army ROTC can help—two ways!

First, you can apply for an Army ROTC scholarship. It covers tuition, books, and supplies, and pays you up to $1,000 each school year it's in effect.

But even if you're not a scholarship recipient, ROTC can still help with financial assistance—up to $1,000 a year for your last two years in the program.

Student Anti-Apartheid Groups Organize

By David Gaede

"Nothing happens in the winter," lamented Dumisani Kumalo of the American Committee on Africa (ACA), referring to the scarcity of student protest against South African racial segregation during the beginning months of 1983.

But now, in the dead of winter, the student anti-apartheid movement has suddenly heated up, surprising even movement leaders.

Fueled by Jesse Jackson's ongoing anti-apartheid crusade, South African Bishop Desmond Tutu's recent winning of the Nobel Peace Prize, numerous marches on U.S.-based South African diplomatic offices, and the arrests of some 200 protestors since late November, 1984, the campus South African movement is going strong, leaders report.

"A lot more students, because of the media attention South Africa has been getting among the general public, are suddenly becoming aware and interested in stopping apartheid," notes Joshua Nessen, ACA student coordinator.

Nessen, who in the past has tried to spread the word by associating it with more highly-publicized causes like the anti-nuclear movement, thinks he may have turned a corner.

"You know the campus movement is gaining momentum when, in the midst of Christmas vacation at Berkeley, you have 1,000 students marching on the administration building, locking arms, and demanding divestiture," he says.

Indeed, in just the last several weeks students on dozens of campuses across the country have protested the plight of the black majority in South Africa, demanding that their colleges stop investing in U.S. companies which do business with the white supremacist government there.

During the December 7th march at Berkeley, for instance, 38 students were arrested as over 1,000 protestors encircled the administration building for three hours.

The day before, several hundred University of Maryland-College Park students, locked out of a planned sit-in at the administration building, boarded buses and marched on system President John Toll's office to protest the system's $6.3 million in South African-tied investments.

Likewise, a group of University of Texas students chanting "Board of Regents, you can't hide, we charge you with genocide," protested outside a recent board of regents meeting demanding the UT system sell its estimated $600 million in South African-linked stock holdings.

And in a somewhat more radical tactic, 12 members of Oberlin College's Student Coalition Against Apartheid tried unsuccessfully to shut down the campus computer system and hold it hostage until the school sold off its $30 million in South African-tied companies.

Accustomed to a regular, organized series of student protests during the warmer, spring months, this winter's spontaneous uprisings have caught even anti-apartheid activists by surprise.

"I don't think any of us expected (the campus protests) to be this big at this time," Nessen reveals. "I don't know what would have happened at Berkeley, for instance, without the national focus given the issue by people like Tutu and Jackson."

"We thought it would be naive on our part, because of the current interest, not to capitalize on it," admits former Maryland Black Student Union President Charles Bell, who helped organize the recent College Park demonstration.

Ruled by a minority of five million whites, South Africa's 22 million blacks are forced to live, work, play, and attend school only with other blacks.

Campus anti-apartheid leaders want to force colleges to sell off their billions of dollars in endowment stock holdings in some 350 U.S. companies which do business with South Africa.

Such "divestiture," they say, will force U.S. companies to pressure the government to amend its racist policies or lose American business.

"It's too soon to tell if (this winter's campus protests) are actually resulting in more colleges divesting of South African-tied stock," says Knight.

"But they are going to find it harder and harder to stall as long as there is continued student protest and as more states and localities enact divestiture legislation."

In the last few years, Brown, Northern Illinois, Wesleyan, and the City University of New York, among others, have either

New Program Offered In Special Education

Longwood College's new degree program in special education is gearing up and went into effect with the beginning of the college's second semester in January.

The program was authorized by the State Council of Higher Education in May 1984.

In the fall of 1984, Vera G. Williams joined Longwood's eduction faculty. Her immediate assignment was to direct the development of the special education curriculum.

All of the professional courses to be required for the special education degree have now been developed and approved by Longwood's Academic Affairs Council and by the State Department of Education, Williams said.

The first two courses in the program—"Introduction to Special Education" and "Language and Language Disorders"—will be offered next semester. Three more courses will be introduced in the fall of 1985.

Longwood's four-year program will fulfill requirements for teaching certification in two areas of special education—learning disabilities and emotional disturbances—or a dual certification in both areas.

Plans are being made for special training institutes, for purchasing materials and equipment for diagnostic testing, and for in-service workshops for area special education teachers. "We have applied for a grant to help finance these things," Dr. Williams said. "I think we have a good chance of receiving some funding."

Twenty-five students are registered in the special education program so far, and "we are receiving many inquiries about next year," Williams said.

The college plans to hire another special eduction faculty member next summer. The program also will have the benefit of a visiting professor in 1985-86. A specialist in education for exceptional children will come to Longwood from the University of Jyvaskyla in Finland under a faculty exchange program funded by a grant from the U. S. Information Agency.

bypasses

"Hey, man, how 'bout a cigarette?" The 37-year-old electronics expert rolls his eyes and thinks to himself, "Not again—God, not again." He glares at the black teenager standing in front of him in the graffiti-covered subway car.

"Got a light?" Frustrated, Bernhard Hugo Goetz ignores the question and the face it comes from, a face accompanied by three other nameless, but in Goetz's mind, hostile black faces.

When the face asks him for five dollars, Goetz calmly replies, "I have five dollars for each of you," and pulls an unlicensed .38-caliber handgun from under his coat. Within thirty seconds, all four young men lie bleeding on the car floor, and Goetz is gone.

In the weeks that followed this December 22nd incident in New York City, Bernhard Goetz was celebrated as a hero, an 1980's Bronson-type vigilante. Thousands of dollars were raised to support his defense, letters-to-the-editor across the nation supported his action. Joan Rivers sent a 'Love and Kisses' telegram and offered to help him with bail. Bernhard Goetz rang a note which Americans appreciated; supposedly, he fought fire with fire and gained revenge for his harassment.

"It's something we'd all like to do," said Geoffrey Alpert of the University of Miami Center for the Study of Law and Society in a Time interview, "We'd all like to think we would react the way Goetz did." A Georgia sheriff didn't condone the unlicensed gun, but told reporters, "I'm glad to see someone who's got enough guts to stand up for his rights."

If, indeed, it is Goetz's right to shoot four teenagers with little or no provocation; we live in a frightening society. Though the victims were armed with sharpened screwdrivers, it is unlikely that Goetz knew this; his is not a case of self-defense. He acted offensively out of fear or hatred, and we call him Hero.

Not that fear or hatred are rare emotions in this nation, particularly in our largest city, and more particularly in the subway system of that city. Indeed, both are common reactions to our 'civilized' society, but it is hardly heroic to feel them.

Blood and Guts Hero, Fighting Back, Fire with Fire. Such is the talk of Bernie Goetz. Yet Goetz was not approached with fire by a black teenager on December 22. He was asked a question. Goetz shot four teenagers because he was frustrated with his own inadequacies, whether they were based on fear or racism or both, and we cheer him. A society which supports such a sobering act is, like Goetz himself, cynical and cowardly.

There is no courage in firing a gun; it is an act of cowardice. Cowardice motivated Goetz to pull the trigger; courage would have had him open his arms.

Howard Goes 3-0; Earns Weekly Honor

Sophomore Billy Howard turned in a sparkling performance for the Longwood wrestling team last Thursday, and for his showing, Howard has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period January 11-18. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

In pacing Longwood to a pair of victories in a quadrangular match at Hampden-Sydney Thursday, Howard won two matches at 167 pounds and a third at 177 to up his season marks to 15-9 overall and 6-2 in dual matches.

The Cave Springs High School graduate won one match 17-1, another 19-3 and the third on a pin in 3:20. Longwood beat Lebanon Valley and University of the South, losing to Brown.

"Billy simply out-classed his competition," said coach Steve Nelson. "He was in control of all his matches and made very few mistakes. His performance really helped us get two team wins."

Artist of the Month

Longwood College's Artist of the Month for December/January is Jennifer Byers, of Aldie.

Her award winning work is a pencil/photo montage entitled "Missing Panes." The work is on exhibit in Longwood's Bedford Art Building through January 31.

The Artist of the Month also receives a $50 cash award.

The competition for Artist of the Month is open to all students enrolled in art classes at Longwood. The winner is selected by members of the art faculty.

Ms. Byers is a junior art major at Longwood. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Donald J. Byers, of Aldie.

partially or fully divested of South African-tied stock in the face of mounting student pressure and divestiture legislation.

Others, such as Minnesota, Yale and the entire Michigan higher ed system, have sold stock in companies which refused to honor the Sullivan Principles, a set of six guidelines businesses must follow to guarantee equal treatment of black workers.

But while some schools have divested, most continue either to avoid the issue entirely, or condemn divestiture as an ineffective and unfair method of opposing apartheid.

Southern California, Illinois, Pitt and Stanford, to name a few, consistently have refused to consider selling their stock in IBM, Motorola, Black and Decker, Newmont Mining, Ford, Coke, Mobil Oil, and other firms in South Africa.

Even after hosting a visit last month by Nobel Peace Prize winner Bishop Tutu, Harvard, steadfastly refuses to consider divestiture of millions in South African stock holdings in its endowment fund.

Harvard President Derek Bok has publicly charged that "divestiture will not succeed and will cost the university money."

"It's a controversial issue on campus," confesses Harvard spokesman David Rosen, "an issue on which students and faculty are deeply divided."

"With the publicity at a high level, it will be vital to follow up with protests and demonstrations on campuses this spring," ACA's Nessen explains.

"With an extensive campus network already in place," he predicts, "we're planning a record year of student protests and civil disobedience on campuses nationwide" during the movement's March 21-April 6 "Weeks of Action."

Lady Lancers Face Road Games; Turner Named MDAC Top Player

Stung by a pair of weekend losses, Longwood's women's basketball team will have to regroup on the road this week as it visits Liberty Baptist Tuesday night for a Mason-Dixon Conference game and then travels to Florence, South Carolina for the Foxy Lady Tournament Thursday through Saturday.

Currently 5-6 overall and 0-2 in the Mason-Dixon, Longwood beat Randolph-Macon 88-61 last Tuesday, but fell to Division III number one Pittsburgh-Johnstown 73-69 Friday night and Maryland Baltimore County 79-74 Saturday afternoon.

The losses to UPJ and UMBC make Tuesday's trip to Liberty Baptist doubly important in terms of the MDAC race. Longwood is slated to play host Francis Marion at 6:00 Thursday in the opening round of the Foxy Lady Tournament. Other tourney teams are Georgia Southern, USC- Spartanburg, Limestone, Wingate, Coastal Carolina and Fayetteville State.

Turner Named Player of the Week

Longwood All-America candidate Valerie Turner totaled 60 points, 42 rebounds and 16 assists in her team's three games last week. It was no big surprise that Turner was chosen as the Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference Women's Player of the Week.

Turner had 27 points, 18 rebounds and six assists against R-MC, 23 points and 10 rebounds against Pitt-Johnstown and 10 points, 14 rebounds, seven assists and six steals in the loss to UMBC.

The Lady Lancers played well in the Friday night loss to UPJ, currently 14-1 and ranked number one in Division III. The Lady Cats beat Longwood 74-54 last season, but got all they could handle Friday. Poor shooting (36 percent) doomed any chances of an upset.

Also playing well for Longwood last week were seniors Mariana Johnson and Florence Holmes.

Johnson had 13 points and six rebounds against Randolph-Macon and 15 points and six rebounds against UMBC. She canned seven of eight free throws Saturday afternoon.

Holmes continued to close in on the 1,000 point career scoring mark with 34 points for the week to go with 31 rebounds. The 5-9 senior now has 980 points heading into Tuesday's game at LBC. She totaled 16 points and 13 rebounds against Maryland Baltimore County.

Also hitting in double digits was guard Caren Forbes with 40 points for the week.

Grapplers Start Strong in '85

By Tony Brzezicki

After a much needed break, the Longwood grapplers came back to face a tough week of dual meet and tournament action last week. The opposition was formidable but the Lancers met the challenge and had a productive week.

Longwood won two of three matches in a guadrangular meet at Hampden-Sydney Thursday and placed fourth out of six schools in the Liberty Baptist Tournament Friday-Saturday.

This week the Lancers will travel to Buies Creek, North Carolina for the Campbell Duals Friday and Saturday.

At Hampden-Sydney Thursday, Longwood finished with two wins and one loss while setting a new school record for highest score (55) and margin of victory (55-0) in a win over the University of the South. Coach Steve Nelson's team also pulled off an upset over previously unbeaten Lebanon Valley (9-0) with a 33-21 victory. Brown University handed longwood its only defeat 33-19.

Strong finishes from Steve Albeck, 2-0 at 142; Tommy Gilbert, 2-0 at 150; Tommy Eaves, 2-0 at 158-167; Bill Howard, 3-0 at 167-177 and Jesus Strauss, 3-0 at heavyweight helped the team get two wins.

Appalachian State finished first in the LBC tournament Friday and Saturday, followed by Franklin & Marshall, Liberty Baptist, Longwood, Salisbury State and North Carolina A&T. Lancer wrestlers placing in their divisions were Tim Fitzgerald, 4th, 2-2 at 118; Steve Albeck, 3rd, 3-1 at 142; Chuck Campbell, 2nd, 2-1 at 150; Tommy Eaves, 4th, 3-2 at 158, and Billy Howard, 4th, 2-2 at 167.

"We wrestled extremely well considering the high level of competition," said coach Nelson. "We lost some real close matches."

Dance Company Tryouts Begin

Beginning today, January 22, and running through January 24, the Longwood Company of Dancers will be holding tryouts for anyone interested in becoming a member. The actual company tryouts will be held on the 24th from 5:20 to 6:50, but the two practice sessions are highly suggested. Males are especially encouraged to attend.

Dance Company members, who meet Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays from 5:20 to 6:50, earn two credit hours per semester and will be involved in at least two master classes during the semester. The Company is also required to perform in the Spring Studio Concert being held April 25, 26, and 27.

If you are interested in trying out but you still have questions, please contact Mr. Nelson Neal, Gayle Arpe or any of the other Dance Company members.

English Professors Studied To Teach Bleak House

A four-day workshop was held at Longwood College recently for English faculty members whose freshman English students are reading a lengthy novel, Bleak House by Charles Dickens.

Under the pilot program, which is funded by a grant from the national Endowment for the Humanities, all students in English 101 are required to read and "know well" a major long novel. Teaching the work serially—as many literature classics were first published—encourages more thorough, lasting knowledge of the classics which have shaped Western culture, say the faculty involved in the program.

Students in 30 classes will read the 770-page Bleak House this semester. The novel will be taught in 20 installments, similar to the way in which it was originally published.

Twelve English faculty members attended the workshop, which was held on the campus Jan. 9, 10, 11 and 14. They discussed the content and themes of the novel, methods of teaching it, and the course itself, said Dr. Ellery Sedgwick, who is directing the program.

Dr. Michael Moore, from the history department of Appalachian State University, came to discuss the historical, social and cultural background of the novel.

Funding for the workshop was provided for in the grant, which expires in December. A similar three-day workshop will be held in August, said Dr. Sedgwick. Dr. Michael Lund: Dr. Donald Stuart, head of the English, Philosophy and Foreign Languages department; and Dr. Massie Stinson also are involved in the program.

English 101, a composition and literature course, is required of all four-year students at Longwood. Students will also be expected to study shorter works of literature and to sharpen their composition skills, in addition to reading Bleak House.

Dr. Ellery Sedgwick leads a discussion at the workshop. From left: Dr. William Frank, Dr. Massie Stinson and Dr. Michael Lund.

Faculty Evaluations To Be Improved

By David S. Areford

All of us have heard them—complaints—complaints about Dr. So and So and what he did or did not do in class, or about the grading of the midterm, or the papers he never returned, and on and on. The question is—Does anyone notice these things but us? And how and to whom can we vote our complaints?

According to the Longwood Faculty Handbook, "Department Heads will make an annual evaluation of the performance and contributions of individual faculty members..." Dr. Charles B. Vail, Interim Dean of the Faculty, concurs on this point. "I think it is important that the reviews be done on an annual basis even if there is no particular action to follow these reviews." Dr. Vail has been meeting with department heads with one objective being to improve the existing process of evaluation.

Faculty are also indirectly pushing for an improved system of evaluation as evidenced by a faculty proposal before the Board of Visitors that would have some salary increments money driven by performance appraisal rather than given across the board. And that would require an improved evaluation process.

Though the issue of salary, promotion, and tenure are important to evaluation, Dr. Vail's view of performance evaluation is "foremost to assist the instructor to be a better instructor, to improve on the performance as a professor and as a scholar."

Students also have a part in performance evaluation by filling out the course/instructor evaluation forms which are distributed at the end of each semester. In the past these forms were carried to the Registrar's office by a student where they would be kept until the professor turned in semester grades.

Last semester, these forms were taken to the Department Heads for safekeeping. Dr. Vail hopes that by the end of this semester the statistical results of these forms will be computerized. Thus only the statistical result will be seen by the instructor and not the individual forms. This will not only be a more efficient process but also a protection for the student.

The present policy is that faculty members are only "urged" to use these forms. But Dr. Vail says that it is in the faculty member's interest to use the forms and the statistical results. "Student views on their work are among the issues that one must consider in talking about tenure and promotion. And most faculty members work rather diligently to see that the file that is maintained on their work is as complete and up to date as possible.

Students can use these evaluation forms to express their views anonymously to their professors. But what about more serious complaints? The most direct channel for complaints concerning individaul professors is the Department Head. If the problem still cannot be solved, then it may reach the Dean of the Faculty. Dr. Vail warns that students must realize that often names must be used and the student cannot always be protected against negative reaction on the part of a faculty member.

Dr. Vail also says that the student must have "pretty solid evidence that the professor is failing in his responsibilities or being abusive of them."

Solid evidence includes: "failure to come to class, dismissing the class capriciously, using class time to talk about things that have no relevance to the course, failure to return test papers, inaccurate grading of test papers, and in any way abuse of the normal kind of relationship between professor and class or professor and the student."

Some students feel that their complaints will get nowhere because a faculty member has tenure. (The Faculty Handbook states that "an appointment with tenure is an appointment which is continuous and permanent in nature.") But Dr. Vail assures

Campus Pub Likely To Open In Fall

By Frank Raio

In response to the concern expressed by students over the delayed completion of the Student Rec Center, the Student Government Association sent representatives to discuss the matter with Phyllis Mable, Vice-President for Student Affairs. The delay has been caused, according to Mable, by the time-consuming bid system that the Virginia Legislature requires. State institutions must receive bids for all work contracted out. The physical plant is capable of building a stage or removing walls, but electrical work, for example must be bid on by private contractors. The lowest bid gets the contract. The bid system does add time to a project like the Student Rec Center. The time that will lapse between deciding on the style of the furniture to be used and the actual delivery of that furniture will be four months, which along with other delays will likely push the opening of the Student Center to August 1985. Original estimates had claimed that the Student Center would be open October 1984.

ARA designed the plans for the student center, which will be a part of the existing snack bar. The Student Rec Center will be operated by ARA. Beer will be served, regardless of the change in the drinking age.

The SGA representatives suggested to Mable that the blueprints and artist's conception of the Student Center be posted in Lankford; these drawings were put on display within the week and may be seen at the Student Recreation Center Site.

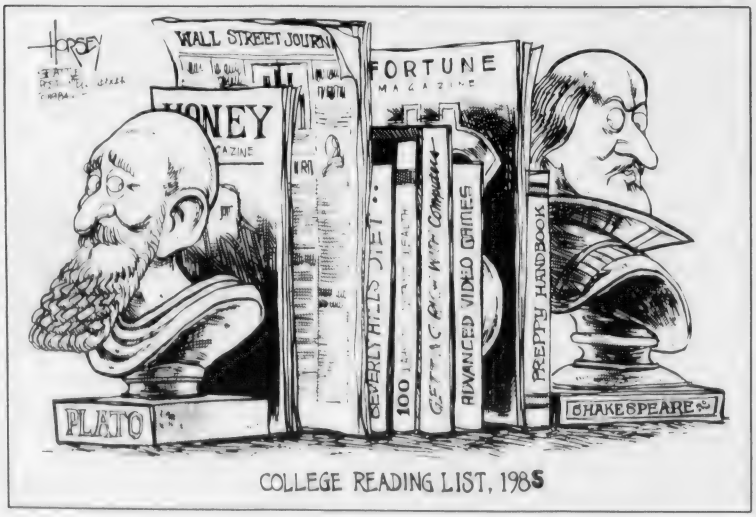
From A Sinking Ship. . . ?

These days, signing a contract to work in the Longwood College administration must be somewhat akin to playing Russian roulette six times in a row with the same pistol. Chances for success are mightly slim.

The mid-semester resignation of a Longwood Residence Education Coordinator hardly has students or faculty up in arms. It seems natural now; we've had plenty of experience with such matters. In the past two years, in fact, six RECs have quit their jobs, and the Longwood rumor mill predicts four current RECs will do the same by the time their contracts expire in August. Ho-hum.



It may be more interesting to note that, in those same two years, seven high level administrators have packed their bags to leave. At least two were asked to resign by President Greenwood for job-related gaffes, and others left without a look back, tired of an administration at times regarded as petty and difficult to work for.

The Greenwood Administration has a turnover rate approaching 25% annually (including RECs, excluding librarians in the composition of the administration), a record sure to make the Longwood contract a less-than-attractive offer to professional administrators.

The frequent use of 'interim' positions, which have too often slipped into lengthy appointments, is yet another problem which this administration must get a grip upon if it is to progress past its own problems to any permanent improvement for the College. The pretty speeches for the politicians and efficient p.r. only serve as tentative treatment for permanent problems.

If the image of Longwood as a "suitcase college" with weak academics is to be diminished, perhaps administrators should sell their own luggage before asking students to do so.

Objection to Vigilante Editorial

To the Editor:

The fear and terror of being assaulted is something no one understands until it has been experienced first hand. The helpless feeling as you lay there gazing at the sky, your body is numb and your throat is dry. You lay there forgotten and alone, will anyone hear when you draw your parting groan. What right does a person have to strip you of your life? What rights do you have to insure you don't get harassed time and time again.

If someone was assaulted on this campus they might go to the campus police; basically a futile effort. Would that person then become a hermit, locked away in a room until the semester is over? Would that person do what Bernard Goetz did, and carry on in life as usual; but prepared for the unexpected? Mr. Goetz experienced the terror of assault once before. Determined not to experience it again, he went to the police and was denied a gun license. Like many others before him, Goetz was turned back out to the streets to fend for himself. Millions of people in big cities like New York, Chicago, Washington and even Richmond are assaulted every year without the slightest hope of retribution.

On the 22nd day of December 1984, Bernard Goetz did something that over eight million people in New York were afraid to do. He knew the consequences of such an act but he still laid his promising future and life on the line. Granted, Goetz did not know that all four of these gentlemen had police records as long as their arms and were wielding razor sharp, filed down screwdrivers. But common sense dictates that if these subway rats wanted something, they had something to back themselves up with.

At the moment of confrontation the fear and terror welled up again. One journalist stated that Goetz's "inadequacies" made him pull the trigger. I fail to see where self preservation is an inadequacy.

Suppose Goetz "opened up his arms" pulled out his money roll and gave the kids five dollars. Would they have said thank you and went along their merry way? Come on, I doubt that I would have obliged in this situation, because a transit cop would have boarded the train at Chambers Street and found a rusted screwdriver stuck in between my "open arms". The loss of my life would have been so insignificant that it wouldn't even have made it to the 11 o'clock news.

Rocker Tickets Available

To the Editor:

The Student Union wishes to announce that Block tickets for Rockers will be available. We will be selling blocks of 20 tickets for $30.00 each (a savings of $10.00 a block) to any group of 20 students.

These tickets will go on sale the Tuesday morning prior to the event and will be sold until the day of the Rocker. They will be available in the Lankford Reception Office.

Also, many students do not realize that they are members of the Longwood Student Union. All students are members, and everyone is encouraged to attend our meetings on Monday nights at 6:15 in Lankford's Leadership Lounge.

Geist Celebrates Unity

On Wednesday, January 23, Geist, Longwood's honorary leadership fraternity, tapped seven juniors to assume the organization's weighty duties for the next two semesters. The ceremony was held in Lankford's Gold Room and was well attended by a reverent crowd. Geist's faithful president, Mary Beth Hart, opened the festivities with a warm welcoming statement after which a genuinely moving devotional was delivered by Eric Houseknecht. There were few dry eyes in the house as Houseknecht concluded. The mood having thus been set, the ball was kept rolling as the candles of integrity, humility, and intellect were lit. It was truly a momentous occasion; all present were stupefied with awe and devotion to the force of unity, Geist.

Named to replace Miss Hart as president of Geist was Vicki Bodin. Teresa Alvis became the new vice-president and Nancy Beane was tapped for the treasurer position. In addition, Joanie Reichart was named secretary, Beth Moore took the publicity chair position, and Denise Chilton and Lora Bleutge were named as co-Oktoberfest chairs. In a surprise decision, Geist elders did not tap Rotunda reporter Pablo Duke for an office. "Mortified," Duke was heard muttering as he walked away from the ceremony.

After the formal ceremonies, a reception was held, the highlight of which was the cutting of a large white cake from Terry's Bakery. The talk was jovial, the hot chocolate flowed, and a good time was had by one and all.

P.O.W.'s Remain In Captivity

by Mark Holland

With the arrival of most anniversaries there is usually a party of sorts, but today there can be no celebrating, no joyous partying to mark the anniversary that takes place. Fourteen years ago, on February 3, my father's cousin, Col. Robert L. Standerwick, was shot down in Laos during our "police action" there. Sunday he marked his five thousandth one hundred and tenth day in captivity.

During the Carter administration, fanatical Iranian youths seized the U.S. Embassy and captured 52 hostages. We, the American public, counted the days until their release and were amazed at our final tally of 444. It was inconceivable that anyone could endure captivity for so long. It hardly needs to be said that 444 days is a mere drop in the bucket compared with the five thousand days that Col. Standerwick has had to endure.

On that day in 1971 Standerwick and his partner Major Norbert Gotner were flying patrol in their F-4 when they were shot down over Laos. After parachuting into the jungle, both men made contact with search planes and Col. Standerwick reported that he was uninjured. The two men were able to fight their way through the jungle to within 30 yards of each other before Standerwick radioed that he was surrounded and had been hit. In the 1973 P.O.W. releases Major Gotner was released, Col. Standerwick was not. There have been no official reports of his whereabouts or physical condition but one intelligence report places him at the notorious Hoa Lo Prison. He has not spent any days as comfortably as the worst days the hostages in Iran endured.

The sad part of this entire study is that Standerwick is not alone. There are nearly 2,500 Americans still missing in Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. We know that of this number, 1289 were officially captured by the enemy; the others are perhaps dead, perhaps captive but unreported. The U. S. government must accept full blame for this odious situation. The botched Iranian hostage rescue mission cost taxpayers a reported 190 million dollars. The investigation of President Kennedy's assassination cost 5.4 million dollars and the investigation of Dr. Martin Luther Kings' assassination cost a reported 3 million. But to investigate the fate of the 2,500 men we sent to Vietnam and left behind, Congress has allocated the paltry sum of $350,000 which has not even been used. In 1980 a group of white men were seen working in a slave chain gang in Vietnam they shouted to the observers, "Tell the world about us!" The world was told and the U.S. government has refused to act.

One might wonder who these men are that we have turned our backs on. They fall into several groups. One group is composed of CIA men, pilots and Green Berets. These men were specialists, experts at their work and it is thought that they were singled out by the Vietnamese for their specialized training. Another group is composed of the stubborn, strong willed men who would not buckle under to their Vietnamese captors. Theirs is the ultimate punishment for disobedience. A third group is thought to be comprised of those who have been crippled or maimed. None of the 591 prisoners released in 1973 was maimed in any way. These men had ejected at high speeds from exploding jets, fallen through enemy fire and parachuted into the jungle. Yet not one had managed to lose an arm or a leg or even an eye or finger in the process. This defies all reason and it is thought that the Vietnamese do not wish to return those who are living proof of the horrors of wars. There are also those who were maimed in the process of interrogation. The Vietnames would in no way want to return to America such evidence of their horrible torture tactics.

So on this fourteenth anniversary I do not celebrate, I do not even mourn, I must say that I do not even hope—that was lost somewhere back in childhood—I merely sit, wait and try to "tell the world".

Student Activism Reborn

by Russell King

Berkeley's Sproul Plaza reverberated with the sounds of student agitation as 4,000 listened to speakers address American military intervention in a tiny Third World nation.

A memory of 1964? No, an event of 1984.

The image of today's campuses as havens for apathetic, self-centered, glorified vocational students has suddenly lost its ring of truth.

"It's a myth that students are apolitical," says Sara McDonnell, a U. of Minnesota student. "There's been about a 10-year lull, but things are beginning to pick up now."

In fact, student organizers from both the Left and the Right are reporting dramatic increases of on-campus support, and student newspapers are reporting a sudden outburst of activity on the issues of U.S. involvement in Central America, U.S. investments in South Africa and the nuclear arms race.

During the first half of this school year, students on campuses across the nation held demonstrations either promoting or protesting U.S. involvement in Central America. At the U. of Colorado-Boulder, 50 students, celebrating the anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Grenada, were met by 1,500 demonstrators.

"There is a lot of activity on a number of political fronts," Josh Nessen of the American Committee on Africa says. "Students are generally active and concerned about making changes in the U.S."

In what is perhaps the strongest campus movement of the 80s, student pressure has contributed to the divestiture of stock in South African companies by more than 40 colleges and universities, including Yale and CUNY this year.

A powerful student outcry for divestment has developed this fall. At the U. of Kansas, for example, students threatened to sue the administration if it overturned their referendum calling for the Student Senate to sever ties with companies that do business with South Africa.

According to Henry Atkins, of the Central America Emergency Coalition of Central Jersey, more than 1,000 students attended an anti-apartheid rally at Rutgers. "There is a great deal of student support for the causes of Central America, South Africa and the nuclear freeze proposal," Atkins says.

"It is absolutely not true that student political activity is dead," Jamey Wheeler of the Young Conservative Alliance says. "Students are sick and tired of the U.S. being pushed around."

The nuclear arms race has sparked student activism on myriad campuses in the form of debates, demonstrations; die-ins, workshops, films and symbolic suicide referendums.

Sanford Gottlieb of the United Campuses to Prevent Nuclear War says that while "students are more conservative on economic issues...they are moderate to liberal on social issues and more dovish, and more open to new ideas, on foreign policy than the rest of the country."

Cited as proof that today's students are conservatives is the fact that 58% of voters aged 18-29 supported Reagan at the polls, but a CBS/New York Times survey found that lumping all young adults together inaccurately reflects student opinion.

Campus-based, pre-election polls gave Mondale the lead in the Ivy League, the U. of California system and at the U. of Virginia. Polls also found that 81% of Ivy League students support abortion rights, 70% favor a nuclear freeze and 68% find the increasing role of religious leaders in politics dangerous.

An NBC News exit poll found that 56% of all student voters support abortion rights and 59% support a nuclear freeze.

While the widely-proclaimed conservatism of today's college students has been largely overestimated, the distinctive feature of today's activism is a stronger right-wing minority.

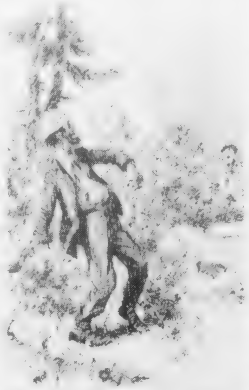
Sporting Art On Exhibit In Bedford

The lure of fields, forests, and streams—and of the creatures that inhabit them—is the theme of the Longwood Fine Arts Center's major exhibition for 1985.

America: A Sporting View, a collection of some 50 oil and watercolor paintings and drawings, is on display in Bedford Gallery on the Longwood College campus through March 3.



The exhibition traces the development of American sporting art—from the mid-18th century when the killing of game and netting of fish had become a sport rather than a necessity for survival to the present time when conservation and preservation are of major importance to American sportsmen.

The works on exhibit were selected by guest curator Robert B. Mayo, of Gallery Mayo in Richmond. They are on loan from private collectors in Virginia, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Rhode Island.

The paintings and drawings depict the teamwork of hunter and dog, the flight of ducks or geese against a wintry sky, still life renderings of game animals and fish, and works that are "an historical record of life afield" in the Adirondacks, the marshes around Chesapeake Bay, on the Western plains, and other locales.

Among the artists represented are Frederic Rondel, Arthur Fitzwilliam Tait, Arthur Burdett Frost, Susan C. Waters, Robert Sully, Russell Smith, Ogden Minton Pleissner, Percival Rosseau, Frank W. Benson, and Walter Clark.

Frost developed "his own style of homespun art with hunting and fishing as his subject matter," Mayo said. "His country characters and city gentlemen were painted enjoying the varied aspects of sporting life." Frost illustrated many books, including Uncle Remus.

Pen-and-Ink drawing by Arthur B. Frost (1851-1928).

At the turn of the century, a group of illustrators known as the Brandywine School developed a style that emphasized "realism and a sense of capturing the moment." The Attack by Frank Stick and Trap Shooting by Samuel Abbott are representative of the Brandywine School, a style that continues to influence illustration and sporting art. Stick's illustrations appeared in Harper's, Life, The Saturday Evening Post, and in books by Zane Grey and others.

The conservation and preservation movements of the 20th century have provided both inspiration and market for what Mayo calls "the first true school of American wildlife artists." These artists depict "wildlife in its natural environment and the sportsman in action.... in high realism and set in natural surroundings."

This exhibit is the ninth in a series, sponsored by the Longwood Fine Arts Center, that emphasizes the diversity in American art. Previous exhibits have featured the works of 19th-century portraitist Thomas Sully and some of his contemporaries; paintings and sculpture inspired by cowboys, Indians, and the landscapes and wildlife of the American West; paintings by folk artist Susan C. Waters; a collection of works by Lue Osborne and Cordray Simmons, early 20th-century artists who pioneered in developing the acrylic paints used by today's artists; paintings focusing on the sea and ships; and examples of American illustration during the period from 1880 to 1940.

Judicial Update

Beginning the fall semester of 1985, the Dean of Students' office tabulated information regarding student involvement in the disciplinary system at Longwood. The information has been summarized for campus distribution.

As one might expect, the majority of cases (78%) involved males and 70% involved freshmen students. Cases were generated primarily by residence hall staff (92%) and in 73% of the reported cases, the student did not have a previous formal involvement with the disciplinary system.

The nature of misconduct was representative of the general concerns expressed by students and staff. Visitation and noise violations were the highest (45 cases each) followed by the safety violations, vandalism/damage, violation of alcohol policy, and theft.

The disposition of a case can be a combination of actions, which are based upon prior experiences and the nature of the incident. The following represents the number of each action taken: written warnings (73), educational tasks (53), verbal warning (34), dismissal of case (18), disciplinary probation (15), suspension of privilege (9), remuneration (9), and hall/room change (1).

Of primary concern on a college campus is the number of cases determined to be alcohol related. Alcohol was deemed a contributory factor in 34% of the cases fall semester.

Additional information about the judicial process is available by contacting Anne Barsanti or Ric Weibl at the Dean of Students Office (392-9221).

Dedicated To Elizabeth Young
In memory of her father:

Near shady wall a rose once grew,
Budded and blossomed in God's free light,
Watered and fed by morning dew,
Shedding its sweetness day and night.

As it grew and blossomed fair and tall,
Slowly rising to loftier height,
It came to a crevice in the wall,
Through which there shone a beam of light.

Onward it crept with added strength,
With never a thought of fear or pride;
It followed the light through the crevice-length
And unfolded itself on the other side.

The light, the dew, the broadening view,
Were found the same as they were before;
And it lost itself in beauties new,
Breathing its fragrance more and more.

Shall claim of death cause us to grieve
And make our courage faint of fall?
Nay, let us faith and hope receive,
The rose still grows beyond the wall.

Scattering fragrance far and wide,
Just as it did in days of yore;
Just as it did on the other side,
Just as it will forevermore.

STUDENTS RAISED THEIR OWN FEES to help finance a library expansion program at the Univeristy of Mississippi. The $5 fee hike, approved by the Associated Student Body and accompanied by a supportive student petition with 2000 signatures, was presented to the state College Board for approval.

GOOD GRADES IN ENGLISH are the best predictor of college success, says Louisiana Tech U. registrar Harold Pace. English courses provide good preparation for high-tech jobs because they teach logic, as well as good grammar. And almost every job requires good communication skills.

THE UGLIEST COLLEGE STUDENTS in the country met recently and, to no one's surprise, like each other very much. Bruce Morgan of Indiana U. of Pennsylvania and Katie Neidhold of the U. of Alaska-Fairbanks were cheered by 600 IUP students at the school's fieldhouse. The two were brought together after winning "ugly" contests on their campuses, which were, in turn, named by Lisa Birbach as having the ugliest men and women in the country.

NORTH CAROLINA'S POPULATION SKYROCKETS TO 250 MILLION. More than 90 percent of 1,875 U. North Carolina students flunked a geography test, some estimating their state population anywhere from 25,000 to 250 million. Less than half the students recognized Alaska and Texas as the largest states. The exam was given "not expressly to embarrass North Carolinians or to indict our educational system, but to link our state with the nationwide deficiency in geographic training," says UNC-Chapel Hill Geography chairman Richard Kopec.

WHAT USE IS A STUDENT SENATE? The U. of Utah Senate tried to answer that question after its November meeting was cancelled because there was nothing to discuss. Some student senators suggested the body be dissolved if it cannot justify its existence. An ad hoc committee was formed to probe the problem.

TO MAKE THEATRE more accessible to students and to enliven classroom lectures, a group of Cornell U. students are now performing in class. Theatre in the Classroom, a new Theatre Cornell program, dramatizes academic material, using both theatre and non-theatre students as performers. The group's first project depicted Appalachian women at work for a Design and Environmental Analysis class.

THEY HAVE NEW WAYS TO BOMB EXAMS at the U. of Connecticut. Police there are disturbed by a rash of bomb scares, apparently called in by students trying to avoid exams. The police are checking class lists to track down the anonymous callers. The bomb threat calls have been higher this fall than in the past two years. No bombs have been found.

FIGHTING PRE-PROFESSIONALISM is the goal of a new student group at the U. of Pennsylvania. The group is printing a new course catalog which includes information about professors, types of readings, prerequisites and workload in an attempt to broaden education by drawing students to courses they would not ordinarily take.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES: The Student Senate at the U. of Southern California unanimously passed a resolution to change one line of the USC fight song from "Our men fight on to victory" to "Our teams fight on to victory." The change was made to recognize, and focus more attention on, women's athletics.

YALE U. STUDENTS WANT MORE SEX, according to a non-scientific survey there. Seventy-four per cent would like more sex in their lives, although 81 per cent already consider themselves "somewhat" to "very" sexually active. The survey was conducted by the Alliance for Sexual Progress, a student group promoting more open discussion of human sexuality. At Duke U., meanwhile, a study by the Peer Information Service for Counseling and Education in Sexuality found students think there's more sexual activity on campus than there actually is.

"HAVE SEX WITH A SENATOR WEEK" won't take place at Northern Illinois U. this year, but it isn't for lack of effort by the Student Association senate. It unanimously passed a resolution creating the special week at the beginning of winter semester, but the SA President vetoed the resolution, saying it was nonsense.

THE STAGE IS SET FOR THEATRE ARTS to flourish at Princeton U. thanks to a new student-managed organization dedicated to support of the arts. The group of students and faculty hope to take over the more mundane tasks such as fundraising and advertising and thus free campus theatre groups for more creative pursuits.

Finnish Instructor Teaching at Longwood

By Kent Booty

Erkki Tervo must have felt right at home.

Tervo, a gymnastics instructor from Finland who is teaching at Longwood College this semester, wasn't overly concerned when Farmville's temperature dipped below zero on Jan. 21.

"It is colder than this now in Finland, but not as windy," he said on that record-breaking Monday. "If this is the coldest day of the year, then it is not so cold for us. If we had to close the schools whenever it dropped below zero, they would be closed three or four months every winter."

When he left Finland on Jan. 10, the temperature there was -37 Celsius, which is -34 Fahrenheit. "We are used to cold weather. We just put more clothes on."

Tervo, 41, is here under a partnership between Longwood and the University of Jyvaskyla, where he has taught since 1975. Longwood received a $50,000 partnership grant from the U.S. Information Agency in 1983 to develop an exchange program over a three-year period.

Three members of Longwood's physical education faculty—Dr. Bette Harris, Dr. Nancy Andrews and Ruth Budd—have each taught at Jyvaskyla for one semester. Ilkka Keskinen, a swimming instructor from Jyvaskyla, taught at Longwood last semester.

Tervo—considered one of Finland's top authorities on gymnastics—is teaching two gymnastics classes in the Health, Physical Education and Recreation department, and also is helping Coach Budd with the women's gymnastics team. His wife, Tuula, a physician, and their two children accompanied him.

Tervo has been pleasantly surprised by the hospitality of his American hosts. "I've been amazed at how friendly and open the people are. We have had a lot of guests in our home so far. People have brought us food and helped us."

Jyvaskyla is the only university in Finland that offers degrees in physical education and related fields. Almost all of Tervo's students will become physical education teachers. Under a new program he organized, the university is also training future gymnastics coaches. Last semester, Budd worked with three advanced students in this program, in addition to teaching there.

Tervo is active in the International University Sports Federation, which has about 100 member-nations, including the U.S. He is a member of the organization's Executive Committee. The 21-member committee meets about three times a year in various countries.

In 1974, Tervo was president of the organizing committee for the International University Sport Congress, held near Helsinki, Finland. In 1978, he was president of the organizing committee for the first University World Championships of orienteering, held at the university. Orienteering, popular in Scandinavia, is a sport that uses maps and compasses to reach designated locations. In 1982, he was president of the organizing committee for the university World Championships of judo, also held at the university.

Through the Federation, Tervo has traveled to about 25 nations in Western and Eastern Europe, North and South America, and Asia. He has been to the Soviet Union three times, visited most of the Iron Curtain countries and was in Iran "just before the revolution." Tervo was an invited guest at the 1984 Winter Olympics in Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, and attended the inauguration of the 1988 Olympic Stadium in Seoul, South Korea, last October.

The Finnish people like sports: most stayed up to watch the Summer Olympics, which were broadcast live every night from midnight to 5 a.m., said Tervo.

In the first half of the 20th century, gymnastics in Finland was "one of the best (programs) in the world." Then, due to foreign competition and outdated facilities, it gradually declined. Beginning in the late 1970s, there has been a resurgence in Finnish gymnastics, aided by upgraded facilities and renewed interest, he said. Tervo is president of a national commission that was created in 1982 to improve gymnastics facilities.

Gymnastics is part of the physical education program in primary school and high school in Finland. All students at Jyvaskyla must take six semesters of gymnastics. "Finns believe that all other sports are an outgrowth of gymnastics," said Budd.

Five years ago, Tervo founded the Jyvaskyla Gymnastics Club, which trains 200 gymnasts between the ages of 15 and 18. He is in charge of the coaching there. Gymnasts from the club won five medals at the National Championships, he said.

Tervo was born and reared in Tornio, a small town in northern Finland near the Swedish border.

Finns can be found playing outdoors on cold winter days, but even they have their limits. "I can remember it being as cold as -51 C (-62 F). Now, that's cold," said Tervo.

Faculty Evaluations

that tenure is not a license for misconduct.

"The purposes of tenure, historically, have been to provide protection to the faculty member in his pursuit of what is referred to as 'academic freedom'." It protects the individual "from particular biases that relate to economic, political or social issues—even scholarly issues." It protects the right of the professor to have opinions concerning these issues and protects him from those who might take action against him because of a certain ideological stance.

The awarding of tenure is a sign of respect on the part of fellow faculty members and the college. "By the time you reach the point of tenure the faculty should be convinced that the person deserves to be a part of the Longwood community."

In terms of evaluation, Dr. Vail does point out that the tenured professor "is not subject each year, or in every other year as in some cases, to review for whether or not he will be retained in the faculty." But these professors are still evaluated annually for salary and promotion purposes and student complaints concerning them are still investigated.

Dr. Vail assures that the evaluation of faculty is an improving process, whether it is done by Department Heads or through student evaluation. Also, he makes clear that "all complaints deserve examination."

Reagan Attempt To Drop Ed Department Thwarted

By Susan Skorupa
and Chuck Sade

The Reagan administration's latest budget-cutting attempt to abolish the Department of Education is drawing protest from many of the same educators who strongly opposed the department's creation nearly six years ago.

They've changed their minds despite watching some of their worst fears about the department come true since 1980.

Congress, however, hasn't shown much interest in approving presidential advisor Edwin Meese's new effort to dismantle the department.

Congress killed the administration's last effort to junk the department in 1981.

But many educators still fear Reagan's animosity toward the department, restated the same week he nominated William J. Bennett to become the new secretary of education, could diminish its effectiveness.

"I'm afraid the department's functions will fall between the cracks," says H. Roy Hoops, president of South Dakota State University. "I don't trust Reagan's motives in this circumstance."

Conservatives long have opposed centralizing education programs into one department, arguing it would increase federal interference in schools.

Until the Dept. of Education opened in 1980, education programs were administered by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW).

Just a week before President Jimmy Carter signed the bill creating the department in October, 1979, Texas Congressman Ron Paul sponsored the first proposal to abolish the department.

Some educators also opposed creating the department, fretting it would isolate education politically and make it a convenient target for budget-cutters and opponents of federal education programs.

Many of those fears, of course, have been realized since then. Yet even some of the department's staunchest opponents have changed their tunes.

"I was opposed to the move to a department," Hoops recalls. "Now I'm equally concerned about dismantling the department."

"The department deserves cabinet-level status although, originally, we were worried that (separating education from HEW) would bring it under attack from the right-wing, which has happened under the Reagan administration," says Scott Widmeyer of the American Federation of Teachers.

"From the administrative point of view, it may be okay to lose a cabinet-level office," adds President J. William Wenrich of Michigan's Ferris State College. "But it's important that education have the primary focus and prestige of a department."

"The U.S. needs an education department to assure that major national policy decisions involving education are discussed at the highest level of government," explains Charles Saunders of the American Council on Education (ACE). "Without such a department, education officials tend to get shut out."

Saunders remembers that during the HEW days President Ford proposed eliminating major federal education benefits.

But when Saunders called Terrel Bell, then HEW's commissioner of education, to find out about the radical plan, Bell said, "Gee, I'd never heard of that," Saunders laughs.

Saunders, though, remains ambivalent about keeping the department. "Some days I think the U.S. doesn't need one. It depends on how I wake up in the morning, though ultimately it's better to have one than not."

"I support the department at the current cabinet level because it provides an advocacy role lacking were the government not to exist as at present," affirms W. Ray Heardon, president of Moorpark (Cal.) Community College.

Heardon worries the administration's plan to give federal education programs to other cabinet departments would make education "a step-child to each area with no major status."

"These departments were established with other functions in mind," he continues. "They can handle the technical aspects, but education isn't a major part of their responsibilities."

Even now, "education is not of parallel importance with other cabinet departments," South Dakota's Hoops laments. "The federal government doesn't define its responsibility. So no one knows what the government does in education."

Adequate definitions or not, it may be too late to abolish the department, Moorpark's Heardon notes.

"If Reagan wanted to abolish the department, he should have done it at the beginning of the first term," he says. "Now the department is too well entrenched. Bureaucracy doesn't evaporate. It perpetuates itself and expands."

And some educators, particularly from private schools, still aren't sure it should be perpetuated.

"The involvement of government has gone so far in our schools, I can see the merit in dismantling the education department," states Robert T. Craig, president of Tennessee's Union University.

Craig notes private schools like Union depend less on federal aid than public institutions.

"We need to pay more attention to life on campus," he stresses. "And I doubt more centralized efforts will help. The wisdom of more bureaucracy is not clear to me."

Marketing Program Improves

By Laurie Pool

Enhancing, persuading and pleasing are all activities involved in marketing that give any person, organization, service or product the competitive edge. A large majority of people do not understand exactly what marketing entails. Therefore, their chance to excel ahead of others when competing for a job or promoting a product, service or idea is lost.

A group of Longwood students recently installed a chapter of the American Marketing Association (AMA) under the guidance of Professor Burt Brooks. The AMA's goal is to familiarize any interested students, regardless of major, to the many aspects of marketing as it is a fast-growing area of concern in all organizations.

In addition to chapter meetings at Longwood, the club participates in monthly meetings of the Richmond Professional Chapter where well-established business leaders speak to and encourage AMA members. The AMA collegiate conference will be held in New Orleans, LA, April 4-6, 1985. Longwood's chapter is also planning other programs for the coming year.

All interested students are welcome to attend the AMA meetings. See Burt Brooks for information on joining Longwood's AMA chapter.

Broadsides Offers Writing Outlet

Broadsides, a campus-wide publication for student expository, is intended to be an outlet for all Longwood students' writing. The faculty members composing the Broadsides committee are Dr. Craig Challender, Dr. David James and Mr. Bill Woods. They will review all materials submitted for publication.

Likely submissions may be anything from poetry written for a Creative Writing class to a critical essay on Adam Smith written for Econ 200. The Broadsides will first be published on Friday, February 15, and later in March and April. All student submissions will be appreciated.

A $200 first prize and three $100 honorable mentions will be awarded by April 30, 1985. Further information, contact Challender, James, or Woods in the Department of English, Philosophy and Foreign Languages.

Holmes Leads the Way to Mount St. Mary's Upset

Senior Florence Holmes and sophomore Melanie Lee scored 12 of Longwood's 17 points in the second overtime Saturday afternoon, leading the Lady Lancers to an exciting 99-94 double overtime win over Mount St. Mary's, the 10th ranked team in NCAA Divison II women's basketball.

In a game that has to rank as one of Longwood's all-time biggest wins, Holmes scored 26 points, hit 10 of 10 free throws and added eight rebounds, seven assists and four blocked shots. Lee scored a career-high 23 points, grabbed 11 boards and hit 10-14 shots.

It was in the second overtime that Lee and Holmes did the most damage to the 15-3 Mount St. Mary's squad. With 2:06 remaining and the score tied 88-88, Lee scored inside on a feed from Valerie Turner to put Longwood up 90-88. At the 1:14 mark Holmes converted both ends of a one-and-one for a 92-88 edge. The Mount never got closer than three after that.

Lee scored seven points in the second extra period and Holmes dropped in five free throws in five attempts to key the victory. The 99 points Longwood scored was a new school record, breaking the previous mark of 97 set in 1980-81 (97-44 over St. Mary's).

Now 9-9 and 1-3 in Mason-Dixon Conference play, the Lady Lancers visit Randolph-Macon Wednesday, host Liberty Baptist Friday at 7:30 in an MDAC game and face second ranked Hampton Institute Saturday night in Lancer Hall at 7:30.

Nanette Fisher celebrates win over Mt. St. Mary's.

Super Win

Longwood Coach Shirley Duncan had one word for Saturday's double overtime victory. "Super!"

"It was a real big win for us," said the coach. "It's probably the biggest win we've had this season. Our defensive intensity and patience on offense when we needed to be were keys to the win."

"We thought that Mount St. Mary's was beatable," said Duncan. "Nanette (Fisher) and I saw them play at Liberty Baptist Friday night. We're capable team but we must play with intensity."

The Lady Lancers led 42-31 at the half and 61-47 with 12:25 left, but The Mount rallied to force overtime at 72-72. The first overtime ended 82-82, setting the stage for Holmes' and Lee's heroics. For the Mount, guard Shaun Jackson scored 30 and center Lisa Green 22.

Holmes moved into third place on Longwood's all-time scoring list with a 73-point week.

IAA Update

By Michael Harris

Longwood's Intramural Athletic Association is rolling on a fast pace this semester with sports such as basketball, ping-pong, and bowling.

Quarterfinals for men's basketball begins on Monday, Feb. 4 with the finals in the competition being held sometime next week.

Women's basketball begins on Tuesday, Feb. 5 with nine teams competing, four of them in the A League and five of them in the B League.

Women's ping-pong is underway with six participants vying for the championship.

TNT was the winner of the cold weekend bowling tournament held on the 26th and 27th of January.

Entry blanks for men's ping-pong are due on Monday, Feb. 4 with a captain's meeting at 6:30.

Coed innertube water polo will have a captain's meeting at 6:30 on Feb. 7 with entry blanks due at that time.

Entry blanks are due on Feb. 6 for Spades, Backgammon, or Chess (your choice) which is being held on the weekend of Feb. 9 and 10. A captain's meeting will be held at 6:30 on Feb. 6.

Albeck Named Player of the Week

Senior Steve Albeck is having a banner final season with the Longwood wrestling team. The 142-pounder won all three of his matches at the Campbell Duals (Jan. 25-26) and for his performance, Albeck has been selected as the Longwood College Player of the Week for the period January 25-February 1. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

"Albeck is wrestling extremely well right now," said Coach Steve Nelson. "He is getting back close to the form he had as a sophomore when he finished third in the Eastern Regional Tournament. Steve has gone down to 142 pounds from 150 and he's really working hard."

Now 14-3-0 overall and 9-1-0 in dual matches, Albeck is wrestling well despite a sore shoulder. The effects of a first semester injury have kept him from being 100 per cent physically, but he has run up a 10-1 mark in second semester action.

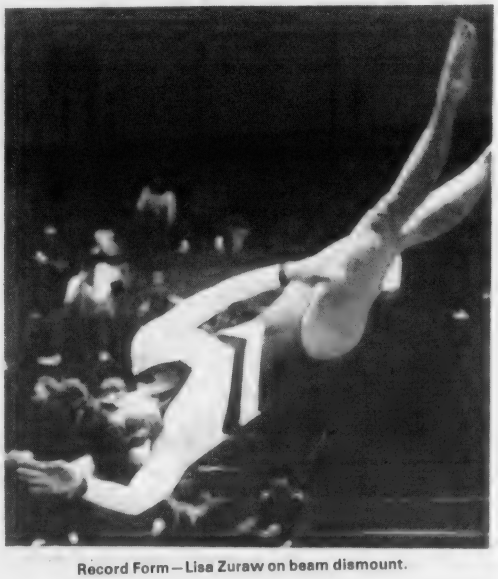
Albeck beat three tough opponents at the Campbell Duals. He decisioned Fuller of The Citadel 7-4, Bobbitt of Campbell 2-1 and Marks of Pembroke State 9-1.

Longwood's all-time career wrestling leader, Albeck has a four-year record of 59-27-2. Except for the fact that he sat out most of last season, Albeck would have more than 70 career wins. Junior Tim Fitzgerald is second on the all-time list at 51-28-1 and Joe Bass who finished in 1983 was 48-25-0.

Albeck, who now calls Annandale, VA home, is a graduate of West Springfield High School.

Zuraw Breaks School Floor Record

By Jim Winkler



Friday night the Longwood gymnastics team scored its highest mark ever (164.05) and finished second in a four-team meet at Lancer Hall.

Division I Auburn won the competition scoring 169.15, while Georgia College (150.8) and James Madison (132.30) finished third and fourth respectively.

Longwood had the top team score in floor competition (44.55) as five Lancer gymnasts finished among the top seven competitors. Junior Lisa Zuraw led the way, winning the event and setting a new school record as well (9.4). The previous mark was 9.2, set by Kelly Strayer a year ago. Strayer finished second in the event scoring 9.1, with Kerri Hruby and Dayna Hankinson tying for fifth with 8.7.

Senior Dayna Hankinson led Longwood in all-around once again. Her scores resembled those she was earning her freshman year when she was named All-American. As well as finishing fifth on floor Hankinson placed third on beam (8.65) and fourth in all-around (33.50). The senior had good scores on vault and beam as well, scoring 8.25 and 7.9 respectively.

"Dayna had a very good meet," said Longwood Coach Ruth Budd. "She performed well on all events and was the only Longwood gymnast able to stay on beam."

Record Form—Lisa Zuraw on beam dismount.

Grapplers Second In Tiger- Lancer Duals Tournament

The Longwood wrestling team finished second in the Tiger-Lancer Duals Tournament Friday and Saturday at Hampden-Sydney College. Out of eight tough teams in the tournament, Virginia Military emerged as the champ.

Trailing Longwood in third place was Virginia Tech. Pembroke State was fourth, followed by Newport News Apprentice, Salisbury State, Hampden-Sydney and Ferrum. Longwood also finished second in last year's tournament.

This week Longwood hosts Virginia State and Newport News Tuesday at 6:00, travels to Lynchburg Wednesday to take on the Hornets and H-SC and Saturday the Lancers host always tough Washington and Lee at 1:30.

Longwood fell to VMI 50-3 in Saturday afternoon's Tiger-Lancer championship match. The Lancers defeated Newport News 31-24 Friday and Salisbury State 30-23 Saturday morning to get to the finals.

Steve Albeck at 142 had an excellent tournament and finished with a 2-0 record. He suffered a rib injury in the Salisbury State match. Pete Whitman at 134, Billy Howard at 167 and Tim Fitzgerald at 118 ended up with a record of 2-1 in the event.

While Longwood's dual match record is 5-9, six of those nine losses have come at the hands of Division I foes.

Lancers Face Test On the Road

Starting with a trip to Randolph-Macon Monday night and ending with a journey to Lynchburg to take on Liberty Baptist Saturday night, the Longwood men's basketball team faces a rugged week of Mason-Dixon Conference action.

The Lancers, now 7-12 overall and 1-4 in MDAC games, could not match up with a talented Mount St. Mary's team Saturday night in Lancer Hall and fell by a 70-46 score. The defeat was the Lancers' worst ever in Lancer Hall.

With the Mason-Dixon Conference Tournament looming on the horizon February 28-March 2 in Lancer Hall, Longwood's remaining seven games are crucial if the team hopes to have momentum heading into the tournament.

Next week the Lancers host Maryland Baltimore County Monday and Pittsburgh-Johnstown Saturday. Home games with Mary Washington (Feb. 18) and Atlantic Christian (Feb. 20) and a trip to the Mount (Feb. 23) close out the regular season.

Longwood played the Mount even for most of the first half Saturday night. Sparked by the shooting of David Strothers, Longwood trailed just 20-18 with seven minutes left in the half. MSM led 30-20 at the half and pulled away late in the second half, outscoring Longwood 14-6 in the last five minutes of the game.

Strothers scored 13 points, Lonnie Lewis 10 and freshman Boudewijn van Beest had 10 points and seven rebounds. Thirty-three per cent shooting doomed any chance of a Longwood win against the Mount, 17-1 and ranked fifth in Division II. MSM hit 57 per cent of its shots, getting 18 points from guard Mark Scallion and 12 from forward Neal Craig. Craig killed Longwood early with 10 points in the game's first 10 minutes.

Lancer Frank Tennyson gets hacked by Mt. St. Mary's Mike Walker in Saturday night basketball action.

Colleges Still Hinder Black Student Success

Although black collegians set higher degree goals than do their white counterparts, they do not succeed as often or as rapidly, according to a new report sponsored by the Ford and Southern Education foundations.

The report, entitled "The Causes and Consequences of College Students' Performance," found that white students have a B grade average while black students are between B- and C+. The report also found that 55.7% of black students drop out of college compared with 38.4% of white students, and that black students take an average of one term longer to graduate.

Black students experience more discrimination and "interfering problems" and white students are more satisfied with campus life and are better off financially.

The researchers concluded that, "Universities need to take specific, long-term measures to assist black students to improve their retention rates, progression rates and college grade point averages."

Further, the "qualitative aspects" of college desegregation must be addressed. Michael Nettles, of the Educational Research Service, describes "qualitative aspects" as the accessibility and quality of relationships with the faculty; social aspects of campus life; and the benefit of college experience as measured by GPAs, graduate admission, and the value of a college education in the labor market.

"The quantitative aspects, the increasing numbers of minority students attending previously segregated colleges and white students going to black colleges, are very important," he says. "These represent equality of opportunity, but the qualitative aspects represent the equality of performance."

Racial and financial barriers hindering black students are compounded, the study found, by less than adequate preparation for college in high school. On average, white students have higher SAT scores and better grades in high school.

The report points out that these differences in college performance vary with the type of institution and according to which race is in the minority. For instance, 80% of white students in black public colleges drop out over a four-year period compared to only 60% for blacks. Thus, "minority status rather than race per se may account for some of the racial differences observed," say researchers. Of the black students in the study sample, 55% were in the minority on campus, compared with 12.3% of the white students.

WUTA Maintains The Void

By Michele Williams and Lori Foster

If you've passed Longwood's radio station (90.1 on your FM dial) and received nothing but static lately, be prepared to wait awhile longer. WUTA, as the station is known, has been out of operation for nearly a year. This fact is attributed mainly to the conduct of its previous student administration, which, in the words of Moffett Evans, Director of the Dramatic Arts and Speech Department, gave the radio station a bad reputation and lacked total respect for the facility.

More recently, however, delays have fallen into the hands of current President, Kevin Sneed, who previously wanted to move the station out of Jarman and into a new facility in Lankford. It seems now that such a move is out of the question due to the high costs involved. "We have decided to stay in Jarman," said Sneed. "The bureaucratic red tape and the lack of funds would cause a two-year delay in the station's opening."

Despite the set-backs caused by the previous administration, Sneed and Evans seem to be working out their differences, at least on a professional basis, in order to get the operation of WUTA underway. Evans, who previously, stated that he had no problems with a radio station in Jarman, as long as it was run in a professional manner, seems to like Sneed's idea of educational radio. In fact, the two are working together in order to purchase a new sound mixer—that will probably run somewhere between $500 and $1000— as well as new microphones, albums, and other additional equipment.

With these issues settled, the only thing that stands in the way of the station's opening, is an official "go ahead" to begin training any new students interested in working with the station, and the programming of various shows. The station is currently planning to operate 56 hours a week featuring classical, jazz, and country music, as well as educational radio featuring a literature or poetry hour, a student/faculty interview show, and a "Meet the President" hour with Janet Greenwood.

In order to avoid what happened with last year's administration, the new members of WUTA have decided to break down the line of authority. "We're recommending committees," says Gustav Sallas, who had his own progressive rock show last year, "so that all of the power and decision-making that is involved in running the station, is not lowered on any one individual's shoulders." It was decided, however, to retain the present administration until new elections could be held.

In the meantime, anyone currently maintaining a 2.0 grade point average is encouraged to attend training programs conducted by the WUTA staff to become familiar with the station's operations. For those who are just content with listening. . . Hold on, it won't be too long now.

Evans Designs Set For Twelfth Night

By Pablo Duke

Among the challenges of performing Shakespeare for the modern audience is that of set design, explains Moffett Evans, Set Designer for Twelfth Night, a Shakespearian comedy currently being co-produced by Longwood and Hampden-Sydney Colleges.

"Trying to put Shakespeare on a stage with enough scenery to get the message across and not so much that it clutters the stage is the idea," said Evans, who built a highly-detailed model of the Twelfth Night set before drawing blueprints of the set which will be used in performances at Hampden-Sydney's John's Auditorium as well as at Longwood's Jarman Auditorium.

The set calls for two houses at either side of the stage, the first is that of Orsino, a love-sick duke, and the second is that of Olivia, a beautiful countess. Designer Evans creates a clear distinction between the two houses, giving the house of Orsino a "definite Tudor image" and the house of Olivia an architectural design similar to that of the Italian Renaissance period.

"It's more ambitious than we've done in the past," says Evans, "we've got to fit two full houses on stage and make it look like there's some distance between them."

The set is being constructed under Evans' direction on the Longwood stage, and it will be transferred to Hampden-Sydney upon its completion this weekend. After Twelfth Night's run in John's Auditorium February 21, 22, and 23, the set will be struck and returned to Jarman Auditorium, where it will be reconstructed for the play's final performances February 28, March 1, and 2 in Jarman.

Despite the difficulties of Twelfth Night, Evans enjoyed designing the set: "It was fun... something that we don't get to do often. All set designs are fun, but Shakespeare adds challenge... I'm just having a ball!"

The artist and his work—Jarman Technical Director, Moffett Evans with model of set for Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

The Music Blues. . .

"Late Breaking News Story as We Slide off to Press: the video rage hits town; it's J. J. Jackson, Nina Blackwood, Allen Hunter, Martha Quinn, the Music News, Closet Classics, Twisted Sister, Kajagoogoo, and Nineteen-Eighty-Four all wrapped up in one slick bubble gum ad package for today's serious-minded college student. Gone are those cherished afternoons when "Leave It to Beaver," "Father Knows Best," and "Gilligan's Island" ran back-to-back on the same channel. Soon to be ousted will be "General Hospital" and "The Young and the Restless," as well as the countless other TV classics we students devote our time to these days. For the anathema of all other mindless television programming has arrived: M-TV has hit Farmville like overdone spaghetti hits a brick wall.

Like children's pop-up poetry books, M-TV offers us clear-cut images of that we should explore with our imagination; it rejects the art in music and rewards dullness and repetition. If ever a medium was created which so fully rejects intellectualism, M-TV is that medium. Here the practice of mindless procrastination comes to its fruition and is rewarded with segment after segment of blazing mediocrity.

It's likely that one could go on for pages about the madness of college students sitting for hours straight in chapter rooms, snack bars and dorm rooms with eyes glued to a medium whose spokespersons resemble seven-year-olds after a day at Disneyland, but there's no need. Hopefully, it's obvious that a mind still is a terrible thing to waste.

Concert Reviews

By Marna Bunger

College crowds are the best crowds to play for, according to The Lift. You would never had known that by Saturday night's performance; the turnout was poor. The people who did come saw a good show.

The Lift consists of Bryan Forrest, guitar; Jay Culpepper, drums; and David Orr on bass. They describe themselves as a "mod rock dance band," and the description fits. They played eight of their original songs and also covered recent popular dance hits including David Bowie's "Blue Jean.", The Romantics' "What I Like About You", and "Message In A Bottle" by the Police. Orr successfully and convincingly faked an English accent on John Waite's "Missing You." Vocals were traded off between all three of the band members, and oddly enough, no quality of sound was lost. The night was closed with an excellent rendition of the Beatles' "Saw Her Standing There." Once again, Longwood College missed out on another great SUN sponsored event.

The Lift plays in the Virginia Beach area, William and Mary, University of Richmond, VCU, and soon hopes to be in the D.C. area. They have opened for such bands as Missing Persons, The Dads, States, and The Robbin Thompson Band. An original four song EP will be released in April. The Lift already has a concept video called "Dogwalk" which is playing on the local Virginia Beach music video channel.

These talented individuals do have a long way to go, but if they keep up their energetic performances success will be in the near future—that is if they can attract a little more attention from the general public.

Long lines of people waited outside both entrances of the Lower Dining Hall to see the Voltage Brothers Friday night, despite the 16 degree temperature. Eight hundred tickets were pre-sold for the mixer sponsored by SUN. Susan Gardner, an active member of SUN said, "We were not allowed to sell more than 800 tickets due to the fire regulations and potential fire hazard with that many people squeezed in the Lower Dining Hall."

The Voltage Brothers originated in 1969 in Rochester, New York. All of the 11 stage members and four off-stage members went to high school in the Rochester area. "We got together a few times just to play around and realized we really had something," Doug, one of the lead singers, said. Judging from Friday night's performance, they really do have something.

The band plays in many colleges and universities during the school year from New York to California. Friday night was their fourth time at Longwood. "We like coming to Longwood because there's always a big crowd with a nice response," Leon Voltage said. "If you ask any of us our last name we'll all tell you Voltage. It's our common bond," Leon added.

The group's albums, "Voltage Brothers" and "Throw Down" came out in 1977 and 1978 and will be followed by another in March of this year. On February 28 the Voltage Brothers will be in Chicago for the NACA convention and have been nominated for "Group of the Year—College Circuit". If they play everywhere with the same enthusiasm and expertise as they did Friday night, they definitely deserve to receive the award.

Profile of Freshman Class

By Bill Moore

The American Council on Education 1984 Freshman Survey results have just been released, and since our freshmen gave graciously of their time during orientation to participate. I thought I'd share some of the results. Those of you who aren't freshmen can decide if these attitudes reflect the way you and your peers feel about these issues.

To begin with, there's been a lot of discussion lately about the rising tide of "young conservatives," but our freshmen attitudes don't exactly bear that trend out overall. It is true that 22% of our students consider themselves "Conservative" or "far right," while only 17% label themselves "liberal" or "far left;" however, that still leaves 61% who call themselves "middle of the road." On specific issues, Alexander Astin has called the national freshman trends "mixed." He goes on to say that students are "more conservative on matters of taxes, crime, and drug use, (but) they are more liberal than ever on matters of equality for women, school integration, and students' rights." Those trends hold true for our Longwood freshmen as well. In addition, they seem to be traditionally "liberal" on issues like disarmament (69% say that the government is not doing enough to promote arms control), military spending (only 40% believe we should be spending more on the military, a higher figure than their student peers nationally but still not a majority), and on abortion (64% support legalized abortion). On the "conservative" side, only 21% believe the death penalty should be abolished, and only 37% think that disadvantaged students should be given preferential treatment in college admissions. As much as anything, I think that this mixed trend suggests that the traditional labels of "liberal" and "conservative" are breaking down, a positive trend from my perspective - if people are actually taking the time to define their specific beliefs or positions on these issues based on evidence rather than media hype.

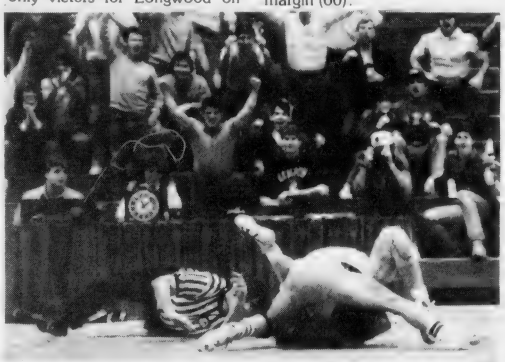
On other fronts, it's interesting that while 56% of Longwood freshmen report a B or better average in high school, only 24% expect to make a similar average in college. Does this figure reflect modesty, or a pre-college fear that "college is bound to be harder than high school and I'm not really up to the challenge?" Combine those attitudes with the face that 56% anticipate post-baccalaureate education, 72% expect to find a job in their preferred field, and 66% cite "to be very well off financially" as an essential life objective,—to me the mixture is disconcerting. On the one hand, I'm concerned that there will be quite a few disappointments and broken dreams here—many of these students are not being realistic. On the other hand, I recall a perceptive column written in 1983 by Ellen Goodman (The Boston Globe Newspaper Company) entitled "The Case for Being Unrealistic." Ms. Goodman was talking about students who expected to have it all—"tops in their field without sacrificing their personal lives," "(no) trouble balancing family and career"—and she argued that students' "unrealistic" expectations just might "fuel change" and help them achieve, to some extent, their goals. Her argument supplies in part to the discrepancies I see in the freshmen data, and we (faculty and administration) need to be cautious about how glibly we quash dreams by emphasizing that students be "realistic." However, our data reflects grandiose life goals but quite modest academic goals—and my experience to date at Longwood does not suggest that these students are counting on their co-curricular involvement to "make up" for average grades when it comes to resume time. What's up? Am I imagining things or is it time that we as a community of students, faculty, and administrators confront the concerns—constructively, rather than posturing about students as apathetic/unmotivated/lazy/stupid-/pick your label (we're all guilty of that, aren't we?)? Are we as an institution doing everyting we can, and as effectively as we can, to educate and prepare our students for their lives in a changing, inceasingly complex world? Or do we prefer to maintain the status quo—in the residence halls, in the curriculum, etc.—without raising these questions because "we've always done it this way" and "we're all overextended as it is?" I don't think these questions have easy answers, but I believe it is important that we listen to our students, understand who they are, and raise the questions in light of that understanding. Since 1985 is a brand new year, perhaps we can make some fresh resolutions to maintain our "sense of awakening" and "critical thinking," and raise some hard questions.

Grapplers Excel

By Tony Brzezicki

The Longwood wrestling team brought its record up to 9-10 after going 4-1 last week. The opposition was tough but the Lancers wrestled strong and had an impressive week.

This week the Lancer grapplers travel to Virginia Tech on Wednesday and then on to the NCAA Division II Southern Regionals at Pembroke State on Friday and Saturday.



Longwood's only defeat was handed down by a tough Washington & Lee team, 26-16 on Saturday.

In the Washington & Lee match, Tim Fitzgerald at 118, Pete Whitman at 134, Steve Albeck at 150, and Jesus Strauss at the heavyweight spot were the only victors for Longwood on the day.

Albeck notched his tenth consecutive victory and a season record of 18-3. Tim Fitzgerald's record stands at 22-6 and Billy Howard's at 22-13-0.

"We wrestled very poorly," said a disappointed coach Steve Nelson. "We are suffering from illness at this time which hurt us too."

On Tuesday night Longwood got a forfeit win when Virginia State failed to show up. The following night Longwood traveled to Lynchburg where it rolled over its opponents, first defeating rival Hampden--Sydney College 40-13, then stunning Lynchburg 58-0, and burying Ferrum College 60-0 while setting new school records for total points (60) and victory margin (60).

Houseknecht Estate To Be Auctioned

By Eric Houseknecht

Following are a few selected items from the forthcoming auction catalogue of the estate of Eric T. Houseknecht.

1. DAINTY MAID (brand name) length 19 inches (48 cm). Thus is inscribed this important example of the popularly priced hot plate. Green enameled metal with black brand name inscription and dials, this two burner plate was personally delivered to its present owner by building superintendent Shorty Giles, long thought to be a mythical figure. It is of keen interest to those scholars and collectors dedicated to the study of Momento Pori, or Reminders of Poverty.

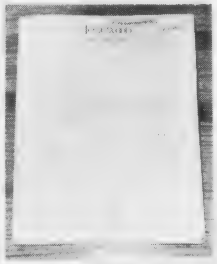
The Dainty Maid is interestingly proportioned, featuring two burners but lacking room for two pans. This feature, being a fine example of thematic discomfort, embodies the essence of the entire collection.

The Eric T. Houseknecht Collection, one of the largest ever assembled (in a dormitory room of that size) of Momento Pori effectively chronicles man's reaction to having no excess money from the end of the nineteen-seventies, through early nineteen-eighties acquisitions, until the present day.

All artistic media are represented; carvings in furniture, inkings on paper, and works in many metal alloys. Each piece works, in its own manner, to reflect man's underpayment of college-aged individuals on this earth.

The Dainty Maid hot plate with its two burners and two dials reminds us that lack of funds is the ultimate poverty and that there is no way to avoid this fact. Possibly the inscription under each dial states it most clearly: High, Medium, Low.

2. BROIL KING TOASTER OVEN - early/late nineteen-seventies, length 17 inches (43 cm). Emblazoned on one side with the Broil King logo and on the other side with the legend "infra red Bake 'N' Broil." Trimmed in black plastic, containing aluminum rack and glass-like window, ornamental wire and plug.



3. IMPORTANT ROWE SLEEP-OR-SOFA BED- second half nineteen eighty-one, length 3 ft. (.9 m when sofa), length 6 ft. (1.8 m when bed). Executed in plywood, upholstered with a foam type substance and covered in a floral print poly/cotton drop cloth; mattress in blue, gray, and white ticking, black-and-white cloth label (do not remove under penalty of law).

4. TYPEWRITER, twentieth century, length 11 inches (28 cm). Royal "Quiet De Luxe," gray metal, four stuck keys, unwound ribbon; the whole, a mess.

5.COLLECTION OF FIVE EGGS, not quite as late-20th century as one would have hoped. Representing eggs in two modes, hard-boiled and raw; three of former, two of latter. Together with blue cardboard egg carton and enamel saucepan. Five pieces (at the moment).

6. TWO TAN OBJECTS, twentieth-century. One a pepper mill and the other a salad bowl. Both somewhat worse for the wear. Two pieces.

7. LETTER FROM DEAN OF STUDENTS' OFFICE, Fall Semester 1984, 8½ x 11 inches. Ink on office stationary. Signed and dated. This letter dates from the early Latta period but still shows a heavy Ogrosky influence.

8. ANONYMOUS. Lancer Motif on plastic drinking cup, height 6 inches (15 cm). Unsigned. Plastic, blue, white and red. Inscribed PAR-BILS. These items, and the rest of the E.T.H.C., will be on display in room 222 Cox from now until May 10th, when they will move to another Farmville location. Most items are for sale (prices available on request).

In a futile attempt to locate the males in his flock, Dance Company Director, Nelson Neal, surveys this semester's team.

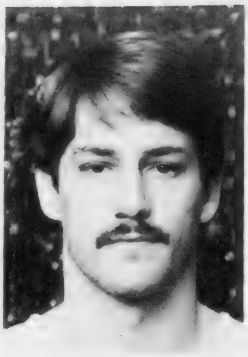
Albeck Named Player of Week

Senior Steve Albeck stretched his win streak to 10 and his overall record to 18-3 last week, and for his efforts, Albeck has been named the Longwood College Player of the Week for the second week in a row. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood College Sports Information Office. Albeck was named for the period February 1-8.



Longwood's all-time career leader in wins, Albeck has a 63-27-2 record over four years. Last week he went 4-0 with perhaps his most impressive performance coming in Longwood's loss to Washington & Lee Saturday 26-16.

Albeck led the Lancers to a 4-1 week, but he wrestled Saturday with a painful rib injury. Washington & Lee's Tim Walker threw Albeck to the mat with a strong body slam early in the match. Despite suffering from agonizing pain, Albeck continued to wrestle after catching his breath and went on to win a solid 8-4 decision.

"Despite his injuries Steve is wrestling extremely well," said coach Steve Nelson. "He has wrestled 142, 150 and 158 this week and won all his matches. His record of 18-3 is the best winning percentage in Longwood wrestling history.

"Steve is wrestling with the most poise and confidence in his career at Longwood. His performance has been a big boost to our young team."

Albeck is one of several Lancer wrestlers with hopes of winning a regional crown this weekend at the NCAA Division II Southern Region Tournament at Pembroke State.

Once again the Bloodmobile sponsored by Geist, will be returning to our campus. On February 19 and 20 the Red Cross will be in the Red, White & Green rooms in Lankford from 12 noon to 6 p.m. Sign-up will be held in the new smoker on February 12 and 13.

IAA Update

By Michael Harris

The Intramural Athletic Association continues this week with ping-pong, basketball and water polo.

The playoff tournament for women's basketball started Monday, February 11.

Men's basketball is rounding up with the championship for the A League being held this week between Encore and the Blue Crew. In the B League, the Sixers and Court Control vie for the opportunity to meet the Pi Happ's for the championship.

Women's ping-pong is down to the two finalists: Lipscomb vs. K. Pridgen.

Men's ping-pong is underway with ten contestants entering.

The tournament for coed innertube water polo will probably begin on Tuesday, Feb. 12.

Entry blanks are due with a captain's meeting at 6:30 on Wednesday, Feb. 13 for coed volleyball.

The IAA has established a new Constitution with the following officers: president, Paul Sidhu; vice-president, Kie Kurfman; secretary, Kie Kurfman; treasurer, Kellie Noe.

Members at Large: Allison Arthur, Sarita Thurmond, Matt Church. Three more members are needed so any interested individuals please come by the IAA office in Iler Gym.

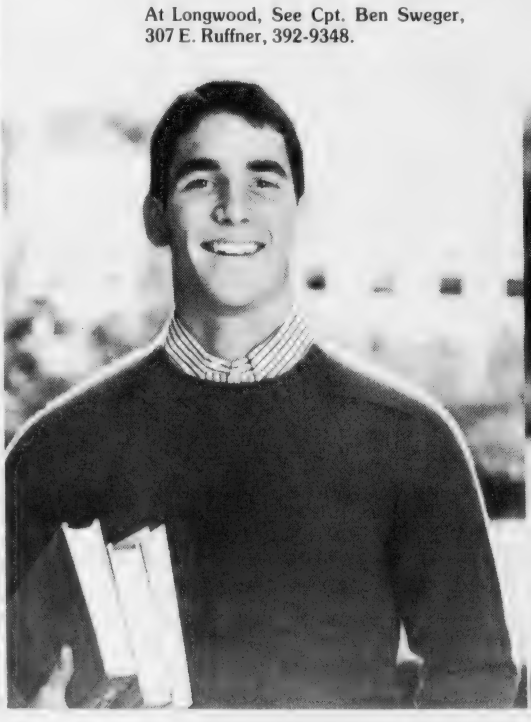
GET TWO EDUCATIONS FROM ONE COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP.

An education in your chosen major. And an education in becoming an Army officer. You get both with an Army ROTC scholarship.

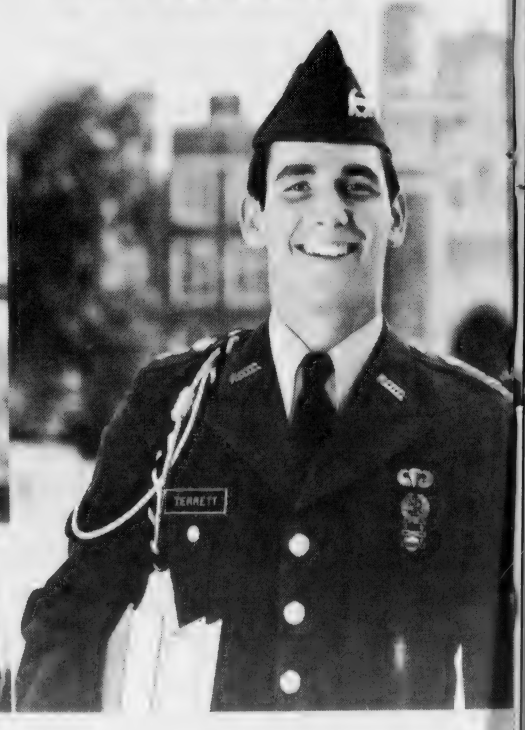
Army ROTC is the college program that trains you to become an officer, a leader and a manager.

You take ROTC along with your other studies, and graduate with both a degree and a second lieutenant's commission.

Best of all, you can put both of your educations to work right away. In today's modern high-tech Army, we need engineers, communications experts, computer specialists, and other professionals.



Our scholarships cover full tuition and required fees. They also provide an amount for books, supplies and equipment, as well as an allowance of up to $1,000 each school year they're in effect.



So if you think all scholarships just provide you with a college degree, look into an Army ROTC scholarship. You'll be in for quite an education.

Cagers Fall To LBC

Longwood blew a five-point lead in the final 5:25 Saturday night at Liberty Baptist as the Flames came away with a hard-earned 42-38 victory before 2,718 delighted basketball fans in Liberty Gymnasium.

The Lancers, now 7-14 overall and 1-6 in the Mason-Dixon Conference, will be glad to return to the friendly confines of Lancer Hall this week. Longwood hosts Maryland Baltimore County Monday and Pittsburgh-Johnstown Saturday in Mason-Dixon games this week. Next week the Lancers entertain Mary Washington Monday and Atlantic Christian Wednesday.

Longwood, which has only lost twice to LBC in the past six seasons (LC leads the series 9-4), had a 33-28 lead with under six minutes to play Saturday night. When the Flames began to get hot, Longwood managed to get just one point out of three one-and-one opporunities. The missed free throws gave Liberty Baptist a chance to come back, and they did.

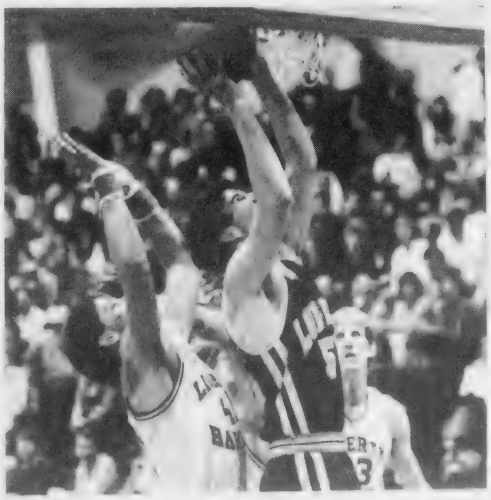
Trailing 28-23 with 14:11 left in the game, Longwood went on a 10-0 roll behind two jumpers from David Strothers, layups by Tim Wilson and Stan Hull and two free throws from Dave Edwards. After an LBC turnover, Longwood had a 33-28 edge and the ball with 8:11 remaining.

Going into its delay game, Longwood hoped to salt the contest away at the free throw line. Hitting 72 per cent of their foul shots for the season, the Lancers seemed to have the game under control.

After the Flames pulled within 33-31, Boudewijn van Beest missed a one-and-one at 4:02 Lonnie Lewis made one free throw at 3:22 and Strothers missed a one-plus-one at 2:42.

Given new life by the missed free throws, the Flames got jumpers from Mike Minett and Greg McCauley, a layup from Dan Kennard and a steal and dunk from center Cliff Webber to go up 39-36 with 1:01 left.

For all intents and purposes, Webber's bucket settled the issue. Webber literally brought the house down when he cut in front of a Lancer pass and dribbled the length of the court before slamming it through the basket. Any wine glass within shouting distance of Liberty Gym was likely shattered by the noise level from the resulting celebration, as were Longwood's hopes of victory.



The end result was another bitter defeat for the Lancers in what has become a season of bitter defeats. Once again Longwood played a more talented team on even terms for most of the game, only to see victory slip away at the end.

Strothers totaled 17 points to pace Longwood in scoring, but as has often been the case this season, it was on defense that the Lancers excelled. Reserve guard Frank Tennyson, with help from Stan Hull, was extremely effective at shadowing McCauley from a box-and-one defense the Lancers used for much of the second half.

The 6-3 McCauley had a hard time shaking loose from the 5-8 Tennyson, and scored just three points in the final 14 minutes of the game. McCauley ended up with 13 points and the 6-9, 230-pound Webber had 10 points and eight rebounds.

Liberty Baptist upped its record to 16-7 overall and 4-2 in the Mason-Dixon Conference with the win.

"You played hard again tonight," Lancer coach Cal Luther told his team, "Now, let's get four straight wins at home."

BIG MEN BATTLE—Boudewijn van Beest operates inside against Liberty Baptist's Cliff Webber (white uniform) in Saturday's contest.

Lady Lancers Stun Hampton

Knocking off their second nationally ranked opponent in a week, Longwood's women's basketball team dispatched injury-riddled Hampton University Saturday night 78-71, behind another inspired performance from senior Florence Holmes.

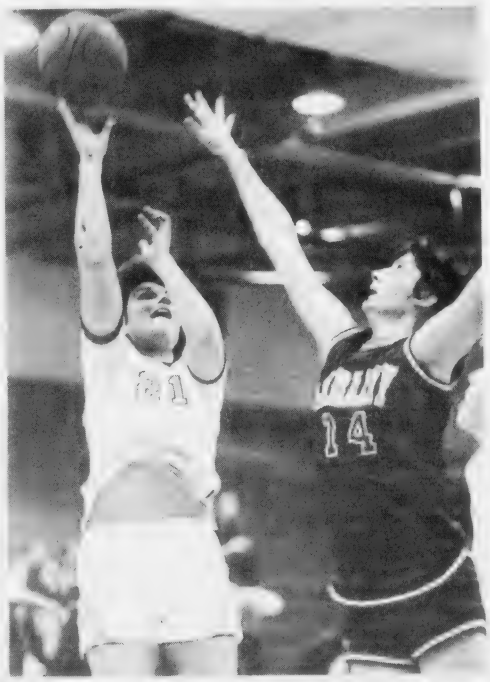
Now 12-9 overall and 2-3 in the Mason-Dixon Conference, Longwood has won five games in a row, the longest win streak since the 1980 squad ran off seven straight victories. The all-time Lady Lancer record for wins-in-a-row is eight set in 1969 and again in 1970.

Longwood visits Maryland Baltimore County Monday night in a key MDAC clash and plays at Div. III North Carolina-Greensboro Wednesday night in action this week. Looming ahead is a tough test against Division I Radford, next Monday in Lancer Hall at 6 p.m.

In other action last week Longwood won a Mason-Dixon game over Liberty Baptist 69-66 Friday night and beat Randolph-Macon 80-76 Wednesday night.

Holmes in Second Place on Scoring List

Following in a long line of consistent performances, Florence Holmes totaled 20 points, nine rebounds, 10 assists and four steals to lead the win over Hampton. Holmes moved into second place on Longwood's all-time scoring list with 1,176 points. The 5-9 senior passed Maryjane Smith's 1,167 points (1976-80), but still trails Sue Rama's 1,471 (1974-78).



Supporting Holmes in the victory were Caren Forbes with 24 points (12-25 from the floor), Melanie Lee, 12 points and 10 rebounds, and Karen Boska, 10 points and seven rebounds. Valerie Turner, nine rebounds and five assists, and Barbie Burton, eight points and five rebounds, played well off the bench in the home court victory.

Hampton, which came into the game with a 21-2 record and a second place ranking in Division II, had three starters out with injury and illness.

Longwood shot 44 per cent from the floor to 37 per cent for the Lady Pirates, who were led by Darlene Chaney with 19 points and nine rebounds. The Lady Lancers beat previously 10th ranked Mount St. Mary's 99-94 in double overtime last Saturday (February 2).

In Friday's win over Liberty Baptist, Holmes had 19 points and 11 rebounds, and Beth Ralph scored 16 points in her first action against her former teammates. Lee and Forbes chipped in with 10 points each.

Ralph had 24 points, Holmes and Forbes 19 and Lee 12 in the win over Randolph-Macon Wednesday night.

RALPH DOUSES THE FLAMES—Longwood's Beth Ralph (21) scores against her former teammates in Friday's 69-66 Lady Lancer win.

Rotunda Interviews: Gustav Sallas

WUTA Disc Jockey Gus Sallas: off-cue and waiting.

Editor's Note: On page one of this issue, a story appears concerning Longwood's Campus Radio Station, WUTA. The Station was closed last July when Department of Speech and Dramatic Arts faculty members and Interim Dean of Faculty Dr. Charles Vail found the Broadcasting booth and office area of the Station, which is located on the upper floor of Jarman auditorium, in great disarray. Since that time, WUTA staff members have been unable to regain control of the Station despite numerous appeals to Vail and others. Last week, a meeting took place between the WUTA staff and Speech and Drama faculty members, and it now appears that WUTA may soon be back on the air.

The Rotunda interviewed one WUTA staff member, Gus Sallas, about the future of WUTA at Longwood. Following are edited segments of the interview.*

ROTUNDA: Firstly, and most importantly, are the basic questions about WUTA: What happened to it and what is happening now?

Sallas: First of all, there was no faculty, administration, or campus support for the radio station. There was no respect and there was little or no interest in it.

Secondly, the individuals who were involved in the radio station last year saw this as an opportunity for license. There were no rules that were abided by because nobody really knew where the constitutution was or what the rules were. In addition, no one was listening. WUTA was used by a handful of students as an opportunity to have a really good time playing music on the air.

We want our DJ's to have a good time, but in the future, we're going to draw the line as to what a safe and legal good time is within the station.

We now have some faculty support and interest is gaining. Until we actually get the keys to the radio station and get it going, that support will continue to be only tacit understanding-hurrahs and pats on the back.

Rotunda: Who is holding the station back now? Who has the keys?

Sallas: I want to sit down and agree with them what the terms for future use of that radio station are going to be, and I want to set them down in stone because I don't think shit like that should happen either, I agree with them.

But I also agree with a lot of other people; friends of WUTA, professors and some administrators who feel that there is a need for college radio at Longwood. That there is an opportunity we have to educate these people to bring to them information, educational and musically uplifting programs.

Rotunda: And that is an opportunity which Longwood's handbook guarantees.

Sallas: The handbook guarantees it and. . .it's one of Longwood's fourteen goals—effective communication (reading) it says right here, "You have an opportunity and a work volunteer experience to become a DJ at the campus radio station.

Rotunda: Why hasn't someone in the administration made a stronger effort to get WUTA opened?

Sallas: I have a feeling that they're scared of the potential of the students at this school. They don't trust the students. They don't trust students enough to give them the equipment and the use of the station because of what they've seen in the past, and I don't blame them but, the only way that human beings can go forward and make any progress in life is by agreeing on ways that this mutual distrust can be worked out.

Rotunda: What does WUTA need more now than anything else?

Sallas: Right now what we need is to get into that studio, get to broadcasting, and show 'them' that we can make a difference on this campus; that we can bring to Longwood a variety of musical and educational programs which will be invaluable that will seriously augment the atmosphere at this school as being educational rather than just one big day-care camp for a bunch of bourgeoisie petty thugs.

Rotunda: Is that what Longwood is?

Sallas: I think so. . .

I see WUTA as an opportunity to really change the complacent attitude. The attitude that people come down here, not to learn anything in particular not to expand their horizons, but just to confirm what they already know, what their parents have taught them, what little small communities have taught them. They want that confirmed and they want to get out of here with a degree.

I never in my most sick nightmares thought people would go to college for that, I mean why didn't they just go to some McDonald's industry school and learn burger flipping-wrist action. That way you have all your concepts and your thoughts that you've had with you since grade school set; nobody is going to challenge them. But that's just not what college is all about, or at least that's not what I thought college was all about. I thought you went there to find out about things—to be concerned—to get instructed and interested. But the majority here is the other way around. Their a little group who can't take their values and let them be challenged even just a little. The majority here is completely complacent—completely sheltered. . . Longwood doesn't go out of its way to induce a sense of awakening.

Rotunda: Is Longwood's administration failing to see its goals realized?

Sallas: I think in general the administration doesn't go out of its way to induce an open atmosphere that would be conducive to a sense of awakening.

You get into a discussion about religion in a philosophy class and the only religion the people around the table can talk about is Christianity. I've been to India, I've seen people who worship rats-as gods, and I don't say that's good or that's cool, but people have got to see that theirs is not the only way of life, of living and I don't think that anyone is really trying to help them understand that here.

Budget Shift Leaves Burden On Families

Public administration major Vicky Heard says she wouldn't be at private Atlanta University without the $5,825 in federal aid she's received each of the last two years.

And thanks to President Reagan's new proposal to limit students' yearly aid awards to $4,000, Heard—along with an estimated 630,000 other students who receive more than $4,000 a year in federal aid—may be in serious financial trouble next year.

The proposed $4,000 per year cap is but one of the key components Reagan unveiled in his education budget proposal last week.

He also wants to limit Pell grants, National Direct Student Loans and Work-Study funds to students from families with annual incomes of less than $25,000 and limit Guaranteed Student Loans to students from families making less than $32,500.

Some believe the proposals could affect over 2 million students.

For the most part, higher education officials are confident Congress—as it has for the last four years—will reject most of Reagan's proposed cuts.

The newly-proposed $4,000 cap on federal aid, however, could gain support, aid experts fear.

"That's the one we're most vulnerable on because the argument for it sounds attractive on the surface," says Charles Saunders of the American Council on Education (ACE).

"They think they're just hitting people going to high-cost, private schools," he says.

The cuts would hurt students at private colleges more than at public schools according to Julianne Still Thrift, research director for the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities.

Three of every 10 students at private schools would have their aid cut compared to about one out of every four at public schools, she says.

But a disproportionately high percentage of private school students facing aid cuts are in the lower-income brackets.

Of those in families with less than $6,000 in annual income, 43 percent would lose aid money. in the $18,000 to $24,000 income bracket, 28 percent would be affected.

Hardest hit would be graduate students, and students at predominantly-black colleges, where the average family income of students is below the poverty line, aid officials contend.

Grad students are also high on the casualty list.

Nationwide, about a third of the students who would lose aid would be graduate students, although they comprise only 11 percent of all college students.

"I'm not going to cry crocodile tears over students in professional schools who are in higher income streams and have easier access to loans," says Tom Linney of the Council of Graduate Schools.

"But this cut doesn't target them. It covers the humanities graduate students as well. They're the people going to be hit the hardest."

Reagan administration officials acknowledge their proposed cuts constitute "a major philosophical shift" that would increase the financial burden on students and parents.

But they say most of the steep cuts are targeted at students from upper-income families.

"They have always had extra money at home, and the parents have chosen to buy a car or make another form of investment, as opposed to applying it to their students' education," acting Education Sec. Jones says.

Higher education officials are confident Congress will reject Reagan's income limit proposals, and many schools have not even bothered to compute the effect on their students.

"We may be whistling past the grave, but we have been assured by all our sources in D.C. that the income limitations are so unlikely," says Stan Hudson, assistant director for financial aid at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

But the $4,000 aid cap may garner wider support, in part because it is viewed as affecting primarily students at private, expensive schools.

"What the administration seems to be saying is that you can't go to a college unless you go to a public institution," ACE's Saunders says.

"And by implication, they're saying they don't care if the students attending private schools are all wealthy," he adds.

Moreover, Saunders says, heavy reliance on federal aid is more often the result of limited personal resources than high tuition.

About half of the students receiving more than $4,000 in federal aid come from families with annual incomes of less than $12,000, he says.

At Reed College in Portland, Ore., for example, most of the 77 students receiving $4000-plus in federal aid are in low income brackets, says financial aid director Richard Dent.

"That's precisely why they are receiving so much aid," he says.

Reed's tuition is high—$8,290—but Dent argues that federal aid should provide both access to higher education and choice.

"If a student is bright and capable, he or she should have the right to go to Harvard or the local community college," Dent says.

Handicapped Student To Direct Meet

Shari Smith, a handicapped student here at Longwood, plans to organize and direct the "Special Olympics-Basketball Meet" for any disabled or handicapped person in the surrounding area. The basketball meet will be held on Sunday, March 24, in Lancer Hall. The "special" participants are contacted and encouraged by the Sheltered Workshop in Farmville, Inc., however, Smith is asking for college students to volunteer for various responsibilities. She has moved the event from Saturday afternoon to Sunday in hopes that more college students will help out.

Smith's Directed Study Sociology course has given her this large responsibility. She has arranged the entire event (with the help of Dr. Ballard). She also needs to raise $500 to support the project and will be asking area businesses and organizations for donations.

After observing the handicapped and disabled employees/trainees at the Sheltered Workshop, Smith wants nothing more than to see them smile, thus, her goal for the Olympics will be to make all the participants happy.

Smith has lived with a hearing problem herself and since attending Longwood, she has faced up to her problem and is now willing to help others with similar conditions. "Having a positive attitude" is the state of mind that keep her going. After she graduates from Longwood, she is planning to attend Galludet College, the only college in the world that deal with the deaf, for a graduate program in rehabilitating-counseling of adults.

At neighboring Hampden-Sydney College last weekend, William Shakespeare's Twelfth Night was thrice performed under the direction of H-SC director Stephen Coy. The cast and crews of the show provided us with a much-needed rarity: art in Farmville. Actors and actresses from Longwood, Hampden-Sydney, and the local community worked diligently to bring Shakespeare to Farmville, a paradoxical task at best, and they should well be proud of the results of their labors. Unfortunately, the students and faculty of Hampden-Sydney can hardly be proud of their attendance at Twelfth Night. Fewer than 100 people showed up at John's Auditorium over the three nights, and many of these few were Longwood students and faculty.

Little can we blame our fellow-students at Hampden-Sydney, of course; Mid-Winters, a traditional time for festive carousing about campus, was quite the thing. Amid the general haze, there was little time for Shakespeare. In soothe, it is the responsibility of a Hampden-Sydney man to pay homage to Sweet Briar women before all else.

Longwood students, however, do not have such ominous responsibilities, and we should be able to work Twelfth Night into our hectic schedules, even though our past attendance predicts we will not.

Four times a year, the Longwood Players perform for our enjoyment, and rarely do we show them the support they are due. Thursday, Friday and Saturday of this week we have an opportunity to support the Players of Longwood and the Jongleurs of Hampden-Sydney who have worked for six weeks so that we can enjoy two hours of Shakespeare. Let's show them that support.

Attacks On Campus

By Barrett Baker

For weeks, Longwood College has been buzzing with the news of thefts and various assaults on campus. The Longwood Police have been notified on some accounts, but apparently the situation is worse than it seems.

"My sweet-mate was grabbed in the stairway of Frazer," said a young lady who wished to remain unidentified. "I think security is a lot to blame because it was around 1:00 in the morning and here's this guy just standing around in the stairway."

Another student, who also wished to remain anonymous, experienced an even scarier event. While she and her suite-mates were occupied in a far corner of their suite, someone broke into the room and escaped with a small amount of cash and a set of room keys. "I realized that the keys were not just misplaced when my suite-mate heard someone trying to get into the room at about 6 a.m. in the morning using my keys. "Fortunately," she said, "the lock had been changed the day before it happened." Unfortunately, the young lady was so frightened by the incident that she could not notify anyone in time to catch the individual involved.

Apparently, this sort of thing has been going on for quite some time, but there is really nothing the police can do about it, even if more people were to get involved. At best the police can check into robberies as attempted assaults, but usually end up with nothing more than a filed report.

Some people feel that the problem lies in the fact we don't have 24-hour visitation. "If there were always a night host on duty," says Mark Holland, "people wouldn't leave the doors propped open. A situation like that just invites people to enter a building." Another suggestion is to install a dining hall I.D. punch system that would unlock the doors. This would cut out the problem of employing people and still allow access to the dorms.

At the moment, neither system looks like they'll be adopted so the best advice is to never walk alone and always keep your door locked. The situation won't go away, but these actions could decrease the regularity of these events.

The Board of Student Publications at Longwood College is accepting applications for editor of The Rotunda and editor of The Gyre for the 1985-86 year. Qualifications are as follows:

A. Any applicant must be a full-time undergraduate at Longwood College; i.e., be enrolled in the equivalent of no less than twelve semester hours at the time of application and during term of appointment.

B. Shall be a student in good standing; i.e., not on academic or disciplinary probation.

C. Shall have posted no less than a 2.5 grade point average in the semester immediately preceding selection to the position of editor and shall have no less than a 2.5 cumulative grade point average.

D. Shall not have an elective or appointive in Student Government during term as editor.

Pick up applications in the office of Vice-President for Student Affairs. Applications due by March 8, 1985.

Twelfth Night Performance Mixed: A Review

By David Areford

"If this were played upon a stage now, I could condemn it as an improbable fiction," says Fabian, a character in Shakespeare's romantic comedy, Twelfth Night or What You Will. Fabian is saying that the truth of his world is more bizarre than fiction, and thus he also takes the part of an audience member viewing the improbable and chaotic fictional world of Illyria, the dreamlike setting of Twelfth Night.

The "twelfth night" of the title refers to the Feast of the Epiphany, the day which culminates the Christmas season. This celebration, which had once been a sacred Christian observance, had become in Shakespeare's day a secular celebration which found expression in drunken revelry—a time when rules were usurped by chaotic abandon. Though no such holiday is referred to within the play, Shakespeare doubtless wanted his audience to associate the holiday topsy-turviness with the events of his comedy. The whimsicalness of this play world is extended in Shakespeare's invitation to us to create our own title, by his inclusion of the alternate title, What You Will.

As the play begins, Viola, the play's heroine has been shipwrecked off the coast of Illyria and separated from her brother Sebastian who she supposes has lost his life in the sea. Viola decides to disguise herself as a man (Cesario) and to serve Duke Orsino. The duke who is hopelessly in love with love itself, sends Cesario (Viola) to woo by proxy Countess Olivia, who will have nothing to do with Orsino because she is still in mourning for her dead brother. Between trips back and forth between the duke and countess, Viola (Cesario) falls deeply in love with Orsino and Olivia falls deeply in love with Viola (Cesario). To add to this confusion, Sebastian, who is Viola's exact twin brother, returns at the end of the play.

"Foolery, sir, does walk about the orb like the sun, it shines everywhere," comments Feste, Olivia's wise and knowing fool. All the characters in Twelfth Night are either fools, fool themselves, or are fooled by the end of the play.

The king of foolery and revelry is Sir Toby Belch, played by Longwood junior Jerry Dagenhart, who is central to the subplot of the play. And in the current joint production by the Longwood Players and the Hampden-Sydney Jongleurs, Dagenhart becomes central to the play.

Dagenhart is superb as Sir Toby Belch, the ever-drunk and belching kinsman of Olivia. He conveys such confidence and command of space and attention that he almost becomes an anomaly as the play continues. We look forward to Sir Toby's presence on stage because he is wonderfully animated and fully developed by Dagenhart.

Linda Sauve, as Viola, also gives an excellent and well-crafted performance. Sauve brings to a very difficult part a subtlety in expressing the problems and confusions of a woman, who acting as a man, falls in love with a man and has a woman fall in love with her. Sauve's lines are spontaneous, and she expresses well Viola's open heart and kindness.

H-SC Senior Robert Lendrim, as Antonio, the captain who rescues Sebastian and then grows fondly attached to him, does a tremendous job in this minor role. Along with Dagenhart and Sauve, he is one of the few actors with a confident voice and presence. Lendrim's acting provides a rare moment of tension in the play when he mistakes Viola for Sebastian. The uncomprehending Viola does not know him of course, and Antonio's feeling of betrayal is made real by Lendrim.

Malvolio, Olivia's steward and the target of Sir Toby and his band of jokers, is played by H-SC Senior Michael Boudreau, who captures convincingly the condescending and close-hearted air of this self-righteous fool. Boudreau also has a fine command of Shakespeare's language. But Boudreau could have conveyed a bit more of Malvolio's real pain and suffering needed in the final portion of the play.

John A. Simpson, as Olivia's jester Feste, gives an uneven portrayal of a character written as a perceptive and entertaining wit who is filled with an even mixture of humor and melancholy. Feste's songs are, however, done nicely. Simpson, who wrote the music himself, does a fine job here.

David Miller as the witless Sir Andrew gives off a wonderfully comic sense of confusion and Sam St. Phard does admirably in his first role as Fabian. Laura Goodfellow as Maria, Olivia's gentlewoman, also gives a fine performance as does Delbert Thomas who is well-suited for the part of Sebastian. Glenn Gilmer as Orsino and Julie Krupp as Olivia are somewhat unable to capture the language, to convey subtle distinctions of voice as well as emotion.

The set design by A. Moffatt Evans is an attractive and versatile arrangement of two houses half on and half off the stage with a platform extending from the stage in front equipped with steps. Thus a variety of entrances and exits can be made.

Stephen Coy's direction is at times unexplainable; the blocking is sometimes repetitive and uninspired and a few scenes are not fully realized.

Some problems may be caused by Coy's insistence on staying within the bounds of one area of the stage at a time—on stage left for Olivia's house, stage right for Orsino's house, and downstage for other scenes. Though the houses do help establish scene, the audience would not become confused if the action moved a bit away from them.

This production of Twelfth Night is one to see for some fine performances and also for some very entertaining moments of comedy.

The play will be performed Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in Jarman Auditorium at 8 p.m. General admission is $3.50, non-LC students $1.00, and Longwood students free with I.D.

Summer Jobs at Cape Cod

Cape Cod, Massachusetts and the islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard are offering thousands of interesting summer jobs to college students and teachers from all over the country again this year.

According to Bonnie Bassett, spokesperson for the Cape Cod Summer Job Bureau, "—the recent explosive growth in tourism here has created unprecedented scrambling by businesses looking for summer help. The seasonal job market has never been this good.' .... "the jobs are waiting, now we just need people to fill them," she added. The opportunities are exciting, the pay is good, and now is the time to act while the selection is best.

For detailed information on how to apply send a LONG self-addressed STAMPED envelope to: 1985 Summer Jobs Program, Box 594, Room 12, Barnstable, MA 02630.

THINK.

The Housing Office and Residence Life staff are holding an organizational meeting on February 26 at 6 p.m. in the Lankford Conference Room for groups interested in Special Interest Housing options for 1985-86. Groups of interested students will be presented with the parameters and expectations fo Special Interest groups and will be given instruction on how to make a special living unit become reality.

This is an opportunity for a club and/or organization to organize a year-long intensive live-study experience in the residence halls. Such groups would receive special sign-up privileges, staff supervision and support, and recognition of accomplishments.

This year the special interest floors are International Interest, Outdoor Recreation, and Academic Support.

Persons interested in the program are encouraged to attend and/or contact Ric Weibl, Barb Gorski, or their REC.

Houseknecht High Stress Diet

By Eric T. Houseknecht

With spring break fast approaching, scores of students will soon attempt to shed excess pounds by dint of strenous diet and exercise. They will nibble carrot sticks, avoid starches, give up drinking, round around athletic fields, lift weights, jump about and contort themselves in front of television sets, and otherwise behave in a manner that suggests an unhappy penchant for undue fanfare. All of this is, of course, completely unnecessary, for it is entirely possible—indeed, easy—to lose weight and tone up without the slightest effort of will. One has merely to conduct one's life in such a way that pounds and inches will disappear as of their own volition.

Magic you say? Fantasy? Pie in the sky? Longing of the basest sort? Not at all, I assure you. No magic, no fantasy, no dreamy hopes of any kind. But a secret, yes, there is a secret. The secret of exploiting an element present in everyone's daily life, and using to its fullest advantage the almost inexhaustible resources available within.

That element? Stress; plain, ordinary, everyday stress. The same type of stress that everyone has handy at any time of the day or night. Call it what you will: annoyance, work, pressure, art, love it is stress nevertheless, and it is stress that will be your secret weapon as you embark on my foolproof program of physical fitness and bodily beauty.

DIET

The downfall of most diets is that they restrict your intake of food. This is, of course, galling, and inevitably leads to failure. The Eric T. Houseknecht High Stress Diet (T.E.T.H.H.S.D. for short) allows unlimited quantities of all foods. You may eat whatever you like. If you can choke it down, it's yours. The following is a partial list of allowed foods. Naturally, space limitations make it impossible to furnish a complete list. If you can eat something that is not on this list—good luck to you.

ALLOWED FOODS

Meat, candy, fish, nuts, fowl, cereal, egg, cookies, cheese, crackers, butter, honey, cream, ice cream, mayonniase, ketchup, frits, marmalade, vegetables, linguine, bread, milk, cake, pancakes, potatoes, spaghetti, sugar, syrup, pizza, hors d'oeuvres, Goo Goo Clusters, pie, wine, liquor, beer, ale

As you can see, T.E.T.H.H.S.D. permits you a variety of foods unheard of on most diets. And, as I have stated previously, quantity is of no concern. I ask only that you coordinate your eating with specific physical activities. This program is detailed below.

EQUIPMENT

You can proceed with T.E.T.H.H.S.D. without the purchase of special equipment; it calls for only those accouterments that you undoubtedly possess already. A partial list follows:

Cigarettes, matches or lighter, at least four classes (phys. eds. don't count), an advisor, one or more lawyers, at least one, but preferebly two, extremely complicated love affairs, a mailing address, friends, relatives, a landlord (R.E.C. will do)

Necessary equipment will, of course, vary from person to person, but T.E.T.H.H.S.D. is flexible and can adapt to almost any situation. This is clearly seen in the sample one-day menu and exercise program that follows. It must be remembered that is absolutely mandatory that you follow exercise instructions while eating.

SAMPLE MENU AND PROGRAM

Breakfast— orange juice, 6 pancakes with butter, syrup and/or jam, 4 slices bacon and/or 4 sausage links, coffee with cream and sugar, 11 cigarettes.

a. take first bite of pancake.

b. Inquire of others what you have missed while skipping classes. Discover that you have two mid-terms and three research papers due within the next 48 hours. (Excellent for firming jawline.)

MIDMORNING SNACK

2 glazed doughnuts, coffee with cream and sugar, 8 cigarettes.

a. Proceed to snack bar area after picking up mail.

b. Take first sip of coffee.

c. Open mail and find disconnect notice from telephone company, threatening letter for suspicious boyfriend or girlfiriend at home, and a notice from you R.E.C. concerning your presence at several illegal parties during past weeks, and the amount of lounge furniture in your room. (Tones up first area.)

LUNCH

2 vodka and tonics, won ton soup, shrimp foo young, chinese spare ribs, green salad, egg rolls, white wine, a selection or selections from the Dessert Menu, fortune cookies, coffee with cream and sugar, 15 cigarettes.

a. Arrange to lunch with lawyer at Chinese Restuarant.

b. Taste first spoon of Won Ton Soup.

c. Inquire of lawyer as to your exact chances in defamation suit against Longwood College and State of Virginia. (Flattens tummy fast.)

DINNER

3 vodka and tonics, spaghetti al pesto, vel piccata, zucchini, arugula salad, cheese cake, coffee with cream and sugar, brandy, 22 cigarettes.

a. Arrange to dine in Richmond with a small group that includes three people with whom you are having clandestine love affairs, your younger sister from out of town, ex-friend to whom you owe a great deal of money, and two of the lawyers representing the State of Virginia. It is always more fruitful to exercise with others (tightens up the muscles).

As I have said, this is just a sample, and any combination of foods and exercises will work equally well. Your daily weight loss should average from between three to five pounds, depending largely on whether you are smoking a sufficient number of cigarettes. This is a common pitfall and close attention should be paid, for inadequate smoking is certain to result in a lessening of stress. For those of you who simply cannot meet your quota, it is imperative that you substitute other exercises, such as moving in downstairs from an aspiring heavy metal band and/or being terribly frank with your mother.

Occasionally I run across a dieter with an unusally stubborn weight problem. If you fall into this category, I recommend as a final desperate measure that you take your meals with an advisor who really and truly understands your educational needs and a hairdresser who wants to try something new and interesting.

Nuckols To Lecture

On Monday, March 4th, 1985 in Longwood College's Bedford Auditorium at 7:30 p.m., Nancy Ann Nuckols will give a lecture entitled "The 1913 Armory Show: An American Succes du Scandale. Miss Nuckols is a senior Art History major from Crozier, Va. and has been selected to appear in the current edition of Who's Who in American Colleges and Universities. In addition she is part of Longwood's work study program, serves as art editor of Gyre, is a member of The Rotunda staff, and has danced and coreographed for the Longwood College Dance Company. Upon graduating she plans to pursue a career in art by working in a gallery.

Miss Nuckols' lecture is sponsored by the Longwood Art Department and focuses on critical and public reactions to modern European art as well as the Armory Show's importance in bringing modern art to America. A reception will follow.

DeGroot:

New Addition To Dining Hall Staff

In an attempt to improve the taste and quality of our meals, ARA has hired an additional chef, Pieter De Groot, to train and educate the current staff. De Groot, a native of Holland, joined the ARA team in January. Since his arrival he has been working closely with Ric Johnson, Administrative coordinator at Blackwell Dining Hall, creating a meal plan of greater variety without sacrificing nutritional value.

Most of us have undoubtedly seen him rushing around Blackwell Dining Hall, a tall man wearing a billowing white hat, but more than likely you've dismissed him as yet another Longwood faculty change. De Groot joined the ARA team in January; previously he taught at a culinary school in Washington, D. C.

Chef De Groot is acting as a guinea pig in a new pilot program sponsored by ARA, which is being conducted for the first time at Longwood. The immediate objective of the pilot program is to "improve the methods of reaching production quantity and at the same time improve the quality," according to De Groot. He would first like to improve the kitchen equipment, believing it is "a bit out of date."

De Groot believes that he has the experience required to instruct the staff, as he has been with ARA for almost 10 years, and at 57, he has quite an impressive list of employers. Among others he has worked for food services at the University of South Carolina, Georgia Tech, and at the Oklahoma City Sheraton Hotel. While a chef at the Sheraton, he served Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon. De Groot has also been employed by corporations in the Soviet Union and China.

Wilkes Lake: Uncertain Future

By Lee Richards and Eddie Hollander

While out at Pizza Hut Lake (Wilke's Lake) last Sunday, I was approached by a man who introduced himself as the groundskeeper/all around maintenance man of the area.

Weilding a softball—presumed to be left from an earlier debauched game—he bummed a beer off my companions and proceeded to inform us that we were allowed to stay.

"I don't imagine you were here during the trouble," he said, "but the owner had to close up the lake again. I think he's either got to open the place up and keep an open mind about it or put up "private property" signs. I personally don't mind the groups of people who come out here as long as they clean up after themselves. They can bring it in and put it in their stomachs, why can't they just take the remains back out?"

The owner apparently chained off the island again after people parked on the grass, left the area in shambles, and were generally rowdy.

"This isn't the first time something like this has happened," continued the groundskeeper, Bob o'Bob as he is lovingly referred to. "Last year there was an incident involving a group of people who came out at 1:00 a.m. and started playing their music very loudly. The owner went to kick them out and they replied that he couldn't because it was private property, so he called the police and had them removed."

As for the future of the lake, no one is really sure what's going to happen, but the owner did have a somewhat positive attitude about it. "I don't mind the 90% of the people who come out here to have a good time and keep thing under control. But it's the down 10% that ruins it for everyone else."

"I don't know what he plans to do," said Bob o'Bob, "but it doesn't look good at the moment and that's too bad because this is really the only place like this in the area."

"Now if it were my lake," he continued, "I'd just set a girl out there by the chain and collect a dollar from everyone who came in. That way maybe people would respect the area a little more and I could get rich and retire early. After all," he finished, "I'm not getting paid to pick up the garbage out here—may be it's time I did."

Lancers Look Ahead

Longwood's men's basketball team closed out its regular season Saturday night with a 77-70 defeat at Mount St. Mary's. Thursday night at 8:30 in Lancer Hall a new season will begin.

The Lancers will face Maryland Baltimore County Thursday night in the first round of the second Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference Tournament. The fact that this year's tourney is being played at Longwood will give coach Cal Luther and his team some extra incentive.

"Our team has been looking forward to the tournament for some time," said the coach. "We've had a disappointing season with a lot of tough breaks. The tournament represents a chance for us to salvage some things. Playing at home has to give us a lift. We've played pretty well against all the conference teams here.'

Longwood ended up fourth in the MDAC regular season race with a 3-7 league mark and a 10-16 overall record. Five of the team's losses overall were by margins of two points or less. The Lancers were 3-2 in the MDAC at home, 0-5 on the road.

Liberty Baptist will play Pittsburgh-Johnstown in Thursday's first contest at 6:30, followed by Longwood vs. UMBC. Waiting in the wings are champ Randolph-Macon and runner-up Mount St. Mary's. R-MC will play the Longwood-UMBC winner at 8:30 Friday while the Mount will face th LBC-UPJ victor at 6:30 Friday. The championship is set for Saturday at 7:30.

Tickets are priced $3.50 for adults and $2.00 for students per session with children under 10 admitted free with a paying adult.

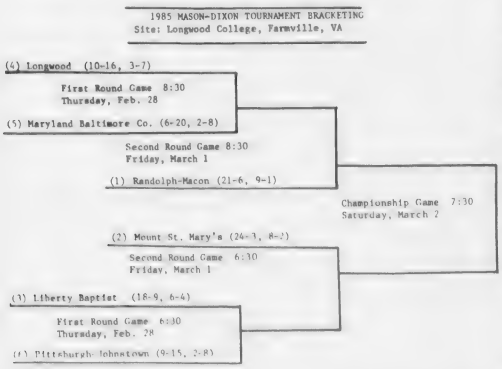
The Lancers split with Maryland Baltimore County, losing on the road 58-57, but winning at Lancer Hall 64-59. UMBC is 6-20 overall and 2-8 in the MDAC.

The Lancers staged a second half rally at Mount St. Mary's Saturday night and almost came all the way back from an 18-point deficit.

Trailing 49-31 with 13:50 left, Longwood outscored the Mount 16-4 to pull within 53-47 with less than 10 minutes remaining. The Lancers got as close as five, but came up short at the end, bowing 77-70. Mount St. Mary's had beaten Longwood 70-46 February 2, the Lancers worst defeat ever in Lancer Hall.

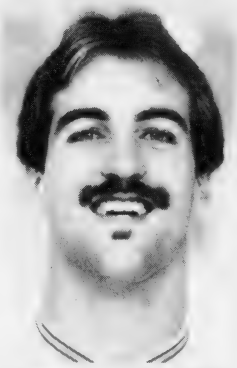
First team All-MDAC performer David Strothers scored 22 points and grabbed seven rebounds to pace Longwood Saturday night. While Lonnie Lewis chipped in with 12 points, it was Kevin Ricks and Lionell Ogburn who led the second half comeback. Ricks ended up with eight points, six assists and two steals while Ogburn came off the bench to score seven points.

Longwood Hosts Tournament



The seedings and bracketing for the second Mason-Dixon Athletic Conference basketball tournament have been decided. The first four slots were determined by regular season standings.

Pittsburgh-Johnstown and Maryland Baltimore County tied for fifth place in the final regular season standings with 2-8 records. A coin toss was required to set the seedings. UMBC called tails and won the toss to take the fifth seed and meet host school Longwood at 8:30 on the opening night of the tournament.



Pittsburgh-Johnstown will tip-off the tourney against third seed Liberty Baptist at 6:30 Thursday night.

Randolph-Macon, the regular season champion for the second year in a row, will be the number one seed in the tournament and Mount St. Mary's will be seeded number two. Both teams will receive first round byes.

Longwood College is the host school for the tournament.

Strothers: All MDAC

Longwood senior forward David Strothers, the Lancers' leading scorer and rebounder this season, has been chosen to the first team of the Mason-Dixon men's basketball All-Conference selections.

Strothers averaged 13.2 points and 5.6 rebounds while shooting .511 from the floor and .866 from the free throw line. The 6-6 senior, who ranks among the national, conference and state leaders in free throw percentage, set a school record for consecutive free throws earlier this season—49 in a row dating back to last year.

Liberty Baptist swept the Player of the Year and Coach of the Year honors in the MDAC with 6-8, 230 pound senior Cliff Webber being voted the league's top player and LBC head coach Jeff Meyer being named the conference's top coach. Webber average 18.7 points and 11.5 rebounds and Meyer guided his team to an 18-9 overall and 6-4 MDAC record while finishing in third place. Meyer lost four of his top eight players during the season.

The all-conference selections were voted by the league coaches.

1985 Mason-Dixon Men's All-Conference Team

First Team: Cliff Webber, 6-8, 230 Senior, Center, Liberty Baptist; Mike Gresik, 6-5, 195, Senior, Forward, Pitt-Johnstown; Jesse Hellyer, 6-6, 220, Senior, Center, Randolph-Macon; David Strothers, 6-6, 200, Senior, Forward, Longwood; Drew Catlett, 6-3, 185, Senior, Guard, Randolph-Macon; Darryle Edwards, 6-4, 185, Senior, Guard, Mount St. Mary's.

Second Team: Greg McCauley, 6-3, 185 Senior, Guard, Liberty Baptist; Rod Wood, 5-8, 160, Senior, Guard, Randolph-Macon; Marlon Cook, 6-1, 180, Senior, Guard, Mount St. Mary's; Breck Robinson, 6-6, 205, Junior, Forward, Maryland Baltimore Co.; Jimmy Pearce, 6-4, 190 Freshman, Forward, Maryland Baltimore Co.

Holmes, Turner: All Conference

Longwood's dynamic duo of Florence Holmes and Valerie Turner have been named to the first team of the Mason-Dixon women's basketball All-Conference selections.

The team's leading scorers and rebounders, Holmes and Turner have led Longwood to back-to-back winning seasons, 16-10 last year and 15-11 with three games to go this season. The senior forwards are among Longwood's top all-time cagers in scoring and rebounding.

Homes is averaging 14.9 points and 8.3 rebounds while shooting .826 from the three throw line. She also leads the Lady Lancers in steals (63) and blocked shots (36). Longwood's second leading career scorer (1,249 points) she is second to Turner in rebounds (792).

Averaging 13.7 points and 10.6 rebounds, Turner has pulled down 876 missed shots in her career while scoring 1,091 points. She has accumulated 99 assists and 42 steals this season. Turner is Longwood's fifth leading all-time scorer.

Mount St. Mary's forward Lisa Green has been selected as the Mason-Dixon's first Player of the Year for women. Green leads the MDAC in scoring (19.7) and field goal percentage (.596). She also ranks seventh in rebounding (8.2).

Maryland Baltimore County coach Sue Furnary was voted MDAC women's Coach of the Year, after leading her team to a 16-10 overall and 4-4 league record. All of the Mason-Dixon selections were determined by vote of the coaches.

1984-85 Mason-Dixon Women's All-Conference Selections

First Team: Lisa Green, 5-11, Sophomore, Forward, Mount St. Mary's; Terry Solema, 5-11, Senior, Forward, Pitt-Johnstown; Shaun Jackson, 5-11, Senior, Guard, Mount St. Mary's; Florence Holmes, 5-9, Senior, Forward, Longwood; Valerie Turner, 5-8, Senior, Forward, Longwood.

Second Team: Janet Kartovicky, 5-9, Sophomore, Forward, Pitt-Johnstown; Maureen Latterner, 5-3, Senior, Guard, Pitt-Johnstown; Tammy McCarthy, 6-0, Sophomore, Forward, Maryland Baltimore Co.; Patti Gallant, 5-11, Freshman Center, Liberty Baptist; Kori Kindbom, 5-8, Junior, Guard, Maryland

Sunday Brunch Approved—In a vote taken last Tuesday night in the New Smoker it was decided to end the Sunday morning breakfast and expand the lunch period from 11:00 until 1:00 and serve both breakfast and lunch courses. As whenever change or progress is made there are some who would rather stick with the old ways and this issue is no different. For those who oppose the change there will be a meeting of the Dining Hall Committee Thursday at 3:00 in Blackwell Dining Hall to further discuss the change presently slated to go into effect upon our return from the Spring Break.

Temperatures Soar—As the temperatures here in Virginia climbed up into the seventies Longwood students jumped at the opportunity to begin work on the tans. The roofs of most of the dorms were opened for sunning and viewing. For most it was an excellent excuse to partake in favorite excesses. A slight damper was put on some of the recreating though when the owners of Wilkes Lake (Across from Pizza Hut) chained off the entrance.

Blood Drive III Supported—The Red Cross' Blood Drive last week suffered from a general lack of support by both Longwood faculty and students. The Red Cross had initially set a goal of between 125 to 140 pints each day but with slight "donor support" the Longwood drive was only able to collect 205 pints for the two day affair. Teresa Alvis, Vice President of Geist, reported that in the past there has consistently been better turnouts but that the Winter drive is usually not as strongly supported as the Fall drive. Approximately 240 donated blood.

Dance for Muscular Dystrophy—Starting at 6 p.m. on the 29th of March in the lower Dining Hall is the Superdance for Muscular Dystrophy. This is a great opportunity for insomniacs, hyperactive students, and general disco fools to meet people and have a good time helping those less fortunate than themselves. Hope to see you there.

Hankinson Named Top Player

By Jim Winkler

Senior Dayna Hankinson scored her career-high all-around score (34.40) at William and Mary last week, and for her efforts was named the Longwood College Player of the Week for the period February 15-22. Player of the week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

In the William and Mary meet, Hankinson had Longwood's top score in vaulting, beam, floor and all-around. Overall, the senior placed 2nd in beam and floor, scoring 8.85 and 8.7 respectively.

Hankinson has been scoring well in all events this season and has been a good leader all year.

"Dayna has put it all together and is performing well," said Longwood coach Ruth Budd. "She is doing better on beam than ever before and has had several meets in a row with no falls."

In the team's first eight meets Hankinson has scored Longwood's top score on beam six times. In every meet this year, the senior has finished either first or second among Longwood gymnasts in all-around.

Hankinson holds the school record on beam, 8.9 which she set her first year at Longwood. During that same season she advanced to the AIAW Nationals and placed 14th on floor.

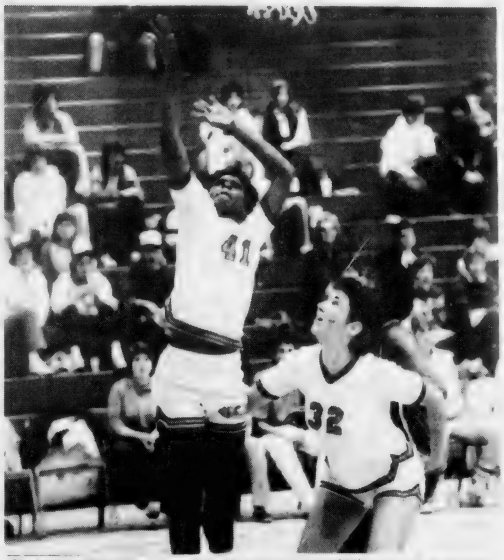
Hankinson's efforts have helped the Lancers' chances of gaining a berth in the NCAA Division II Southeast Regionals.

Lady Lancers Fall To 15-11

Longwood's hopes for post season play in women's basketball came to a screeching halt with two losses last week, and the Lady Lancers must regroup for three tough road contests this week.

Now 15-11 overall and 3-4 in the Mason-Dixon Conference, Longwood plays at league champ Pittsburgh-Johnstown Tuesday night and then takes part in the Liberty Invitational Friday and Saturday at Liberty Baptist. Longwood, the Lady Flames, Maryland Baltimore County and Mount St. Mary's are slated to participate in the tournament.

While the exact pairings are not known, Longwood will likely be playing at 5:30 Friday while host Liberty Baptist plays at 7:30. Consolation and championship games are set for 1:00 and 3:00 Saturday afternoon.



Longwood got off to a great start last week with an 80-73 win over Radford Monday night. Mary Washington put an end to Longwood's eight-game winning streak Thursday night 69-67 and Mount St. Mary's beat the Lady Lancers 83-49 Saturday afternoon in Emmitsburg, MD. Longwood coach Shirley Duncan said the officiating Saturday was the most biased she has ever seen.

"They (the officials) never gave us a chance," said Duncan. "It was incredible."

Duncan cited the fact that Longwood was called for 18 second half fouls and the Mount just three. For the game the Lady Lancers were charged with 32 fouls and the Mount 13. While Longwood made 9-10 free throws, MSM converted 29-49.

Duncan said that many of Longwood's 40 turnovers were walking or three-second calls.

"Our players were very frustrated," said the coach.

SHARPSHOOTER—Longwood's Melaine Lee (41) goes up for two of the 21 points she scored in 80-73 win over Radford last Monday.

Incredibly, Longwood got just four points from its top three scorers, Florence Holmes, Caren Forbes and Valerie Turner, who normally account for over 42 points per contest. Turner failed to score in limited playing time, Holmes had two points and Forbes two.

Center Karen Boska tallied 14 points, Beth Ralph had 11 and Kellie Jordan scored 10. Freshman center Barbie Burton had 11 rebounds and five points. Longwood had beaten the Mount earlier 99-94 in double overtime.

Longwood blew a seven-point halftime lead and played flat in losing to Mary Washington 69-67 Thursday night. Holmes had 22 points and 11 rebounds, sophomore Melanie Lee had 18 points and 13 rebounds and Forbes scored 16 points.

Lee Coming On Strong

Most improved of Longwood's cagers has to be Melanie Lee, who had an incredible string of nine straight standout performances prior to Saturday's loss at the Mount. Lee, a 5-11 forward, made 58 of 92 shots from the floor (63 percent) and scored 128 points (14.2 avg.) over a nine-game stretch. She improved her shooting percentage from 35.5 to 48.1 and raised her scoring average to 7.7 fourth best on the team.

Lee had 21 points on 10-12 shooting from the floor in last Monday's big win over Radford.

Baseball Team Opens On The Road

Longwood will unveil its 1985 baseball team this week with a nine-game road trip to North and South Carolina stretching from Wednesday through Sunday.

The Lancers, a team laden with veterans, play at St. Andrews for a single game Wednesday in Laurinburg, N. C. and then tackle four straight doubleheaders in South Carolina. Francis Marion is Thursday's foe, Morris Friday, Benedict Saturday and Allen University Sunday. Longwood plays at Hampden-Sydney Wednesday, March 6.

For the fourth straight year the Longwood baseball team expects to be a contender for the NCAA Division II Playoffs. The Lancers, 85-30-1 over the past three seasons, have qualified for the NCAA Tournament two of those years, winning the South Atlantic Region crown in 1982 and finishing third in the 1984 tournament.

Coach Charles (Buddy) Bolding (144-66-1 in six years) has seven of nine regular starters returning, plus his top five pitchers from a team that went 32-11 in 1984. To replace departed All-American shortstop John Sullivan, Bolding has freshman Kelvin Davis. Lawter is a tri-captain and three-year starter while Mayone made the All-South Atlantic Region potentially the top recruit in Longwood history. Davis was the MVP of AAA (VA) State champ Halifax Co. High School and hit .454 his senior year.

"I feel real good about this team," says Bolding. "We were very young last year but still did well enough to make the playoffs. We have a veteran ball club now, and we anticipate earning yet another NCAA Tournament berth this season."

Bolding has an abundance of talent to work with. Expected to share time at first base and designated hitter are senior Allen Lawter (.264, 28 RBI's, 6 homers) and soph Jeff Mayone (.398, 52 RBI's, 9 homers). and Tournament teams last season.

Other veteran infielders include junior Todd Thompson (.329, 23 RBI's) at second base, soph Jeff Rohm (.363, 29 RBI's, 6 HRs) at catcher and sophomore Marty Ford (.362, 32 RBI's, 29-35 stolen bases) at third base. Thompson and Rohm were third team All-Region while Ford made the South Atlantic All-Tournament squad.

Kelvin Davis is the lone freshman in Longwood's starting lineup. An excellent defensive performer at shortstop, Davis has the rare combination of speed and power.

The veteran outfield will be comprised of junior Dennis Leftwich (.379, 33 RBI's, 43-44 stolen bases) in center, junior Mike Haskins (.407, 22 RBI's, 14-14 stolen bases) in right and junior Tommy Walsh (.270, 21 RBI's) in left. Leftwich made All Region and ranked third among Division II base-stealers, while Haskins was named Virginia Player of the Year. Walsh played in 31 games last season, and should be a solid performer.

Longwood's pitching staff set a school record for complete games (26) last season, and five of six return from that group. Junior Scott Mills established school marks for complete games with nine and innings pitched with 89.3. Mills is a righthander.

Junior lefthander Todd Ashby has a 6-3 record and hurled Longwood's 2-1 win over ACC member Virginia. Also effective in relief, Ashby earned a pair of saves last season. A major factor as a freshman last season, Tony Browning had a 6-1 record and a team low ERA of 4.05. Mills, Ashby and Browning were the Lancers' top starters a year ago.

Sophomore righthanders Rob Furth (5-0) and Sam Hart (3-0) were unbeaten as freshmen. Coach Bolding has high hopes for Furth as one of his main starters while Hart will be a relief specialist.

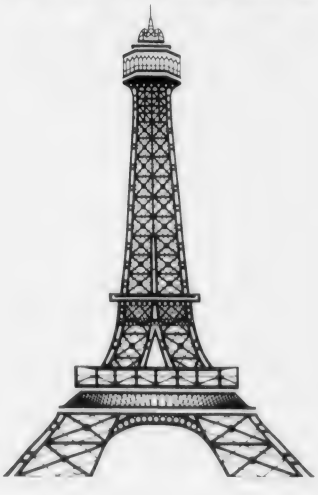
Freshmen hurlers Tony Beverley, a lefthander, and Dale Weaver, a righthander with a side-arm delivery, showed a lot of potential in fall workouts.

Gymnasts Finish Third; Host Towson Sunday

By Jim Winkler

The Longwood gymnastics team finished third in the Virginia State Meet Sunday afternoon at William and Mary.

Four teams competed in the meet with Radford taking the championship with 170.25. William and Mary finished second with 168.85 and was followed by Longwood (163.85) and James Madison (157.30). Radford's score was a new state meet record.



Kelly Strayer and Dayna Hankinson led the Lancers. Strayer placed 2nd on floor (8.90), 4th on bars (8.40) and 5th in all-around (33.80). The junior finished 7th in vaulting (8.65), which was the highest Longwood score in the event.

Hankinson scored the teams top score on beam (8.40), which finished her 8th overall in the event. Hankinson tied for 6th in all-around, scoring 33.70.

Freshman Leslie Jaffee (Springfield) missed action Sunday due to an appendictis attack. The freshman had her appendix removed early Sunday morning in Williamsburg.

Sophomore Kerri Hruby was unable to compete due to an ankle injury suffered last week.

LC Beauty Pageant

There is great comfort in knowing that one may never again witness so banal an event as the 1985 Miss Longwood Pageant. Billed as "one of Virginia's best local pageants," Saturday evening's show was rather an exercise in exploitation of these ten women who stood on the Jarman Stage.

The notion of a beauty pageant—and there is no escaping the simple fact that the Miss Longwood Pageant is first and foremost a "beauty match"—brings to my mind images of tanned, sultry women in long flowing gowns and skimpy beach attire prancing about on stage to impress a group of slobbering, toothless old men who judge women by some subjective indicators perhaps as base as we can imagine them to be. Admittedly, however, my mind is that of a semi-pro cynic, and the average Longwood student may see the pageant as something entirely different—more halos, I suppose.

At any rate, my theme here is exploitation and I shan't quibble over such minor interpretative differences; the Miss Longwood Pageant exploits the women who participate in it—never mind the fact that they volunteer for this madness—it is a foot race for a $1,500 purse in which the contestants must show their bodies to a supposedly objective group of judges hoping for top bids.

Talent is not an issue here, though the proponents of any pageant will always claim it to be. The talent competition in our beauty pageant is but a paltry attempt to justify the rest of the travesty before us. If this extravaganza were indeed a scholarship program as it has been called, there would be no need for the scholarly young bodies in the competition to parade about on stage in bathing suits. There would be no need for an evening gown competition which limits one's potential to one's assets. There would be no need for this farce at all.

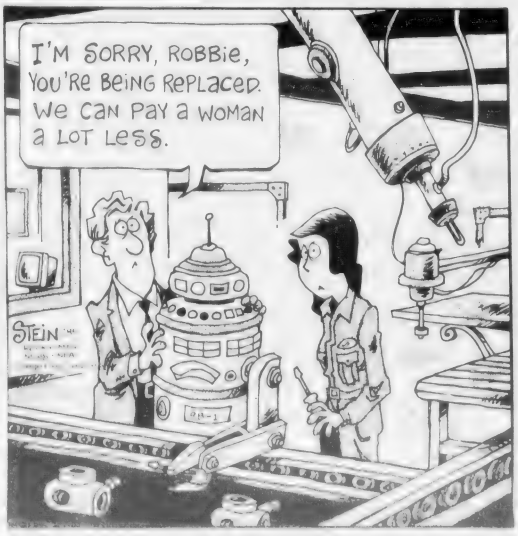
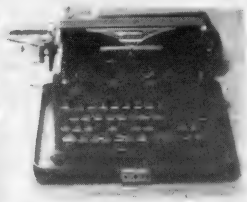
Your Turn

To the Editor:



There is something incredibly wrong with the mentality of the people whose lives are so securely embedded in the functions of our democracy. The cornucopia of living in America is for you. You are the ones with the opportunity of attending college and/or working to make your lives more profitable. To those of you who placed the rotting carcass of the dog in front of the New Smoker: Your actions have spoken.



At some point in your lives, it may be that you will be painfully trying to exist on whatever crumbs and water you can get your hands on. Believe it or not, outside your comfortable, secure, and well-fed lives, there are people starving to death. It's not happening only in Africa, it's all over—it's here in this democracy that survives for your benefit!

PLEASE!!! Put your money and your energies where your sick jokes are. Instead of making worthless statements with decaying flesh, please help those who are desperately fighting to stay alive!

To Blackwell Dining Hall: The improvements in the quality and preparations of our meals are greatly appreciated!

Houseknecht On Spring Fashions

By Eric T. Houseknecht

Last Wednesday was the first day of spring, a time when students (myself included) invariably ignored the better advice of their mothers and did not wait until Memorial Day to break out their spring fashions. Shorts of all lengths and styles were seen atop legs varying in pigment from "savage tan" to those whiter than fish bellies. The sunniest of days had precocious students donning their Ray-bans, not for protection from the sun, but rather to ward off the glare from those offensively pale shins getting their first exposure of the year.

You, the men of the Longwood community, slaves to fashion that you are (could anything be more obvious?) are undoubtedly asking yourselves, "What will the well-dressed man be wearing this spring?" and "How does my current collection of duds stack up?" I must admit that there are disconcerting moments when the truth about my wardrobe is impressed on me. About a month ago the clerk at the dry-cleaners looked me over and said, "You know, we narrow lapels for ten dollars, and that includes cleaning."

That comment really struck a nerve. It ended the brief, but nonetheless joyful period in my life when I had felt good about my wardrobe. Last semester I read a New York Times interview with an incredibly well-bred patrician. Asked where he bought his clothes, he smiled and replied: "People of our sort do not buy clothes. We have them."

That sent a rush of joy through me because I too, do not buy clothes. I simply have them. I certainly do not remember picking them out in any store. Unfortunately, my euphoria lasted only about one minute. It occurred to me that a major difference existed between me and the patrician: The only people who ever ask me where I buy my clothes do so with a smirk exposing their disdain for my family's preference towards plaid.

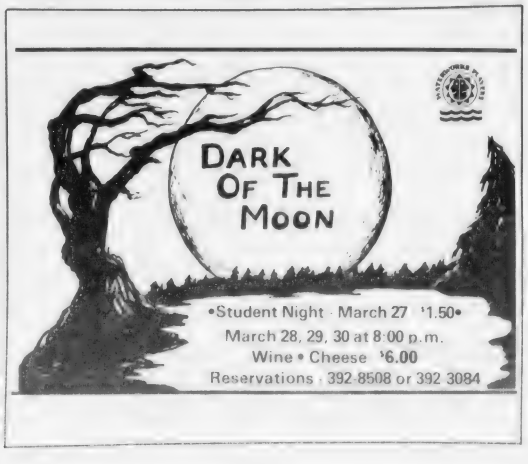
Please understand, I am not ideologically opposed to the following of fashion. The belief that real men do not drink white wine or dress well is not part of my psychological baggage. Every morning I spend considerable time trying to decide whether to wear my favorite brown shoes or my other brown ones. I have a dresser drawer filled with socks of many colors that, while I rarely wear them, I certainly own but just as certainly never bought.

Still, like every other American male, I keep up with fashion. Every fall when the fashion supplements come out, with their pictures of male models in sleek Italian suits and nubby sportswear, I take out one of my wrinkled plaid sport coats and strike a Continental pose before the mirror. Somehow it's not the same.

So, you see, we seriously antiquated dressers are not unaware of contemporary culture. And yet, you may not realize how difficult it is for us to tolerate a world where a man's clothes are judged by how recently he bought them. Modishly dressed men seem unaware that their addiction to newness betrays a spiritual inferiority. The carefully casual dresser would never admit it to these dandies, but he is proud of his wardrobe's antiquity. If he shopped for clothes, it would be at Sotheby's.

Take for instance, the trusted old suit with its elegant patina, which the uninstructed might call a shine. Either your suit has it or it doesn't. The chronic bag at the knee is another true sign of style, one of the innumerable ways in which old-clothes loyalists flash a sign of recognition to one another. In fact, any hint of press is a dead giveaway, an admission that one's wardrobe dates from the Post-Polyester era.

Shirts, of any style, must appear to be gifts. Shoes should almost always be brown, though scuffy black is appropriate for formal wear, and since spring is here, one will no longer be considered peacocky for sporting shoes of a very dingy white. One item that the purposely bad dresser must own is an outdated tuxedo; the lapels being either too wide or too narrow.



You may have noticed fantasy creeping in here. Perhaps I still harbor illusions about being mistaken for a member of the old-clothes aristocracy. I have, in fact, a recurrent dream in which a reporter from Town and Country comes to interview me. I am togged out in tweedy, nondescript brown. The interviewer, a person of some taste, if no background, clearly admires my spotted tie but tries to hide his envy by asking about my wrinkled trousers. I tell him that men of my stature do not have their pants pressed; we send them away to a little shop in Saville Row to have them specially crumpled. Our closets are stocked with vintage clothes acquired, we forget how, shortly after the last Crusade.

I will inform the interviewer that I myself, own a particularly well-aged pair of white flannel tennis trousers that I break out on special occasions. I also, of course, have a brown pair. But, sorry, I can't really remember where my clothes come from. I simply have them.

Rotunda models Frank Raio, Mick Baker, Eric Houseknecht, and Michelle Williams demonstrate this spring's risque attire.

Across The Nation

Campus Events

Stock Weapons, Not Suicide Pills, says a University of Texas conservative student group. The Texas Review Society, formed in 1983 to publish a conservative journal, is passing around petitions urging the university to stockpile guns. The purpose of the effort, says group members, is to show how ludricous cyanide pill petitions are. A UT student senator recently started circulating a suicide pill petition on the Austin campus.

Freshmen Come To College expecting to become doctors, lawyers, and writers, but many shift their interest to business and teaching by the time they're seniors. That's one indication of a Stanford Univ. study which surveyed one in five graduating seniors. Among 1981 graduates, the proportion seeking business careers grew from 17% to 29%; those planning to teach jumped to 10% from 5.7%.

Hart, Torricelli Wants All Students In 'National Youth Service'—Colorado Sen. Gary Hart and Rep. Robert G. Torricelli, D-N.J., introduced identical plans into the Senate and the House requiring young men and women to serve at least one year in national domestic or military service.

The "national youth service" would require 12 to 24 months of service, and issue penalties for non-compliance.

University of Texas-Austin Students Want Campus Disarmed—More than 200 students have signed a petition to remove an unarmed missile and cannon from the grounds of the ROTC building.

"There's no justification for the things being there," says Scott McLemee, petition sponsor. "All they do is promote aggression."

Temple University Ordered To Ban On-Campus Army Recruitment—Responding to complaints that the Army discriminates against homosexuals, the Philadelphia Human Relations Commission told Temple officials to keep army recruiters off campus, or risk violating the city's Fair Practice Ordinance which protects gay rights.

R.I.P. MTV At B.Y.U.—Condemning rock music videos for containing "sex, drugs, witchcraft and the bizarre," Mormon bishops banned MTV in Brigham Young University housing.

Students are circulating a petition to reinstate the cable channel.

Communications Gap Nets Tutition Refund—The University of Pittsburgh awarded $88 refunds to nine student who claimed they shouldn't have to pay for a math class taught by two foreign-born grad students with thick accents.

The accents, they said, made it impossible to understand what was being taught.

Notes From All Over—At the suggestion of a campus newspaper columnist, a capacity crowd in Duke University's cafeteria hurled home fries, mashed potatoes, spaghetti, chicken nuggets and various veggies. Officials claim the food fight was not a protest of cafeteria food. . .Termites revolted in Nichols State's cafeteria, pouring out of the walls during lunch hour. A local exterminator says the swarm was looking for a warmer residence. . .Michigan State University horticulturists claim they're national leaders in pickle production mechanization and "one of the top two or three in overall pickle research."

The Party's Over At U.S.C.—A Number of Asian Pacific student organizations lost on-campus party privileges after a flurry of fist fights and marijuana smoking broke up the groups' January parties.

The "indefinite moratorium" will last until student activities director Nadine Felix-Olmsted meets with law enforcement officials and organization spokesmen to improve security.

Computer-Assisted Grade Tampering Makes Fake Diploma Scams Obsolete—No one knows the extent of electronic grade tampering, but Rep. William Hughes, D-N.J., sponsor of a computer crime measure passed by the last Congress, says schools could lose credibility if the problem isn't documented.

A spokesman for the Los Angeles County district attorney's office warned schools to increase security measures to avoid such recent incidents as faked transcripts planted in the Univ. of Southern California's computer, and the attempted access to Stanford's computer by a high school sophomore.

THINK.

U. Maryland Stops the Search

University of Maryland officials now have stopped searching students as they emerge from campus cafeterias, figuring students have learned not to steal silverware.

"We curtailed the stealing," reports Matthew Sheriff, director of food services at the College Park campus, where students have lifted about 15,000 glasses and 25,000 pieces of silverware and stolen countless sandwiches since fall term started.

"We wanted to make students aware they couldn't take food out," he explains.

The way he did it, however, was to have campus officials search students for food and utensils as they left the cafeterias.

"It's an invasion of my personal privacy," freshman Steve Broadman told The Diamondback, the student newspaper, after his bookbag was searched. "From what I know about the law, I think it's illegal."

The searches may be "on shaky ground," agrees campus legal aid director William Salmond.

Most colleges figure students will steal food and supplies equivalent to three to seven percent of sales, says Don Jacobs, president-elect of the National Association of College and University Food Services.

And most control theft by using computerized records to monitor purchases and inventories, Jacobs adds.

At the University of Pennsylvania, where Jacobs is dining services director, computerized records help "students know that if they steal something, we'll find out about it pretty quick," Jacobs says.

But food and utensil theft is getting to be so bad that schools nationwide are relying less on student honor codes and more on stiff fines to control it, he notes.

Jacobs questions whether searches help, however, saying they're inconsistent with college efforts to get students to behave like adults by treating them as adults.

Maryland's Sheriff says the policy permitting him to search students' bags and packages has been "on the books" for a long time, but never instituted until now.

Student Nancy Skinner thinks the issue is more about food than knives and forks.

"(Sheriff) didn't want people taking out sandwiches and apples" because a percentage of their profit is from people who pay for a meal plan and then don't eat," Skinner says.

Two weeks ago, the University of Texas announced its food service was in debt because too many students actually were using their campus meal tickets.

Sheriff says the problem at Maryland was that the theft rate had increased.

He has suspended the searches because the theft problem is "now under control."

"We curtailed the stealing. We wanted to make students aware they can't take food out," Sheriff adds.

"I hope we don't have to do it again, Sheriff said.

Skinner, The Diamondback's assistant managing editor, believes the "public outcry," not the easing of theft, convinced Sheriff to stop the searches.

"A lot of people were upset about it," she says.

A new program of "student supervisors" was instituted this semester by the Dining Service. This program will provide excellent experience for the student supervisors as well as providing improved service to the customers. One of the principal functions of the "student supervisor" is one-to-one communication with student workers. The supervisor should provide a two-way channel of communication between the student workers and the management personnel. "Alot of the people of the S-Un committee were my friends—they could have told me to shape-up, but instead they decided to impeach me before I even had a chance." Darryl Kerkeslager, S-uns ex-president, said after his meeting with S-un officers.

According to Junior Charlie Sanders, who has been with S-un from the very beginning of his stay here at Longwood, the situation has been building for quite some time. "The idea was brought up to me that we could impeach our president," said Sanders, "because we didn't feel that he was living up to his job—just little things at first; like not coming to us until the problem has already happened and there was nothing to do about it and letting his personal ideas get in the way of things that we wanted to do—things that would bring more money into S-un, he doesn't know how to talk to agents, he didn't contact the vice-president that he was leaving for a week and just left his girlfriend in charge, and the list goes on. We still want him to stay in Student Union to work with the next president, whoever it will be, to gain some experience and try to learn from that. He said 'no' and hasn't spoken to any of us since."

On Monday night, March 4, S-un members decided that Kerkeslager was not carrying out his presidential duties. After being told by senior S-un member Charlie Sanders that he was being impeached, Kerkeslager refused to resign until he saw the 260 student signatures required for impeachment of any officer. In addition to the student signatures a ⅔ majority vote by S-un officers was needed, and after much deliberation the ⅔ majority was reached.

According to Sanders and Chris Stott of the S-un committee, Kerkeslager was not at every event, and "the events he did attend he stayed for no more than 20 minutes, and I always ended up meeting the performers myself," Sanders said. "Not to mention," Sanders added, "the fact that Darryl never even worked with our vice-president, Terri Rong. Terri even told me he felt alienated at times."

Kerkeslager, on the other hand, said he felt cheated because he took the position as a

Administration/ Faculty Salaries

Faculty salaries

In keeping with other state school newspapers in Virginia and across the nation, The Rotunda editorial board approved a motion to print the salaries of Longwood's Administration and Faculty. Though we wish to pass these figures on with as little editorial comment as possible, it behooves us to note the vast difference in the salaries of the administration on the upper hand and those of the faculty on the lower. Though hardly surprising, these differences are most appalling to us. In fact, they should indicate insult of grave magnitude not only to faculty members but also to us as students. We ask that you use these not as trivia, but that you question the fairness of a system in which the main business of the College education is placed low on the list of financial priorities.

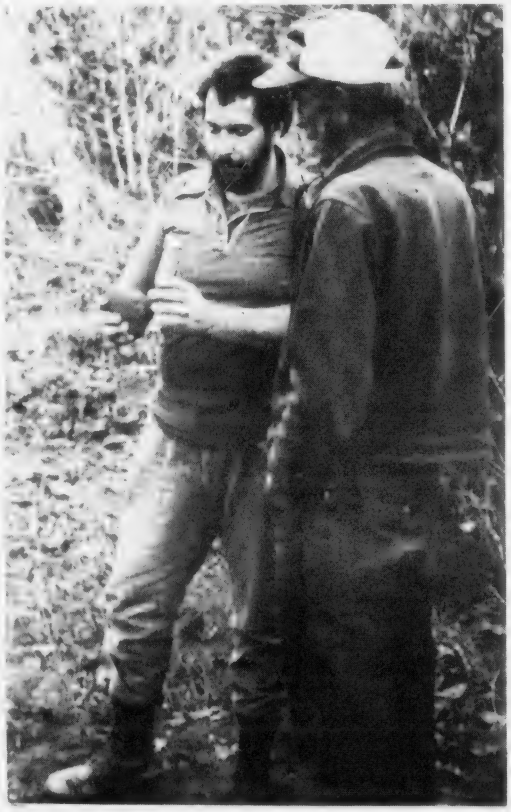
New Site Selected For Archeology Field School

By Eddie Hollander



A new site has been selected for Longwood's Archeology Field School for the summer of 1985. Located in Buckingham County, the Morris Field Archeological Site was selected from among eight potential sites by Dr. James Jordan, Director of the Archeology Field School. Contributing to the selection, said Jordan, in an interview last week, were various indicators of the site's potential including surface evidence of projectile points and pottery shards as well as soil discoloration indicating an area of prehistoric activity. "This site has really got the green light going for it," said Jordan.

In addition to the positive indicators of the site's potential, Jordan noted that possible purchase of the land by the Virginia Park System (Holiday Lake State Park is within a mile of the Morris Site) as well as biannual plowing of the land endanger the prehistoric artifacts embedded there. "It doesn't look like it has much of a chance of surviving," he said.

The Archeology Field School at Longwood began in the summer of 1980 when Jordan and Field School students excavated the Anna's Ridge Site, a "5,000-year-old hunting and gathering basecamp," located twenty miles east of the Longwood campus. Work continued on the Site until the summer of 1982 when the Field School excavated the Willis Mountain Rockshelter Site, a 600-year-old cave located 17 miles north of campus. In the second session of the 1982 Field School, the Smith Taylor-Mound Site, located one mile from Longwood, was excavated. Work was continued at the Smith-Taylor Site through the summer of 1983, when Virginia Governor Charles Robb visited the excavation, and 1984. Over the three years of excavation, artifacts as old as 900 years were unearthed at the site.

The Morris Field Site, located by 1983 LC graduate Cindy Morris, begins to draw to a close the circle around Farmville which Jordan has kept in mind when selecting sites for excavation. "We're aiming for an understanding of the prehistoric activity in our area," he said.

Students may now enroll for either session of Summer Field School. All interested students are invited to gather Wednesday, April 3, from 6 to 6:30 p.m. in Hiner 206 for an introductory meeting. Slides taken at the Morris Site will be shown, and surface artifacts found there will be exhibited. In addition, 20 slides of last summer's excavation at the Smith-Taylor Mound Site will be shown.

Parking Policy Needs Change

By Frank Raio

The parking situation at Longwood College is in bad shape and is not getting any better. At times it is impossible to find a single parking spot; resident students are often forced to park illegally in order to get to class on time. The solution to this problem is simple, it has been employed by other schools and will completely alleviate Longwood's parking hassles. Resident students should not be permitted to bring cars with them during their Freshman year.

The administration, which has ample parking facilities, does not like this obvious remedy. The first and foremost fear is that such a policy would put Longwood at a disadvantage in comparison with other schools in the never-ending competition for prospective students. This is a valid concern, but may easily be dealt with by allowing exceptions to the rule. Exceptions could be granted to students with special needs. For example, freshmen who need transportation for work would be allowed a parking permit. To insure that the new parking policy does not lessen the quality of applicants, exceptions could be granted to, let's say, all freshmen who graduated in the top twenty percent of their high school classes. If these exceptions are stated in all literature that is mailed out to prospective students, the fear that parking restrictions will reduce the quality of applicants to Longwood will be greatly reduced.

An argument can be made that limiting parking for freshmen will increase Longwood's attractiveness to high school seniors over a period of time. High school guidance counselors everywhere are informing their advisees that Longwood is a suitcase college (that's what I was told). Surely this image is more damaging to Longwood than any parking restrictions might be.

I submit that putting limitations on freshman parking would be a step in the right direction towards decreasing the suitcase college syndrome. If freshmen could not bring their cars, they would have no means of transporting suitcases any great distance. It would follow that if these students were forced to create weekend fun right here at Longwood during their first year, good habits would be developed for subsequent years. A reduction in the number of students who migrate on weekends would also lead to a reduction in the number of students who transfer from Longwood in favor of more weekend-oriented schools.

The administration is willing to lose prospective students by prohibiting off-campus housing in order to promote "opportunities for personal growth, development, and education" that group residential living provides. Does this development and growth not occur on weekends as well? Why does this commitment to residential living not extend to attempts to reduce suitcase college syndrome? It seems rather inconsistent.

The extra parking spaces created by even an exception-laden freshman parking policy would greatly reduce the number of tickets that are given to students by police from both the town of Farmville and Longwood. We have been fined thousands of dollars because of this fouled-up parking situation. The motley crew that is the parking appeals committee has little sympathy for our problem, rejecting half of all cases which were thought unjust enough to be sent to them by our apathetic student body.

The fact that the campus police were recently granted permission (by the parking committee) to attach wheel boots to autos which have three unpaid tickets is another reason to correct our parking system. These boots render cars useless and will be shaving buzzes campus-wide in the very near future.

The parking situation is only going to get worse and unless some more asphalt is put down, restrictions on freshman parking is necessary to the future of Longwood College.

Frat Beer & Sex Guide Upends Greeks

University of Florida officials have suspended a fraternity and are likely to probe all the fraternity "little sister" programs on campus after one house started selling a raunchy handbook to students.

The handbook names certain female students, and recommends how many beers it takes to persuade them to engage in sexual intercourse.

Put out by the Beta Theta Pi house and offered for $2 a copy, the book also outlines the sexual escapades of members.

The fraternity says the book was intended as a joke, but university administrators aren't amused.

"Whether it was meant as a joke or as a National Lampoon, we don't find it funny," says assistant student affairs Dean Thomas Dougan.

"It is extremely inappropriate."

The booklet also calls some students "sand niggers and pointy heads," and makes anti-semitic references to others.

In a prepared statement, the fraternity president said the handbook is not an official publication of and is not condoned by the fraternity.

The handbook is "in poor taste," says Thomas Beyer of the national Beta Theta Pi organization.

National fraternity officials can't recall seeing similar handbooks at other schools.

But the head of a group monitoring fraternity hazing practices says she has been told of "dozens and dozens" of similar publications.

"I'm hearing more and more of this type of thing," says Eileen Stevens of Sayville, N. Y., who founded the Committee to Halt Useless College Killings after her son was killed in a fraternity initiation ritual.

But, Stevens says, this is the first time one has been sold publicly.

"In most cases, these things never see the light of day because the girls are embarrassed, the members don't talk about it publicly and there is a secretive shroud covering what goes on at individual chapters," she says.

In this case, Florida suspended Beta Theta Pi for the remainder of 1985, and its "little sister" program for an indefinite period.

The university also may review all such programs at the school.

"Little sister" programs try to involve female students in activities of a fraternity. Most often the females are not sorority members.

But the Fraternity Executives Association says "little sister" programs are "not desirable" because they distract members from fraternity goals.

Stevens says the programs frequently lead to coercion of female members who do not do what fraternity members ask of them.

One UF "little sister" told the student newspaper she is treated like a maid.

Dean of Student Affairs James Scott is to decide within the week whether to launch the campus-wide probe of "little sister" groups.

LC Raises Tuition

Longwood's 1985-86 tuition and fees for in-state residential undergraduate students have been increased by 4.3 percent under a modified meal plan and by 6.9 percent under the traditional meal plan. The total costs for the 1985-86 academic year will be $4,574 and $4,686, respectively.

For out-of-state students, tutition and fees have been raised by 2.6 percent under the modified meal plan and by 4.6 percent for the standard meal approach. The totals are $5,756 and $5,868, respectively.

Total costs for undergraduate day students will increase from $1,851 to $2,018.

Tuition and fees for next year were approved March 15 by the executive committee of the Board of Visitors, which was acting on behalf of the full Board. For the first time, residential Longwood students will have a choice of eating 15 meals a week in the dining hall or the standard 19 meals.

The 15-meal plan will cost $112 less. The alternate plan was instituted at the request of students.

Tutition costs alone will be same for both undergraduate and graduate full-time students, $1,218. This is a $102 reduction for graduate students and reflects the opinion of College officials that the costs are equal at Longwood for educating undergraduate and graduate students.

The Board's executive committee also approved an increase in the Nursery School Fee, from $380 to $400 for the complete session from September to April.

Player Of The Week

Sophomore designated hitter Jeff Mayone helped Longwood's baseball team win two of three games last week and for his performance, Mayone has been chosen Longwood College Player of the Week for the period March 15-22. Player of the Week is picked by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Mayone, a graduate of Morris Knolls High School, is hitting .381 with 19 runs-batted-in and a team high 5 homers to help Longwood's baseball team get off to a 13-2 start in the 1985 season.

"Jeff has given us some outstanding extra-base hitting and many RBI's during the early season," said Lancer coach Buddy Bolding. "His performance at the plate has helped offset a slow start by our pitching staff. He is developing into one of the best hitters we have yet had at Longwood. He also continues to work hard in developing his overall skills."

Lacrosse Team Wins

Longwood's women's lacrosse team benefitted from a balanced scoring attack and solid defense Wednesday afternoon and defeated visiting Mary Washington 12-9 in the season opener. A Sunday game with the University of North Carolina club team was rained out.

On tap for this week are games at Sweet Briar Tuesday (4:00) and at home against Randolph-Macon Woman's College Thursday (4:30).

Scoring for the Lady Lancers in Wednesday's victory were: Kim Rhodes with three goals, and with two goals Mariana Johnson, Rala Heinen, Ellen Cykowski and Sue Goff. Teresa Alvis had one.

"I was very pleased with our opening game performance," said lacrosse coach Carolyn Hodges. "We were able to do some things offensively and the defense looked a lot stronger than I had thought it would."

IAA Update

The Intramural Athletic Association continues this week with tennis, softball and spades.

Men's tennis doubles is underway with 20 teams competing for the title.

There are eight teams remaining in the Spades competition.

Practice games for softball (men's and women's) will be held this week. Teams must sign up in Ller Gym and must show up for the time your team picked or your team will be forfeited from the tournament. There are 44 teams competing in softball this year.

Entry blanks for Superstars Competition, along with an IAA meeting at 6:30 in Lankford, are due on March 27.

Campbell Pitches No-Hitter

By Judy Painter

Senior pitcher M. J. Campbell hurled the first no-hitter in Longwood softball history in the 1985 season opener Thursday afternoon and the Lady Lancers took a 5-2, 15-1 twin bill from visiting Ferrum College at the Farmville Armory field.

Campbell, who pitched her way out of several jams, got solid backing from Longwood's defense for the most part Thursday afternoon. In the nightcap, freshman Andrea Samsky turned in a solid performance, limiting the Panthers to just three hits.

[illegible] were Lisa Hurst with a three-run homer, Bobbi Shuler with two doubles and four RBI's, Betsy Tuesday for a 2:00 doubleheader; host UNC-Greensboro at 3:00 Thursday and visit Averett Saturday.

Rain Silences Lancer Bats

Three days of wet weather accomplished what 32 opposing pitchers have failed to do thus far in the 1985 season—silence Longwood's booming bats.

The Lancers, who topped Maryland Baltimore County Wednesday 12-9, lost three games to the weather Saturday and Sunday as two contests with Mount St. Mary's and one with Shippensburg were postponed because of wet conditions.

This week the 13-2 Lancers are scheduled to host Maryland Eastern Shore Tuesday and visit King and Tusculum Saturday and Sunday for a pair of weekend doubleheaders. Looming on the horizon is a trip to Charlottesville to take on the Virginia Cavaliers Tuesday, April 2. Longwood took a hard-earned 2-1 victory at UVA last season.

Lancers Sport .359 Team Batting Average

When the Lancers pounded three UMBC pitchers for 15 hits and 12 runs Wednesday it marked the 10th time in 15 games that the team has scored 10 or more runs this season. Sporting the red-hot .359 team batting average, Longwood has now stretched to 89 its streak of no-shutout games. The Lancers haven't been blanked since the end of the 1982 season.

Leading the assault in Wednesday's victory was the heart of the Lancer batting order. Jeff Rohm, Jeff Mayone, Allen Lawter and Kelvin Davis the number three, four, five and six hitters, accounted for 10 hits, two homers, three doubles and seven runs-batted-in.

Rohm, Davis and Mayone had three hits apiece while Lawter blasted a 3-run homer in the fourth inning when the Lancers took a commanding 11-3 lead. Rohm, who had two doubles, drove in a pair of runs in the fourth with his first two-bagger. He now has nine doubles and a sizzling .489 batting average.

Davis Leading Hitter

Davis, a freshman who hits like a senior, upped his batting average to .513, tops on the team. Mayone ripped his fifth homer and upped his batting average to .381 in the win over UMBC. Mayone has 19 RBI's, but trails Lawter who leads the club with 23 and is hitting .435.

Todd Ashby picked up the win for Longwood with ninth inning relief help from Tony Browning. Ashby retired 18 of the 21 batters he faced from the third through the eighth inning, but ran out of gas in the ninth when UMBC rallied for five runs. Browning struck out the final batter to end the game. Ashby is 3-1 for the year.

Browning extended his string of innings wih no walks to 21 for the season. The sophomore righthander is 3-0 with a 3.00 earned run average, tops among Longwood pitchers with 20 or more innings of work.

Sociology Major Contributes To Hospice Organization

By Dierdre McKendry

Dane Bragg, a senior Sociology major at Longwood, is participating in the "Directed Study in Hospice Organization and Planning Program." This study is aimed at enhancing aid and comfort for the terminally ill in the Farmville area.

Bragg, who is working with Dr. Chet Ballard as his advisor, feels that his background as a Sociology major has proven helpful and interesting regarding his work with a hospice: "The most useful thing I have learned was from my 'Social Research' course, which applies Sociology more than theory." His curriculum has also included "Introduction to the Human Services," and "Social Problems" where the topic of the hospice has been discussed. Having decided to follow up on his study of the hospice, Bragg is participating in the Directed Study program by working with a hospice organization and helping it to become a reality.

In the formation of the hospice organization, Ballard will be working with Bragg by having meetings to facilitate the development of the new service. As board member of the organization now being formed, Ballard will make an effort to dictate what the services of the organization will be. He is working at creating a structure that will become the hospice as well as informing people exactly what services will be offered.

Also assisting Bragg in the hospice program is the Rev. Rogers Laudermilk, a Longwood graduate who now presides over a circuit of churches in the Charlotte-Prince Edward County area. He is helping by acting as Chairman of the Board of Directors for Hospice and is looked to as the leader of the organization. Laudermilk makes sure meetings are held to evaluate the stage of development the hospice is in. He then works with Bragg over the telephone as both discuss what needs to be done about this development.

Bragg's work in the program involves the study of other hospices, including his visiting two such services in the Richmond area with Rev. Laudermilk. He also has been in contact with Southside Community Hospital because of their training for volunteers of "Hospice of Southside Virginia, Inc." Bragg is involved in the training program for volunteers of this new hospice. In addition, he is also working on a brochure to let the people of Prince Edward County know exactly what a hospice is.

Even though the hospice for the Prince Edward County area (also serving six adjoining counties) will not be in operation for about six more months, volunteers are already being encouraged to participate. The "New Horizons Hospice" is the name which has been given to this new organization. Professional people in the area qualified to do counseling, such as physicians, clergy, and nurses will do the official work for such care that a terminally ill person will certainly require; of course, all people are encouraged to help the hospice patients, as this program will be on a volunteer basis. Students from the colleges in the area are urged to participate in the program, as well as others able to lend their time for these patients. It basically involves spending time with the patient, giving comfort and assistance, transporting the patient, and taking care of the patient when family members are not able to.

What Bragg hopes to gain from his efforts in the formation of this new hospice is experience in counseling or administrative work, among his other interests in Sociology. Working with the Directed Study program has interested him in the possibility of working with a local hospice when he graduates. He is also considering working in Richmond where there are three hospices already in operation.

Artist of the Month

Sarah Kramer, a junior from Williamsburg, is Longwood College's Artist of the Month for March.

Her winning work is an illustration "obtained from a photograph using a grid method," she said. She used a combination of acrylic paints and markers and "flat shades of color values to create a feeling of abstraction."

Ms. Kramer received a $50 cash award, and her work is on display in Longwood's Bedford Art Building through the month of March.

An art major with a concentration in graphic design, Ms. Kramer hopes to continue her studies in graduate school after she receives her degree from Longwood in 1986. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Kramer of Williamsburg.

The Artist of the Month competition is open to all students enrolled in art classes at Longwood. The winner is selected by members of the college's art faculty.

Second and third place winners for March are Cindy Southall and Patty Dewey.

Grateful Dead Concerts: Spent Doin' Time. .

Special to The Rotunda

By Phillip Tate
Style Magazine

Last Thursday and Friday nights, March 21 and 22, The Grateful Dead began their annual spring tour at the Hampton Coliseum. From the looks and sounds of things, their swing up the east coast should have devoted fans rejoicing and begging for more.

Thursday night, however, the band encountered some sound problems that persisted (to a lesser extent) into Friday night's show. During the first two sets, power was lost in several speakers at different intervals. The overall mix was somewhat muddy, and the band seemed unsure as a result. The opening song—"Alabama Getaway"—saw the band in fine form, and had the festive crowd on its feet and cheering immediately. The remainder of the set consisted of more laid back selections such as "Tennessee Jed" and "They Love Each Other," which were received with equal enthusiasm.

During the second set, however, the band seemed to have lost much of its fire; possibly because of the technical difficulties. Standards such as "China Cat Sunflower," "I Know You Rider," and "The Wheel" were tossed off without much flare. During their traditional presentation of improvisational sound effects punctuated with an off-the-cuff drum solo, boredom settled in. Guitarist Jerry Garcia and company seemed unable to find an intriguing musical theme to settle into. With the exception of a bouncy version of Chuck Berry's "Johnny B. Goode" and the hypnotic "Wharf Rat," it appeared that the psychedelic sextet had lost all interest in keeping the night's festivities afloat.

Fortunately, Friday night was a different story. The sound mixing had improved markedly, although trouble continued with keeping power going through a few of the speakers. With the opening of the funky "Feel Like A Stranger," it was apparent that the band meant business. The Dead's unique mixture of country, jazz, folk, acid and hard rock was delivered with a brisk up-beat punch. Garcia was in top flight with his melodically flowing inventive guitar licks, rising and falling with the audience's response and never lapsing into repetition. Bassist Phil Lesh, and drummers Mickey Hart and Bill Kreutzman provided snappy rhythm throughout, while guitarist Bob Weir matched Garcia's flowing solos with clear counterpoint. Keyboardist Brent Mydland kept toes tapping with his wildly careening solos. Highlights of the evening included "Sugar Magnolia," "Ship of Fools," "Cassady," "Don't Ease Me In," and "Terrapin Station."

The Grateful Dead has been a functioning unit for well over 20 years and as such has a vast repertoire of songs. Friday evening's show contained no songs done the previous night, which is a welcome change from the formula set by touring bands that make up the overwhelming majority of the music world. They have the advantage of an extremely loyal following that attend concerts at every opportunity. A night as potentially disappointing as Thursday night is something which Dead's fans easily forgive, sighting the evening as a "warming-up" period for the rest of the tour. If Friday night is any indication, this springtime party tour is going to be a winner.

Grad Admission Scores Decline

Students hoping to become college teachers are scoring lower on their grad school entrance exams than other students, a new study shows.

"The doctoral degree programs are not attracting the best and the brightest any more," concludes Clifford Adelman, who wrote the report on the test scores for the National Institute of Education.

His study found grad school entrance exam scores have declined nationwide since 1982, particularly among liberal arts students likely to become teachers.

Adelman believes the decline indicates undergraduates in disciplines such as history and political science are more likely to skip graduate school and go directly into the job market or professional programs such as law.

"Students perceive that academic life is not as attractive as other lives," he says.

Although Graduate Record Examination (GRE) test scores have declined as a whole since 1962, the decline varies widely among disciplines, Adelman says.

Political science majors' scores have dropped sharply, while those of mathematics, economics, chemistry and engineering majors have held steady or risen slightly.

Most grad schools use the GRE as an admissions test. The exam focuses on certain thought patterns—such as deductive reasoning and the use of smybolic systems—that are more common in some disciplines than others.

But Adelman believes another factor is that the brightest political science majors are not even taking the GRE test because they're not going on to grad school.

If true, the quality of teaching in many academic disciplines is in jeopardy, Adelman says.

"If we're not putting the quality students into the pipeline of academia now, we're going to face a dismal situation in the 1990s," he predicts.

Adelman's report shows test scores declined precipitously from 1962 to 1970, only to resume falling at a more moderate clip around 1976.

Changes in test questions and scoring methods may help explain the declines, Adelman says.

But changes in demographic variables such as age, race or gender—which are cited frequently to explain the decline of test scores in high school students—don't influence GRE test scores, Adelman says.

"Only in combination with undergraduate majors do these variables begin to offer plausible hypotheses of influence on test score trends," he says.

When Students Become Criminals

(First in a Series)

ITEM: Twenty-three Penn State U. students allegedly participated in a campus burglary ring, stealing computer parts, appliances, food, and other items worth over $6,000. Authorities said the students stole "for thrill and adventure."

ITEM: A U. of Illinois student was indicted last spring in connection with a shooting spree. A local police SWAT team spent seven hours trying to arrest the student, who had barricaded himself in his apartment. He was also indicted on theft and burglary charges.

ITEM: Sexual assault charges against college students are being filed with increasing frequency.

ITEM: An Ohio State U. student was convicted of passing $300 in counterfeit bills in the Columbus area. He was ordered to make restitution, and put on two years probation.

ITEM: Two U. of Texas students were charged this fall with committing a series of robberies, reportedly to raise money for college expenses. One resigned the cheerleading squad after his arrest.

Incidents such as these prompt many to comment that the Ivory Tower is not more—that campuses are now merely micro-cosms of society, complete with their share of student criminals.

But a random sample of campus police chiefs, security directors and judicial officers reveals little consensus on the idea. "It's a hotly debated issue, here and elsewhere," says U. of Delaware Director of Student Life Timothy Brooks. "We've certainly seen a significant rise in cases going through the judicial process hre, but it's hard to say that's because crime is going up."

One thing that stops Brooks and others from making a definitive statement on the issue is a lack of statistics: The only national crime report kept is the FBI-Uniform Crime Report, released annually. Although it has included a separate report on campus crime since 1980, that report covers less than 20 percent of campuses nationally. "It's the best measure—and the worst, in a way," says Jerry Hudson, past president of the International Association of Campus Law Enforcement Administrators, and security director at the U. of North Caorlina-Charlotte. "Crime patterns vary widely between two-year campuses and four-year residential schools, between public and private schools, between urban and rural schools. It would take me a month of Sundays to really figure out the numbers involved, but yes, I do feel that real crime by students is up considerably."

Many campuses are experiencing more frequent reports made on campus crime now, but that doesn't necessarily mean more crime occurs, insist some campus officials. "Beginning in the latter '70s, schools began revising their disciplinary codes, making them stricter, with less proceduralism," says Gary Pavela of the U. of Marvland. "Those new codes worked better than the old systems, and inspired more faith on the part of faculty, administrators and students to reports crimes." Pavela believes that's one reason his campus has seen a 15 percent increase in judicial cases within the last year. Hudson adds that growing professionalism on the part of campus police also produces more reports: "We're stressing crime awareness more, and that means we're inviting people to come to us with more problems."

The U. of Delaware judicial system handled 704 caes last year, and 524 in the fall of 1984 alone, says Brooks. But he believes that students, like society at large, "are becoming must less tolerant of inappropriate behavior," and more likely to report their peers for disruptive activity.

Attributing the increase in crime to greater reporting doesn't relieve universities and colleges from dealing with the problem of handling more disciplinary cases, however. That's a two-fold problem: It involves protecting the campus at large, and safeguarding the rights of the accused. Also in need of protection is the reputation of the school, as no campus wants to be known as a high-crime area.

In coming issues, we'll examine these problems and look at: The new breed of student conduct codes; the Buckley Amendment vs. public access to information; and growing concern over violence against minorities, women, and homosexuals.

Now They See The Light

Pre-professional students of yesteryear are signaling a warning for today's career-oriented collegians.

Executives, engineers, barristers, medical profesionals and even retirees are returning in droves to colleges and universities in pursuit of a liberal education, according to Nancy Musorafite of the Association of American Colleges.

This growing trend's message to today's pre-professinal students is that, "Once they study that narrow curriculum they will have to go back to school to get that enlightenment that they missed," says Musorafite. "We are hoping that undergraduates will see this and say, 'Hey, maybe we'd better study this now.'"

In programs ranging from William College's five-week summer session to Brandeis U.'s one-day literature seminars, professionals from a wide variety of fields are gathering to confront subjects such as Shakespeare, foreign policy, and the effect of science on [illegible] to [illegible] stress-related problems of boredom, burnout and tunnel vision by rediscovering the values and perspectives found in the liberal arts.

Executives who attend the Williams College program "confront a whole new battery of fields which shake up their prejudices and previously conceived orientations," says Director Fred Greene. "It is an intellectually challening, and often disturbing, experience for them." Those attending include executives from General Motors, IBM, Mobile and Columbia Pictures.

Musorafite sees this as a powerfully growing trend, noting, for example, that the U. of Missouri-St. Louis can't find enough instructors to keep up with demand for its program teaching executives how to write. "The needs of non-traditional students are becoming clear to universities," she says. "Non-traditional students are hungry for intellectual [illegible] and creative outlets."

New Interim S.A. Director: On The Move

By Barrett Baker

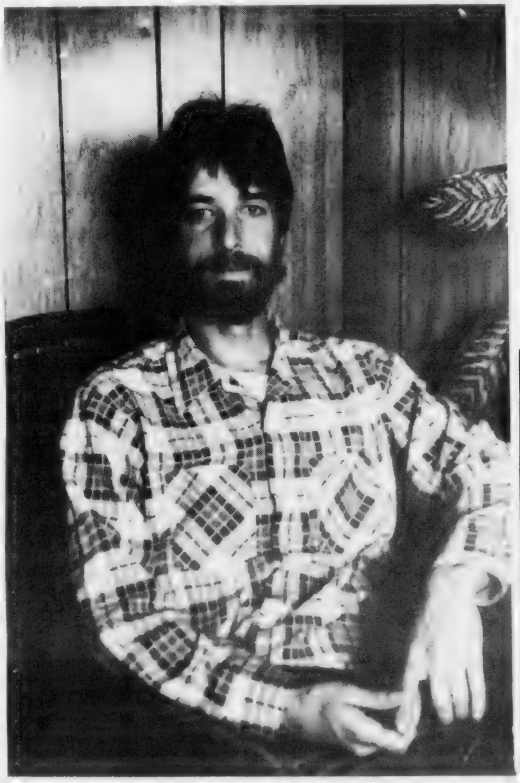
Although he may only be working for Longwood at his current job of interim director of Student Activities for the next three months, Eric Seaman is setting new precedents in Student Activities that will be difficult for future directors to continue.

Seaman first came to Longwood College after personal difficulties left him in need of some quick cash. "After I graduated from the University of Delaware, I came to live with my parents in Buckingham and decided that I really liked farming. In the process of trying to turn my parent's farm into my farm, I got in a big fight with my dad and I needed a job really quick. When I was going to the University of Delaware, I used to drive buses to work my way through school and when a position opened here, I took it."

Taking the job turned out to be a smart move for Seaman by giving him some close contact with members of the administration. "I had talked to Phyllis Mable and Gary Groneweg of Admissions to try and get an admissions job. I had also been working with Barbara Bishop of the Fine Arts Center and had been talking with the person who was interim director before me. When she had to leave they had an opening that they just wanted to fill quickly and I was available—so that's how I got the job."

Unfortunately, Seaman probably won't be around after this semester. Ric Weibl, Phyllis Mable and others are currently looking for someone with a Masters degree and six years' experience to fill the position on a permanent basis. Charlie Sanders, a member of the Student Union, strongly believes that they should stick with what they've got. "He is doing an excellent job!" says Sanders. "He called me into his office, laid out all my events that I would have to do; he had read the contract, highlighted areas that he wasn't sure of, went over them with me, cleared things up, told me exactly what he wanted done, asked me if I had any suggestion on how to do things—just making sure, on a weekly basis, that we were getting done what we were supposed to do—which is good. I mean I.B. Dent even did that with us!"

Whether he stays on as Activities Director or not, Seaman still plans to stay in the area. Inevitably, or as an end result, he would like to buy a farm somewhere in the area—but he needs the money first. In the meantime, aside from working with S-UN, he is Dr. Greenwood's chauffeur when she needs to utilize her traveling time to the best advantage. "It's a unique situation," says Seaman, "because if I have to take her to Washington for instance, I have a chance to talk to her for six hours, or at least part of that time, when it would otherwise be impossible to get an appointment with her."



As the interim director, Seaman's job for the remainder of his term is to make sure that the rest of the performances, lectures, and mixers stay on schedule and run smoothly. However, Seaman is working beyond that to try and start innovative things for next Fall. Currently, he is trying to get it okayed with the Board of Visitors to see if the students would be willing to add an additional $5 in student activities fees for a super concert. "What a super concert would be," says Seaman, "is that once a semester we would put on some kind of large event—preferably an outdoor thing with someone like James Taylor or some kind of major attraction."

Along with that, Seaman is also trying to get a joint meeting between all the members of a group called NACA (which Longwood belongs to) that books all the concerts in the area. "There are a number of schools in the state that are affiliated with it," says Seaman. "We are trying to get better affiliated with all the other facilities and all the other directors. We are trying to get better affiliated with all the other facilities and all the other directors. We are trying to be more aware of what's happening on other campuses so that there is better interaction between schools." The purpose of doing this would be to do what is called cross-booking—if another school has an event that we can't afford to have, we can buy blocks of tickets from them.

"Another thing that happens when you do this is if a band has an extra day of travel in between shows, you can sometimes pick them up for practically nothing if we can get them to play during the day so they won't have to put up their lights—even large bands like Chicago or something along that line. Not only will this set a precedent that the next director will hopefully continue to follow, but it should also really open channels between all the schools—and that can only help. These things really haven't been done here before."

Aside from trying to open a path from all the other schools in the state to Longwood, Seaman is also trying to encourage a little more school spirit among the students themselves. For instance, the horror movies that were shown last week cost about $125 each and on the first night of showing, only 22 people showed up to see it. "We're trying to get more feedback from the students with this because we want them to be more aware of what things cost and to make us more aware of what they might be interested in." In an effort to draw more people to group events, S-UN is working on a deal with the snack bar to show movies in the new lounge so that people could come down to see the movies and bring food and beer in from the snack bar. "People are conditioned to come to the snack bar now," says Seaman. "There was a mixer in the lower dining hall last week and there were still about 250 people in the snack bar." Seaman is also currently trying to sponsor a donkey basketball game featuring the fraternities of Longwood against the fraternities of Hampden-Sydney with representatives from Longwood sororities also participating. However, the weekend that the event is scheduled for also happens to be Greek week at Hampden-Sydney and they seem to be a little reluctant to leave their campus at this point. These are just a few ideas that Seaman is trying to implement.

In just a few short weeks, Eric Seaman has not only apparently tried to increase the amount of programs and generate more enthusiasm for the students of Longwood than many of the past permanent directors ever did, but he's also trying to bring more attention to the Longwood campus as a whole. Maybe we should consider keeping him around for a while longer.

International Studies program

By David S. Areford

"Our world is too small not to know that other people exist. And it is too easy to ignore the fact that they do," says Dr. Jill Kelly, expressing a feeling among faculty members that students at Longwood need to be more aware of places and people beyond Virginia and the United States. Thus Dr. Kelly is heading up a faculty committee in charge of a new International Studies Program, a program similar to many being instituted at other colleges and universities around the country.

The new program will supplement a student's major or minor and will require the completion of at least 36 credit hours in courses which deal substantially with societies other than a student's own. The program's courses are distributed among Art, Drama, Literature, Music, Philosophy, Anthropology, Geography, Government, History and Foreign Language.

Students should realize that many of these credits can be earned by carefully selecting courses required by one's major and General Education requirements. For some majors this will only require the addition of a few courses.

Dr. Kelly feels that the program will help students select General Education requirements in a more organized way, giving a focus to what is usually a random sampling of unrelated courses.

Next year's freshmen are not the only target for the new program but also rising sophomores and juniors who may have already taken some of the courses that fit into the program.

A list of these courses over the past two years that apply will soon be available. Also, each rising sophomore and junior will receive a brochure on the program listing applicable courses available next semester.

The program includes existing courses some of which have been reoriented. Also, development of new courses is being encouraged, and faculty members are beginning to work together to reinforce each other's course content. Dr. Kelly hopes ultimately that related courses such as 19th Century European Art, for example, will be offered in the same year at least. Thus courses would reinforce each other, providing a more complete picture of a society's many aspects.

For students interested in international studies, there will be a variety of special events including films, lectures, and opportunities for foreign travel.

Dr. Kelly feels that an international awareness is necessary for an educated person and an informed citizen. This knowledge "works for world peace and world economy among other things," Dr. Kelly says. "It will make it easier to vote and we definitely know it will make it easier to get a job." The program will produce articulate and knowledgeable students who will be more attractive to employers.

A long-range goal of the program is to help make Longwood more of a drawing card. Dr. Kelly hopes "to attract students who are more interested in Longwood as a good place to be. That it will become a real preference. Longwood is now one of a number of choices for most students—we would like it to be the number one choice."

Longwood radio broadcasting again

By Mark Holland

Thanks to the initiative and leadership of Sonny Merchant Longwood once again has a radio station after being silent for more than one semester. WUTA was able to get back on the air after Merchant met with several students and administrators and worked out problems that had beset the radio station in the past.

"The first person that helped us out was Barb Gorski," Merchant told The Rotunda, "I told her what I was trying to do and she offered to set up a meeting of all the people that she knew had been involved with it in the past. We all sat down and had the first meeting. That was a real big help and really got the ball rolling."

From there things did start moving. Dr. John Peale and Dr. Maria Silveria accepted the positions of advisors and organizational meetings were set up and a constitution was ratified. These persons were elected to the following positions: Merchant, President; Mike Lundsguard, Station Manager; Bruce Souza, Business Manager; Chuck Ebbits, Music Director; Sharon Kaufman, Personnel Director; Jamie Meoreness, Chief Engineer; Rob Robertson, News Director; Mark Holland, Public Relations Director; Benji Smith, Public Affairs Director; Ellery Bradely and Eran Alexander, Sports Director; Gustav Sallas, Programming Director.

As programming director Sallas is in charge of the scheduling the D.J.'s and arranging the play schedule. The present format has a wide range of music featuring everything from country to new wave to rock and roll to jazz. On the air from 2:00 in the afternoon until 2:00 in the morning Monday through Friday and from 10:00 in the morning until 2:00 in the morning Saturday and Sunday WUTA has something for everyone.

This year Merchant is mainly concerned with getting on the air and gaining somewhat of a listening audience, but next year he hopes to develop a true, quality radio station. "I'm hoping to expand programming, include some more variety by using special guest slots, like with professors and speakers that come to Longwood. If we get a fairly famous comedian, like Mark Weiner who was here earlier this year, I would like to get them up on the air for a little while. We are working towards gaining more respect from the rest of the campus. In getting people to listen to us because they know that we are good."

Also part of the expansion towards developing a quality station is an improvement and an updating of the station's equipment. Chief Engineer Meoreness made a trip to Richmond last week and purchased a new Denon cassette deck and a Yamaha CD-X2 Compact Disc Player. As Merchant explained, "We got a discount on the actual discs for buying the unit. We got a pretty decent mix of music." The laser disc player will also enable the station to broaden its variety into the area of opera of which there are a great deal of discs available.

For all those who are interested in becoming involved with WUTA there are staff meetings every Wednesday evening at 7:00 in Room 206. There will not be a meeting this week though.

National campus events

The Unique Hairstyles of collegians seem to be a traditional source of friction and the 1980s are no different. The Student Government President at Syracuse U. says he was sent home from his part-time catering job because management disliked his hairstyle which is long in the front, short in the back and marlboro red. The student plans no legal action but says he wants to expose the discrimination.

Is Political Dissent Un-American? An ad in the student newspaper for a draft counseling workshop at the U. of Iowa prompted a U. S. Marine Corps recruiting officer to call the workshop organizers "a bunch of Communists" and accused them of "talk(ing) trash about Uncle Sam." The ad stated that "Many have found that the military is: Not Excitement! Not Job Training! Not Education! Not a Good Deal!"

Volunteers Guard the Chapel Door at Rutgers U. where St. Michael's Chapel is providing sanctuary for Salvadoran refugees. Teams of volunteers are poised to block the possible entry of federal officials seeking to deport refugees. Over 3,000 students have donated time or money to the sanctuary.

Searches of Students have Stopped at U. of Maryland-College Park cafeterias because officials believe they have curtailed the wave of theft during which students lifted about 15,000 glasses, 25,000 pieces of silverware and countless sandwiches.

Late-Night Entertainment Drew a Big Crowd at the Valparaiso U. student recreation center. Sponsored by the student union programming board and billed as an All-Nighter, the event featured a series of entertainers, including hypnotist Gil Eagles and comedian Stephen Wright.

Military Recruitment is Illegal on the Temple U. campus, according to the Philadelphia Human Relations Commission which ruled that because the military refuses to hire homosexuals, Temple is violating a city anti-discrimination ordinance by the recruiting. The ruling stems from a 1982 lawsuit by two gay students and is believed to set a precedent for a similar suit brought against the U. of Pennsylvania in January by the student group Lesbians and Gays at Penn.

Broadsides announces last issue

Broadsides, Longwood's expository and creative writing journal, is currently accepting entries for its April 22 issue. This will be the last issue of Broadsides and the last chance for "all creative and off-the-wall endeavors of persons interested in winning $200.00," Dr. Craig, Challender, Broadsides editor-in-chief said. Dr. David James, professor of philosophy, and Mr. William C. Woods, The Rotunda's spiritual advisor, are assisting in the publication process. The deadline for this last issue is April 11.

The literary journal is open to all disciplines, and everything will be considered. Entries accepted include essays, short stories, cartoons, photographs and poetry. The purpose of the journal is to highlight Longwood students' talents in all areas of study. "It is not meant to replace the Gyre or The Rotunda, Challender said, "but to complement it.'

The last three issues have been "fairly successful," Challender said, "but I would like to see more entries by students—you don't have to be an English major to enter."

Four cash prizes will be awarded; one first place prize for $200, and three honorable mentions for $100.00 The winners will be announced April 30.

Dining Hall propriety reviewed

By Eric T. Houseknecht

While most of the student body was enjoying the comforts of home this weekend, those who remained on campus were treated to a rather bizarre floor show Saturday evening in the dining hall. Having viewed part of the incident myself, I can only describe what transpired as a group tantrum, thrown by several irate students and sparked by an outspoken, boisterous ringleader. A dining hall employee trying to stifle the ruckus was pelted with food by onlookers who obviously sympathized with the unruly mob.

The instigator of the melee continued to barrage the food service employee with profane verbal abuse even after being asked to leave. He even went so far as to express his dicontent from outside of the confines of Blackwell Dining Hall, forcing ARA workers to call the campus police, so that others could dine undisturbed.

What prompted this infantile display is more than likely beyond the realm of my imagination, so I won't even venture a guess. What I do find interesting concerning the entire incident, are the underlying attitudes indirectly expressed by these brazen thugs. Most predominantly, that discontentment with the food or services received justifies deviant behavior; i.e., throwing of food or leaving dishes and garbage on tables. This is not an attitude unique to the impudent few who openly displayed their dissatisfaction on Saturday night, but rather one that is expressed on a daily basis by an estimated 75 to 90 percent of the student body who remain steadfast in their refusal to bus their tables.

The situation in the dining hall has become deplorable, and there is no one to blame but the students themselves. The incredible mess left at the end of each meal is an all too accurate statement about the simian manner in which students have chosen to exist. That the student body continually voices a desire to be treated more like "adults" by Longwood's administration, can only be seen as a farcical, hypocritical request, concurrent with the barbaric mentality which allows such conditions to persist.

Obviously, I am not the first to express a concern about this issue. A great deal of time and space has been devoted to efforts intended to make the dining hall a better place. But no one can teach the students manners (obviously!). I cannot believe that anyone is oblivious to the more civiized dining habits of the outside world. As I have mentioned in previous articles, those of you who continue to eat jello with your fingers and leave heaps of uneaten food in front of you at meals will not be in wild social demand.

Literally thousands of dollars are spent each semester to make amends for the slovenly habits of the students. Apparently students cannot make the correlation between the money lost from funding major clean-up projects and the money which could be spent on better food. Are you all so obtuse that you can't see what you're doing to yourselves? I think not. The problem is not one of stupidity, but sheer ignorance, under the twisted guise of social disobedience.

If this commentary seems harsh that's because it is intended to be. Throughout the year, I have attempted to engender at least a smidgen of social consciousness (through admittedly more indirect and intentionally cynical writings) to our readers. I assure you that this article can be no more jolting to you, than the unconscionable displays of immaturity in the dining hall are to me. If you take any pride at all, in yourselves as civilized beings, you will let this fiasco go on no longer.

To the Editor of The Rotunda:

I'm sure that most faculty members share my appreciation for the spirit behind the remarks in The Rotunda of March 26 concerning the discrepancies between salaries paid to members of the administration and to faculty members. However, the effect of these remarks is diminished by the inaccuracy of the figures you cite; most apparently, you seem to have included merit pay twice, at least for faculty members, thereby inflating the total salary figures. Mistakes like this one are not only misleading; they undermine readers' confidence in any factual information you present.

Sincerely,
Dr. Martha E. Cook
Chair, Finance Committee

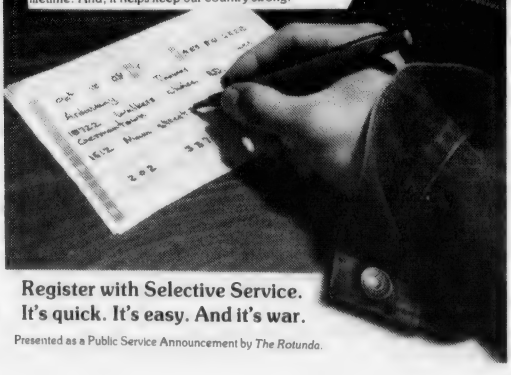
Editor's Note

Due to a lack of communication between the Business Office and The Rotunda Staff, faculty merit pay, in certain instances, was added twice to base rates. We apologize for this problem, which we had no knowledge of before the article ran in our March 28 issue.

To the Editor,

We think that it is a real shame that you must insult others to boost your point of view. The girls in the Miss Longwood Pageant have worked very hard to be on that stage. They can't even send the newspaper home because it has Miss Longwood 1986 portrayed as a cow.

As to your article, the judges were qualified and fair. They were not "slobbering, toothless old men" as you described. Just because you don't agree with the pageant's ideals doesn't mean you can exploit it one step further by printing pictures of cows on the cover. If this is your idea of the Miss Longwood Pageant, you can judge cows. I'd like to know your standards for handpicking Miss Congeniality 1986. Are you signifying that the contestants are nothing but livestock?



We don't have halos, but we do agree that the Miss Longwood Pageant is a tradition that should be looked at as a celebrated event.

These are the letters of the alphabet. When used properly they can be arranged to form words, sentences, and even paragraphs which in turn, convey ideas, which can be deciphered by others who are also familiar with this form of communication.

By utilizing such a system, you too can express ideas of your own. The Rotunda encourages such practices and indeed, will even reward them by putting them in print. Assuming you have ideas of your own, we invite you to write us a letter. Our box number is 1133; just put the letters on a piece of paper, put the paper in an envelope, and put those four numbers after the word "Box". Then all you need to do is drop the envelope in the campus mail.

In our continuing efforts to promote such literary practices, The Rotunda is sponsoring a challenging contest of intellectual pursuit. If you can unscramble the twenty-six letters or the alphabet seen above, and put them in correct order, you could win one of many valuable prizes. Just put your answer to this perplexing mystery puzzle in the same envelope as your letter.

Winners will be announced in next week's issue.

To the Editor:

This time you have gone too far! Your picture of my son Ferdinand on the cover of the last Rotunda has caused him undue embarrassment and humiliation. Although he may not be the most masculine bull in our pasture, your portrayal of him first as a cow and second as Miss Longwood 1986 was insensitive and an abuse of your privilege as editor. He has been the recipient of daily abuse from all the other young cows and bulls in the pasture and I am growing concerned about his health. I demand an apology from you and I hope that in the future you will think about the feelings of others before you use them as part of some "joke."

Angrily,
Millie the Cow

Many Virginia colleges are uniting in support of the first statewide Student Gay Awareness Week, April 7-13. The Rotunda encourages these efforts and asks all Longwood students in support of Gay and Lesbian Awareness Week to wear blue jeans on Wednesday, April 10, 1985.

Baseball team on a roll

Senior Allen Lawter and sophomore Jeff Mayone, who are tied for the season homer lead with seven each, have tied the career mark for home runs (16) set by John Sullivan last season. Lawter leads the Lancers in batting average (.453), RBI's (39) and putouts (122).

Friday against Virginia State it was a pitcher's day as Rob Furth and Tony Beverley had completed game shutouts against the Trojans. Furth hurled a one-hitter and fanned nine in the opener and Beverley limited Virginia State to three hits in the second contest.

Longwood's 14th ranked baseball team shook off a disappointing 3-2 loss at Virginia last week and swept five games in a row, upping its season record to 21-4.

The Lancers bashed 10 home runs while dispatching Randolph-Macon 16-8 Thursday, Virginia State 9-0 and 10-0 Friday and St. Joseph's (Maine) 13-3 and 20-10 Saturday. This week Longwood plays at Bowie State Monday, at Virginia Tech Wednesday, at Virginia State Thursday and hosts King College Saturday in a 1:00 doubleheader.

Todd Thompson's two-run double was the big hit in the first game while Jeff Rohm and Jeff Mayone had two-run homers in the nightcap.

Longwood got its offense in gear once again Saturday afternoon to take a pair from visiting St. Joseph's. Kelvin Davis went 2-2 with 2 RBI's and Todd Ashby hurled an eight-hitter to pace the 13-3 opening win.

In the second game Longwood trailed 10-5 before rallying for 15 runs in the last three innings. The key hit was Lawter's three-run double in the fifth which put the Lancers on top 13-10. Mayone, Tom Klatt and Davis hit two-run homers for the Lancers.

It was Scott Mills who picked up the second game win in relief. Mills had pitched a four-hitter at Virginia last Tuesday. With backing from a solid defense and Lawter's two-run homer, Mills almost hurled Longwood to victory over the Cavaliers, who used five walks to edge the Lancers.

Spring Weekend A Hit

By Randy Copeland

Spring Weekend took off with a bang Saturday as ARA/Slater dining services sponsored a Chili contest on Stubbs Mall. Many of the fraternities, sororities, and organizations on campus fought in competition for the best chili. The title was won by Delta Sigma Pi, the business fraternity, followed by Alpha Sigma Alpha sorority and Alpha Chi Rho finishing second and third, respectively. One of the more talked about recipes was from the social fraternity, Delta Sigma Phi, who came through with a very spicy chili that demanded accompaniment of one's favorite beverage. An added feature to the occasion was the mob of purse carrying prospective students who swarmed the campus to sample a taste of college life.

In the evening, the Student Union was host to Washington's DC/101 radio D.J. "The Greaseman" and the Adam Smasher Band. The band played many of the newest rock songs, while "The Greaseman" did some stand-up comedy and several "off color" jokes about the college and Farmville in general.

While everyone at the outdoor mixer on Iler Field seemed to enjoy the entertainers, apparently complaints from townspeople forced the band to shut down early. In response to the complaints, "The Greaseman" dedicated and sang "Thank God I'm a Redneck" to the nearby community. To end the evening, the band distributed DC/101 "Brew Caps" and T-shirts. When asked about the possibility of returning next year, the band's lead guitarist replied, "I don't think so—we caught a lot of crap from the cops."

Although Ms. Mable, who monitored the S-UN cash box, made the remark, "We'll probably lose (money) on this", some 1300 students seemed to enjoy the festivities. The only pleasant event left for the year is graduation for some, and summer vacation for others. Regardless, Spring Weekend was a success and an unusually fun experience for everyone.

Keg Dispute Arouses Students

By Frank Raio

On Tuesday, April 9, the Alcohol Task Force met, as usual, to discuss the alcohol situation at Longwood College. The meeting last week, however, was very different than those in the past. The student body had learned that the committee was discussing the possibility of outlawing kegs in residence halls. As a result, the Prince Edward Room meeting site was packed full of students who wanted to have some input in the decision.

The student body became aware of the danger to kegs because of actions taken by the Student Government Association Executive Committee. Freshman class president Mike Clements, a member of the SGA Senate and the Alcohol Task Force, informed the student group of the fact that the Task Force was considering prohibiting kegs in dorms. The Executive Committee then made the decision to print and distribute flyers to alarm students into action. The flyers, combined with announcements at fraternity and sorority meetings, precipitated the very large student turnout. SGA President attended were armed with many arguments for continuing to allow pony-kegs in residence halls with the permission of a Residence Education Coordinator.

Students discuss Keg plan with Administrator Barb Gorski and others.

Garth Wentzel said, "I was working the elections in the New Smoker and went over to the Prince Edward Room to see how it was going; it was so full, I could not get in."

Although the meeting occasionally took an ugly turn (at times it seemed like a lynching mob going after task force chair Barb Gorski), the students who

The result of the meeting, which one student called "the largest gathering of students at which there was not a keg," remains to be seen, but Mike Clements said afterwards that "... the committee has decided to re-evaluate the problem with alcohol and the possible solutions." Clements, who is

Wolfe To Receive Dos Passos Prize

Longwood College has announced the award of the 1984 John Dos Passos Prize for Literature to Tom Wolfe.

Wolfe is the author of 10 widely-acclaimed books on modern American life, including The Right Stuff, a study of the American astronauts that was the basis for the Oscar-winning film.

The Dos Passos Prize, which includes a $1,000 cash award and a medal for high literary achievement, will be presented to Tom Wolfe on Wednesday, April 17, at 8 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium on the Longwood campus. Following the award ceremony, Wolfe will read from his recent work. The ceremony and reading are open to the public at no charge.

Wolfe is the fifth writer to win the Dos Passos Prize since its founding at Longwood in 1980. Other winners have included novelists Doris Betts and Robert Stone, who also served on the jury that this year chose Wolfe over such other nominees as E. L. Doctorow and John McPhee.

The Dos Passos Prize commemorates the life and work of John Dos Passos, author of USA and peer and contemporary of Faulkner, Hemingway, and Fitzgerald. The recipient is selected by an independent jury "charged especially to seek out American creative writers whose work demonstrates an intense and original exploration of specifically American themes; an experimental tone; or writing in a wide variety of literary forms."

All of these qualities characterize the work of Tom Wolfe. With the publication of The Kandy-Colored Tangerine Flake Streamline Baby in 1965, Wolfe inaugurated a series of volumes of brilliant reportage on American life that continued through The New Journalism and The Painted Word, and culminated in 1979 with The Right Stuff.

Along the way, he has explored the lives of artists and architects, radicals and socialities, stock car drivers and fighter pilots. His Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test is widely considered the best account of sixties counter-culture.

He has recently broadened his range to include fiction, with his first novel, The Bonfire of the Vanities, currently being published in Rolling Stone.

From the beginning Wolfe's writing has, in the words of the prize citation, displayed "a wide range of subjects, a linguistic inventiveness, and a skeptical devotion to the most telling details of our national life."

Wolfe is the nephew of the late Frances Roberdeau Wolfe, of Richmond, a Longwood College alumna. By means of a bequest to her alma mater, Miss Wolfe established a scholarship endowment that provides funding for eight Longwood Scholars.

Genet's Balcony To Run

The Balcony, Jean Genet's best-known play, will be presented by the Longwood Players on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, April 17-20, in Jarman Auditorium. Curtain time is 8 o'clock each night.

The play's action takes place in a bizarre "house of illusion" that caters to refined sensibilities and peculiar tastes. Here men from all walks of life don the garb of their fantasies and act them out: a man from the gas company wears the robe and mitre of a bishop, another customer becomes a flagellant judge, and still another a victorious general.

These costumed diversions take place while outside a revolution rages which has isolated their "house" from the rest of the rebel-controlled city.

In a stunning series of macabre, climatic scenes, Genet presents his caustic view of man and society.

Robert Brustein, writing in The New Republic, stated that "The Balcony is probably the most stunning subversive work of literature to be created since the writings of the famous Marquis... a major dramatic achievement." The play was written in 1956.

Dr. Patton Lockwood is directing the play. Scenography is by Moffatt Evans, and costume design by Jerry Dagenhart.

Admission is free to Longwood students with I.D., and general admission to the public is $3.50.

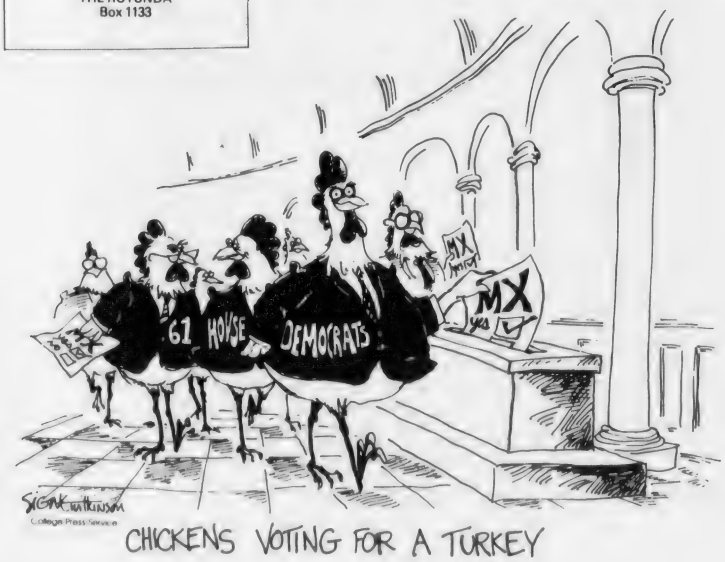
the cynic...

The Cynic. An appropriate head for this newspaper column perhaps ... indeed The Rotunda is a paper which has created more havoc, more outrage, more interest with negative editorial comment than it could have with countless reams of praise or college-type news. I believe that cynicism has provided motivation for students at times, though they may have been motivated only to think. Frequently, that is a positive, if rare, outcome in itself. Apathy at Longwood is a steadfast occupation of students here, and we are rarely moved to action unless we are truly outraged. Threats to our drinking "privileges" provide a case-in-point.

When students heard of the possibilities of losing kegs-on-campus, they were put to action. Phone calls were made, posters were printed, T-shirts appeared. Longwood students came out to—gasp!—voice their opinions. And changes were made as views were heard; the plan to remove kegs from campus is likely to be thrown out—as is this very editorial.



Of course we defend our kegs! Let every man and woman have their keg, I say! We come here not to study, not to learn (are you kidding?); we come here to drink, to take inversion bong hits, to celebrate debauchery at its zenith. Let none among us deny it. When the administration realizes this Final Truth, they will take pride in our drinking! They will celebrate with us; perhaps our esteemed President will be the first Administration visionary. Perhaps she will be the first to strap on those Empowering Inversion Boots! Yes! If we are indeed the Commonwealth's Number One Beer-Drinking School, let us rejoice! We can drink more! I HAVE A DREAM.....

Perhaps I have been somewhat extreme; do I ask too much? I fear the worst. We have already reached our apex as rising drinkers... if two thousand students can be cowed into changing their clothes for a day because a lowly newspaper editor wanted a laugh or two (among other, equally important reasons), they must be drinking to their fullest capacities. If a student newspaper staff can print a cow on the front page and receive written response in the form of one letter from four concerned students, Longwood students have achieved the devout lethargy of strong drinkers. I commend you. Go, then, and drink some more.

Allow me to break from this praise... I submit that the cynicism of this editorial page has been extreme. It also has been needed and will continue to be so. Sometimes I really think it has motivated some change. Mostly, though, I seriously doubt it. Supply and demand perhaps, necessitates the cynic or... maybe... well, you think about it.

I'm off to have a Scotch and Soda.

Keg Dispute

credited with the large student turnout, went on to say, "I really appreciated the attendance and feel that such motivation by the students is all that it will take for us to have more input into making campus policy." Wentzel was also pleased, "I think the turnout was great; however, I wish people would react this way to more important issues such as academics, student rights, the judicial process and even elections."

Against Kegs in Dorms

- There is an alcohol problem at Longwood College. According to a survey by a beer distributer, Longwood consumes more beer per capita than any other college town in Virginia.
- Studies show that there is much pressure to "finish the keg" once it is tapped. This pressure does not occur with six packs which can be saved for another time.
- The Dean of Students office has been approached by students who have voiced concern about kegs in residence halls and the subsequent havoc that keg parties create.
- Kegs would be allowed in a few designated areas such as the lower dining hall and the ABC room.

For Kegs in Dorms

- Students will find places off-campus to have kegs (the Fairgrounds, Wilkes Lake, private homes of students), as they have with grain alcohol. At least two accidents and one DWI have occurred this year following such off-campus parties. More drunks will be on the roads of Farmville. Deaths will result.
- Is the beer distributor survey (which credits Longwood with a high drinking rate) done on a regional basis and does it include Hampden-Sydney and the citizens of Farmville?
- R.A.s, barely able to deal with the huge demands put upon them already with unenforcible regulations, like visitation, will have yet another burden put upon them. Just as illegal visitation occurs on a large scale, illegal kegs will be rolling in back doors everywhere. Instating unenforcible rules will lead to less adherence to the more valid standing rules.
- The "No Keg Rule" discriminates against GDIs, who party in smaller groups and will not be able to compete against large organizations like Greeks and S-UN for lower dining hall privileges.

Your Turn

Longwood Parking Blues

To the Editor:

I feel there is a great need to bring a certain problem to the attention of The Rotunda. The wheel-locks have put many of us in awkward situations. It seems the campus police have found a sure fire way to force us to pay our tickets. As you have probably guessed I was given a dreaded wheel-lock. I know you're thinking; If you paid your bills you wouldn't have this problem. This is where the source of my problem is. Last semester I was given three tickets. One ticket was for parking in the circle of South Tabb on a Thursday night. On Friday morning the faculty was minus one space in the circle, so I was given a ticket. I deserved that one. My next two tickets were for inhibiting the visitor space in Lancer parking lot. The campus police have never had a solid rule for parking in these spaces. If you ask them and they say no resident students can park there, then ask them why, since the situation has become worse, they now allow parking in this place for resident students. Last week I paid $42 for parking in a place that people have been allowed to park in.

I went to the campus police. They said that they could not distribute these tickets in a day because they might be put on another call. So I decided to see what was done in one week. This would allow them plenty of time to make their rounds. I specifically watched a green ventura pontiac in the space that I was given a ticket. One week went by and the ventura sat in the same space ticketless. I was enraged; I went to see the Dean and Director of Student Services. The Dean told me to pay my bills and wouldn't offer any more advice. The Director of Student Services could not help me but admitted that there was a problem.

Would you please get some answers for me. I know I'm not the only one who has been done wrong. I didn't want to pay these tickets because people park there now. Would you show me where the campus police have written down that policy on spaces has changed? If they don't have any answers then Longwood College owes me 42 needed dollars.

Respectfully,
Jeffrey Kerr Fleming

Freedom of Choice Supported

To the Editor:

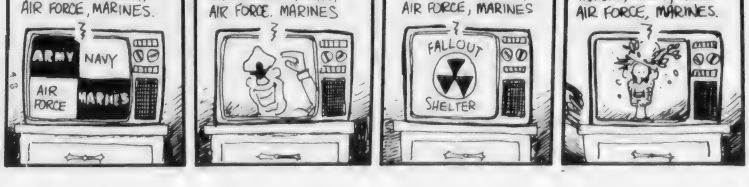
Last week The Rotunda printed a passage concerning Gay Awareness Week. The Rotunda then asked the student body to show their support of the awareness week by wearing blue jeans last Wednesday.

I paid heed to both this challenge, and I write to express my ideas about Gay Awareness Week. I interpreted the passage thus: If you support the awareness of homosexuality, simply wear your Levi's on Wednesday. I interpreted it vertabin. Many did not. It seems to be apparent that many people thought that by wearing blue jeans, it was a statement of your own sexual preference. It was not. For me, choosing to wear my jeans on that day last week meant that I support Gay Rights and the freedom of choice made by some concerning their sexuality.

Freedom of choice. Pro choice. Where have you heard that before? Abortion is also an issue that is quite controversial in today's society, so is the drinking age. Aren't they choices also? And the issue of Gay Rights, is it moral to deny anyone rights? If we are to deny the rights of homosexuals, why not also abolish the rights of Blacks, women, the elderly and the handicapped. Let's do away with all the people that aren't pleasing to our society. We can create a perfect society in which everyone has blond hair and blue eyes. . .Doesn't that sound familiar?

I would also like to state here that I will not let anyone dictate to me what kind of clothing I will or will not wear, but I can't. I wore my jeans when it would have been very easy for me to conform and not have worn them. I did let that passage influence my clothing choice, obviously quite different from the majority of the campus.

Blue jeans are a common denominator of clothing, so to speak. Everybody wears them, usually. For those of you that chose not to wear jeans last Wednesday, I respect your decision; as I hope you respect my decision and that of a handful of others to wear them. I would like to ask you why you went out of your way to dress differently than you normally do? Were you afraid of being labeled, or ostrasized because of it? Or did you think that by wearing jeans you would be thought gay yourself? Did you think that you would be talked about and whispered about behind your back? Do you deny a different side of life? If you have a positive reply to each of the above questions, then I beg you to discover your own identify and search out what you really believe in. Did you abstain from denim because your friends did? Or do you feel that homosexuality is a sin and something to be denied?



Maybe homosexuality is a sin, but that is for God to decide. You can't run and hide from the undesirable. Also considered sins by some people in our society are drinking, taking drugs, lying, cursing, and God forbid- cheating. Please close your eyes, because none of this occurs at Longwood.

I ask you now, don't be afraid to stand up and speak out for ideas you believe in, or support, for that is part of your individuality, your personal uniqueness. Don't conform to other's ideas and beliefs out of peer pressure. Your friends are not authorities on right and wrong, neither is this article. This is simply a culmination of my thoughts and ideas, something for you to think about the next time you decide who is sinning and who is not. One final comment: let those among us that are without sin, cast the first stone.

Wentzel Speaks Out

To the Editor:

Just wanna say one word to ya Jeff, conformity! Conformity at Longwood seems to be at an all time high.

Some people might think I am a hypocrite because I happen to be in the Army. However, we call it uniformity in the service. Uniformity is necessary in the military because of the discipline needed to survive and win in a military engagement.

In the present day civilian world we conform for different reasons. Some conform to ads on TV and in the papers and magazines; others to how their friends feel about them, and still others to the many religious sects we have in the world.

On April 10, 1985 The Rotunda asked people who support gays and Gay Awareness Week to wear blue jeans. I heard so many people say they were not going to wear them that I decided to wear them just for the hell of it. The reaction I got was terrific. Even though my friends know I feel gays have two basic rights, the right to pay taxes, and the right to die. I must have been called a queer 40 or 50 times.

Out of the nearly 3000 students who go here, I estimate that only 20 or 30 students were wearing jeans on Wednesday. Those students whom I knew were wearing blue jeans, were wearing them to show their individuality. The others might have been off campus students or they may have supported gay rights.

I would like to ask the students of Longwood to start thinking for themselves. One must look at all sides of an issue before making judgment upon it. Oh, and by the way Sidd Finch, the Mets new pitcher was traded to the Orioles for Cal Ripkin Jr., Eddie Murray and future unnamed draft picks.

Garth F. Wentzel

Editor's Note: Garth, I am heartened that our Student Government President shows such support for non-conformity. However, it is unfortunate that you have such a narrow attitude towards a minority which exists here as does any other. Student leadership?

Radio Graffiti

To the Editor:

It seems the radio station is finally able to start reaching their goals. Their goals were to develop a listening audience, interview guest speakers, and most of all gain respect campus-wide. First they really need to make some changes in their advertising policy. Do them a big favor, offer them a discount for an ad in your paper. Maybe we won't have so much graffiti polluting the campus. Then they might be able to gain campus-wide respect.

You Caught Us!

To the Editor:

Get an education if you expect students to unscramble the 26 letters on page 3 of this week's Rotunda. You need to print 26 not 25 and add on "M" and a "Y" instead of 2 "B's". Get a clue Abernathy. Get a proof reader.

A Frustrated Reader

Editor's Note: You've done it! You, mysterious reader, uncovered our ploy first among the hundreds of responses we've received. Please come forward to claim your prize which awaits you in The Rotunda offices. We should also mention Second Place Contestant Frodo York, who missed the mark by a single letter, claiming we'd printed two 'Z's (ZZ...). Congratulations!

Ethiopian Student Attending Longwood

By Kent Booty

Mulu Teferra was in his dorm room when he first saw the haunting images on television.

The pictures of starving people in his native Ethiopia—now so familiar to the world—were a shocking revelation when Teferra viewed them on an evening news program last fall.

"I knew there was a drought in Ethiopia," he said recently, "but I didn't know how bad it was. When I turned on the TV and saw the news, I couldn't believe it. I cried."

Teferra, a freshman chemistry major, came to the United States 18 months ago. He lives with a brother in Arlington. After studying English at Georgetown University for a year, he enrolled at Longwood last fall.

The 20-year-old student, who is here on a visa, was born and reared in Tigray, a province in northern Ethiopia. Tigray and Eritrea, a neighboring province, are among the areas hardest hit by the drought which has spurred an international relief effort. Both provinces are partially controlled by anti-government rebels, and critics charge that the Marxist government is attempting to starve its opponents there.

"The government controls the cities but not the countryside," he said. "People in Addis Ababa (the capital) know less about the famine than people in the United States do, because the news media is controlled by the government. I'm glad I came here. Now I know how much the American government and people in this country have helped Ethiopia."

The U.S. and European nations also provided relief aid when the east African nation suffered a famine in 1973. That famine killed about 100,000 people, toppled the longtime government of Emperior Haile Selassie, and led to the establishment of a pro-Soviet regime.

After attending school in his hometown, Axum, through the ninth grade, Teferra moved to Addis Ababa and lived with three of his brothers. During his four-year stay, he finished high school.

His father, a landowning farmer, lost his land in the revolution. Teferra receives letters from his brothers in Addis Ababa, but he has had no contact with his other brothers and sisters, who still live in Tigray, since leaving Ethiopia. He is from northern Tigray, which hasn't suffered from the drought as has the southern part of the province and other regions.

Although Ethiopia has received the most attention, two vast belts of drought have swept across Africa, threatening the people of as many as 30 nations. For example, Chad and Mozambique, which also are embroiled in civil wars, are suffering through a drought as serious, if not more so, than Ethiopia's. Africa's drought is compounded by other problems—civil war, growing populations, abuse of the land, mismanagement and corruption, according to Newsweek magazine. More than 150 million people on the continent are threatened by starvation.

In Ethiopia, at least 300,000 have died, a million more people may be at risk, and as many as six million face food shortages. More than 40 percent of the nation's people are malnourished and more than two million have left their homes in search of food. The relief effort is hampered by the civil war, a shortage of trucks, and the canyons and mountains that dot the landscape. Half of Ethopia's people live a two-day walk from the nearest road.

Mulu Teferra

"If the people had produced more crops during the rainy season, we wouldn't have this famine," said Telferra. Since more than 90 percent of the people are engaged in agriculture, there is nothing to fall back on during times like this, he added.

Critics claim that Ethiopia's agricultural economy, which is patterned after the Soviet Union's state-run collective farms, is inefficient and unproductive.

Telferra thinks a "longterm solution," involving substantial assistance from the U.S. and Europe, is needed to develop Africa's agriculture. "They shouldn't help just when the people are hungry, but also before it happens." Still, he is grateful to the U.S. government and the organizations and people who have provided assistance.

The famine first attracted headlines around the world last October when the British Broadcasting Corporation televised and distributed film of dying babies and corpses. Overnight, foreign governments, relief agencies and individuals began sending money and supplies. Fortunately, it has rained in Ethiopia and a crop is expected by May, according to recent news accounts.

"Sometimes I feel guilty when I eat my lunch or dinner," said Telferra, who plans to become a pharmacist or attend engineering school. "I think, 'Why am I, an Ethiopian, eating when they have so little?' I know that I must eat, but still, sometimes I feel guilty."

Journalists Attend Conference

In an effort to keep our readers informed through the most modern and up-to-date methods the Rotunda staff traveled to Columbia, South Carolina this weekend, to attend the Investigative Reporters and Editors Conference, held at the Carolina Inn.

The conference featured nationally renowned reporters and editors lecturing on a diverse range of pertinent journalistic topics, including talks on Ethics, Sources, Crime, Administrative Injustice, and the Law. The lectures were highlighted with special guest lectures by Jim Polk and Mike Grimm, both Pulitzer prize winners.

Along with the members of The Rotunda, other journalists and future editors were also present at the conference representing various other colleges and organizations throughout the Southern United States.

Want to lose these stubborn unwanted pounds and inches quickly and easily while feeling great doing it. Also a chance in a lifetime to make as much money as you have ever dreamed. For more information call John at 392-8374. You will be glad you did.

Raio Named Editor

The Publications Board has announced that Frank Raio, Co-Managing Editor of The Rotunda, will be Editor-in-Chief of the Longwood student newspaper for the 1984-85 term.

Raio has served on The Rotunda staff since August of 1984, when he transferred to Longwood from George Mason University. A junior majoring in Government, he is a member of Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and a Judicial Board member.

"Gee whiz," Raio was quoted as saying in a press conference in Orange, Virginia yesterday.

Delta Sigma Pi is sponsoring a paper drive this Spring. The papers are being collected in the basement of Cox. All students that receive newspapers are asked to participate. If there is a problem getting the papers to Cox, contact any brother of Delta Sigma Pi for help.

Journalism Conference Experience Recorded

N.B.C. I.R.E. Conference Travel Log

By Eric T. Houseknecht and The Rotunda Staff

3 p.m. Friday, April 12, 1985: It's time to leave for South Carolina and an exciting, informative weekend of journalistic hob-nobbing with Pulitzer Prize winners, television newscasters, and professional clowns. The guys are all huddled around the state-car saying "where's Lori?" (is that all they can ever say?). After her arrival, our sojourn commences and with six of us in a Reliant-K, I can't help but be reminded that I'm not feeling well, although for the life of me I can't remember what I did last night.

4 p.m.: We're out at Hampden-Sydney now and I can't quite figure out if our difficulty in getting on the road lies in our navigational shortcomings or our affinity for tomato juice.

5:30 p.m.: Making uncanny time (Pablo swears he's driving 55), we've just crossed into North Carolina. The group decides it's a good time to pull over and familiarize ourselves with local flora and fauna, in an effort to relieve building internal pressure.

7 p.m.: We're making an unanticipated stop in Randolph County as local tour director, L.W. Brumley, discussed with us our journey, politely posed for snapshots, and enhanced our understanding of local traveling customs.

9 p.m.: Rolling into Charlotte after hours of non-stop bickering over musical preferences, Frank Sinatra blares from the tape deck finally victorious over the Grateful Dead and Rick Springfield. The car stops but the arguments keep on rolling, as where to eat becomes the topic of the next in a series of heated debates. Those of us who didn't wear cut-off shorts are vying for the seafood buffet at the local Marriott (which looks pretty swanky after all the repeat performances of Frito Pie in the past two weeks). Unfortunately we're out-numbered and are forced to settle for burgers and chili in a bar where the only thing nastier than the restrooms are the waitresses.

12 Midnight: We've arrived, and not a moment too soon. After spending the latter part of an hour walking through Charlotte and conversing with the likes of Ronald, an aspiring chemical engineer who plans to defect to New Zealand (swear to God), I can safely say that Farmville doesn't have the monopoly on weirdness that most of you think it does.

I've just spent my last ninety minutes crammed in a car playing mental tic-tac-toe and other intellectually taxing games with various members of the staff. Another tape of sixties music has just recently been replace by the upbeat Motown sound of Smokey Robinson and the Miracles. Mark Holland and Mick Baker take turns dancing on the hood of the car in front of the lobby entrance to the Carolina Inn. The bell-hops don't seem to find us very amusing and as our luggage is unloaded, they continually turn down the volume on the box. If that isn't enough, they leave us to park the car ourselves. Apparently this is a hotel where we're going to be held accountable for our own actions. What a disappointment.

The Next Day: At breakfast, no one seems to be in a particularly chipper mood after staying up to all hours the night before. I attempt to break up the monotony of our somber gathering by dropping a slice of cantaloupe into my lap and continually knocking my silverware on the floor. Mr. Holland now displays his connoisseurly taste by devouring his third banana of the trip and pocketing a fourth for later consumption. Fortunately, we soon meet a professional clown who hangs around us through lunch and most of the afternoon distracting most of the attention from the antics of our staff. The Conference is great, but I don't think anything was discussed that any of you would care about.

The Way Back: This part of the trip seems a lot like the way there, only backwards.

We bypass Charlotte this time and opt to eat at Wendy's where the extensive, cosmopolitan menu (not just burgers but chicken sandwiches too) inspires us to new intellectual heights and triggers a countless string of "I'm Thinking of an Animal" games. Frank Raio remains steadfast in his devotion to cynicism. Pablo's driving is equally consistent in its eraticism. Lori Foster is foolish enough to think we'll let her sleep but only for a moment. Eventually the K-car stops and we're back at Longwood where we started. All had survived the rigors of the road and we returned with many new stories to tell. In the immortal words of my good friend Dr. Root, "It may have been a once-in-a-lifetime experience, but we'll probably never do it again."

Staff members Frank Raio, Eric Houseknecht, Mick Baker, Lori Foster and Beau-zo at the Carolina Inn, Columbia, S. C.

Super Dance Fights M.D.

Some Longwood College students danced around the clock, literally, to raise money in the fight against muscular dystrophy.

Longwood's annual "Super Dance," which lasted for 24 hours on March 29-30, raised slightly more than $2,100, said Fred Grant, who coordinated the event. The money will go to the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

Some 39 Longwood students began dancing at 6 p.m. on Friday, March 29, in the lower dining hall. Approximately 30 of them were still on their feet at 6 p.m. the following day.

This was the longest Super Dance ever held at Longwood, Grant said. None of the previous events had lasted as long as 24 hours. Last year's dance was 20 hours long.

The most difficult stretch was from early Saturday morning until the sun came up, said several of the dancers.

"The first six hours weren't that bad, but once 2 a.m. rolled around, my legs felt like they were going to fall off," said Jim Winkler, a junior from Farmville. "I was ready to fall asleep. But when the sun came up, it wasn't so bad—until the last four hours. They were a killer."

"But it was for a good cause," added Winkler, who lasted the entire 24 hours. "I would do it all over again—just not this month."

Theresa Woods, a senior from Alexandria, raised the most money in pledges, $280. Next year's Super Dance will again be 24 hours, said Grant.

Lacrosse

Longwood's women's lacrosse team turned in a win and a loss last week.

The Lady Lancers beat Randolph-Macon 16-11 Tuesday with a second half rally. Saturday on the road, Maryland Baltimore County raced to an 8-2 halftime lead and beat Longwood by a final count of 19-10.

Longwood takes a 4-2 record into this week's action which features games at Lynchburg Wednesday and at Bridgewater Saturday. The Lady Lancers wind up the regular season next Monday when they host Hollins at 4:00.

Sue Groff scored six goals, Rala Heinen three and Ellen Cykowski, Marianna Johnson and Teresa Alvis two each in Tuesday's win at Randolph-Macon. Goalkeeper Jackie Smith had 23 saves.

Heinen and Groff scored four

Women's Tennis

Rebounding from a 1-4 start, Longwood's women's tennis team took its third straight win last Monday, downing visiting Virginia Wesleyan 6-3. The Lady Lancers will take a 4-4 record into this week's match at Mary Baldwin Tuesday afternoon.

Longwood got singles wins from Stephanie Peters, Chris Gureck, Karla Boggs, Diane Rogers and Heather Gardner Monday to take a commanding 5-1 lead. Gureck teamed with Ann Pitzer for a win at No. 2 doubles to give the Lady Lancers their 6-3 edge.

Pitzer has turned in the top individual mark for the team with a 7-3 record in singles.

Lifting

Caroline Grassi, a Longwood College junior from Earlysville, tied for first place in the Virginia Powerlifting State meet for women.

The meet, held March 30-31 at George Mason University in Fairfax, was the first weightlifting competition that Grassi had ever entered. She bench pressed 175 pounds, squat lifted 280 pounds, and dead lifted 305 pounds, for a total of 760 pounds. She tied for first place in her weight class.

Grassi, 21, is majoring in physical education and is in the fitness specialist program. A former sports participant, she began weightlifting nearly two years ago, at the advice of her brother. She plans to continue competing.

Grassi, a day student, is a graduate of Western Albemarle High School. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert H. Grassi, of Earlysville.

Golf

Competing in the Virginia Intercollegiate Championships at Hot Springs, Virginia, the Lancer golf team had rounds of 342-339 for a 36-hole total of 681 Saturday and Sunday to give Longwood a ninth place finish out of 10 college division teams competing.

Longwood, 19th out of 20 teams overall, was paced by junior Punkaj Rishi who shot 83-79-162. Rishi's second round 79 marked the first time this spring that a Lancer golfer had broken 80.

Also competing for Longwood were Kevin Hare 86-86-172, Danny Hughes 87-86-173, Eric Nelson 86-88-174 and Kevin Brush 88-93-181.

This week the Lancers play at the Chowan College Invitational Thursday and at the Newport News Apprentice Tournament Friday. Longwood hosts Washington & Lee and Bluefield next Tuesday.

Men's Tennis

Ending a season of frustration, Longwood's men's tennis team notched its first win of the year Friday afternoon, beating North Carolina Wesleyan 7-2 on the road.

Now 1-8, the Lancers have a heavy schedule this week with matches at Randolph-Macon and Averett Monday and Tuesday and home contests with Roanoke and Hampden-Sydney Wednesday and Thursday. Saturday Newport News visits and Sunday Ferrum comes to call.

Winning singles matches for Longwood Friday were Sean Timmons, Bill Milby, Mark Casstevens, Arjun Rishi and J. D. Almond. Timmons and Milby won No. 1 doubles while Casstevens and Jeff Brooks won at No. 3 doubles.

Also last week the Lancers dropped an 8-1 decision at Roanoke Tuesday and a 9-0 loss at Newport News Thursday.

IAA Update

By Michael Harris

Longwood's Intramurals are busy this week with both men's and women's softball and tennis doubles.

In the men's A League softball tournament, 12 teams are remaining. Four of those, Fever, Draw the Line, Main Event, and Keggars I are undefeated. The B-League has nine teams left in the competition with the Heartbreakers, Boinkers, Wanted, and Keggers II.

Eleven team are still competing with Images, Slamma Bammas, Totally Awesome, and AST undefeated.

Men's tennis doubles has four teams remaining. Kidwell-Halderman, who are undefeated will play Hull-Black (who've lost once) for the championship, in Bracket No. 1. In Bracket No. 2 Young-Gemborowicz (undefeated) will battle Jimenez-Clark for the title. The winner of each bracket will play for the championship.

Frisbee golf starts action this week.

A co-ed softball tournament will be held on the weekend of 4-20, 21. Entry blanks and a captains meeting will be held at 6:30 in the IAA rooms in Lankford.

Applications are available in Iler Gym for anyone interested in being an IAA supervisor next year.

Mills Near Perfect

Junior pitcher Scott Mills fired a no-hitter at Bowie State last Monday and turned in two additional effective appearances for the Longwood baseball team last week.

For his showing, Mills has been picked as Longwood College Player of the Week for the period April 5-12. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Mills allowed no hits and walked just one while shutting out Bowie State Monday in a 15-0 Longwood victory. The righthanded struck out six and faced just 15 batters. He also pitched effectively in losses to Virginia Tech Wednesday and King College Saturday.

Now 6-3 with an earned run average of 3.49, Mills is already the third winningest pitcher in Longwood history with a career record of 17-11. This season the Hermitage High School graduate leads Longwood in wins (6), innings pitched (51.6), appearances (11), complete games (4) and strikeouts (38).

There's no doubt you're going to make it in the real world, but what about your car?

Ford and Lincoln-Mercury have $400 for graduating seniors toward the purchase of selected cars and trucks.

Ford Motor Credit also has preapproved credit for qualified graduating seniors. Offers end August 15, 1985. For more information call Ford College Graduate Purchase Program Headquarters at 1-800-321-1536.

Baseball Team Rolls

Longwood's 18th ranked baseball team won five of eight games last week to up its overall record to 26-7 and this week the Lancers will host Division I's Virginia Commonwealth and Radford.

VCU visits Lancer field for a 3:00 contest Wednesday afternoon while Radford will play a twin bill in Farmville Thursday starting at 1:00. Longwood visits Maryland Baltimore County for a pair of games Sunday and is slated to host Hampden-Sydney next Monday (April 22).

The Lancers split a twin bill with NAIA power King College Saturday, winning the opener 1-0 but falling in the nightcap 7-5. Sunday afternoon in Ashland, Randolph-Macon stunned the Lancers with a 7-4 defeat, the first time this season that Longwood has lost two games in a row.

The Jackets collected 13 hits and got to Lancer pitcher Tony Browning for five runs in the fifth and two in the sixth. Jeff Mayone went 3-4 with an RBI and Marty Ford had two hits and two RBI's to pace Longwood's 10-hit attack.

Sophomore pitcher Rob Furth scattered seven hits and shut-out King in the opening contest Saturday afternoon. Ford drove in Dennis Leftwick with the winning run on a sacrifice fly in the third inning.

In the nightcap five Lancer errors helped King score three unearned runs, wasting a fine pitching performance by Scott Mills who relieved starter Todd Ashby.

Rohn, Mayone Join Record Holders

Sophomores Jeff Rohm and Jeff Mayone put their names in the record-book last week.

Mayone clouted his eighth homer of the season in a 10-8 loss at Virginia Tech Wednesday, giving him 17 career homers in two years. Mayone bettered the record (16) set by All-American John Sullivan last season and tied by Mayone and Allen Lawter.

Lawter, who has seven homers, leads Longwood in batting (.435), RBI's (44), walks (26), putouts (155) and fielding percentage (.983).

Rohm tied the record for doubles in a season (15) held by Sonny Bolton (1982) and Larry Cromer (1979). The sophomore catcher is hitting .406 with a team high 41 hits and 34 RBI's. Mayone, who is htting .367, has driven in 38 runs.

Lancer Notes

—Ford and Leftwich are having quite a battle for the team leadership in stolen bases. Ford, who is hitting .367, leads the Lancers in at-bats (106) and runs (49). He has stolen 39 bases in 40 attempts. Leftwich is hitting .360 with 39 steals in 43 attempts.

—Furth and freshman pitcher Tony Beverley are having a close contest for the lead in earned run average. Furth (4-1) has an ERA of 1.26 in 35.6 innings pitched, while Beverley (3-1) is even better with a 1.25 ERA in 21.6 innings.

—Furth turned in the top pitching of his career while shutting out King Saturday. The righthander walked just one and struck out two. He pitched out of several jams in the early innings, but finished with a flourish retiring the last six batters he faced. King took an 18-5 record back home to Bristol after Saturday's split. It was Furth that King had knocked out in a 10-4 win back on March 30.

—In other action last week the Lancers swept Virginia State 8-2 and 12-6 Thursday behind complete games from pitchers Sam Hart and Dale Weaver. Rohm had two homers on the day. Virginia Tech used seven unearned runs to beat Longwood 10-8 Wednesday in Blacksburg. Scott Mills pitched a five-inning no-hitter last Monday in a 15-0 win over Bowie State and Longwood won the second game on a forfeit.

Mills has Bowie's number.

Softball Team In Trouble

Longwood's women's softball team, sparked by the play of M. J. Campbell and Penny Gough won two out of seven games in the Liberty Baptist Tournament Friday and Saturday to finish third in the five-team event.

Now 11-10, the Lady Lancers visit Ferrum Monday, UNC-Greensboro Wednesday and then return home to host Liberty Baptist Thursday at 2:30 and Mary Washington Saturday at 1:00 to wind up the regular season. Longwood has not played at home since March 28.

Campbell earned a spot on the All-Tournament team with her showing at the plate and on the mound. The senior had seven hits in 19 at-bats, five runs-batted-in and a triple. In addition, she hurled a three-hitter in Longwood's 3-2 win over Charleston Saturday.

Gough also had a strong tournament with seven hits in 15 at-bats, two RBI's and three doubles.

In Friday action, Longwood fell to LBC 2-0, to Davis & Elkins 6-5 in sudden death and to Charleston 1-0 before bouncing back to beat West Georgia 8-4. Campbell had two hits and an RBI and freshman Tina Roberts went 2-3 with a run-batted-in in the victory.

Saturday, Longwood beat Charleston 3-2 to start the day, but fell to Davis & Elkins 7-5 and to Charleston 7-2.

Gough and Roberts are Longwood's top hitters currently with batting averages of .333. Campbell is hitting .283 and Bobi Shuler is next at .250. Shuler is the team leader in RBI's with 15, followed by Gough with 10 and Campbell with eight.

Campbell busts loose.

Wolfe Accepts Dos Passos Prize

Tom Wolfe accepted Longwood College's John Dos Passos Prize for Literature recently after delighting an audience with a reading from his new novel, The Bonfire of the Vanities.

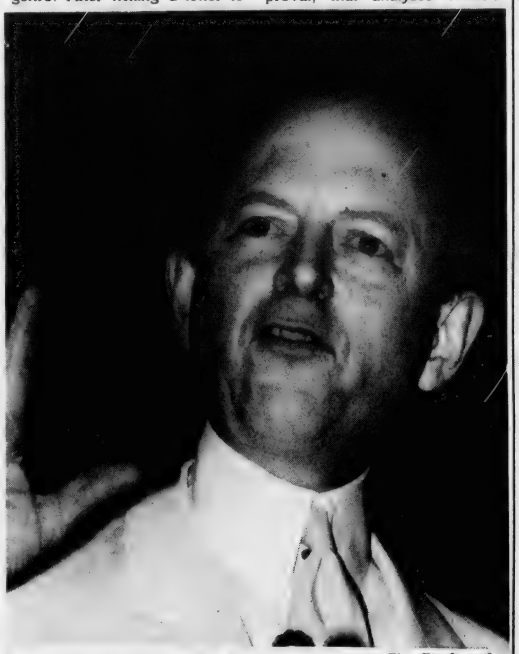
Wolfe, a Virginia-born writer who has chronicled American popular culture since the mid-1960s, accepted the award in a ceremony April 17 in Wygal Auditorium. The award, which has been given annually since 1980, includes a $1,000 cash prize and a medal.

A 54-year-old native of Richmond, Wolfe has been a leader of the so-called New Journalism, which blends the creativity of fiction-writing with standard reporting. Among his best-known works are Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test and The Right Stuff. William F. Buckley once wrote that Wolfe is "probably the most skillful writer in America."

Wolfe—who wore his trademark white double-breasted jacket, white slacks and white shoes—read from the first installment of The Bonfire of the Vanities, which is being published serially in Rolling Stone. The novel, Wolfe's first, is about life in New York City, with the major characters coming from diverse backgrounds. Some 21 chapters have been published so far.

The segment that Wolfe read contains a humorous vignette about a successful writer who takes his dog for a walk one evening so he can phone his mistress. Accidentally, he calls home and his wife recognizes his voice, prompting suspicion. There is also a struggling prosecutor in the Bronx who, to fend off would-be muggers on the subway, dresses like a seedy "D-train lunatic" on the way to work.

Serial novels, or those published in regular installments, were popular in mid and late 19th-century England, beginning with The Pickwick Papers by Charles Dickens. "Dickens became an overnight success because of The Pickwick Papers. Before that, he had been an obscure journalist," said Dr. Michael Lund, associate professor of English at Longwood. Almost all future novels by Dickens were published serially, either by themselves or in magazines.



Dr. Lund, an authority on serial novels, hopes that The Bonfire of the Vanities will lead to a resurgence of this literary genre. After writing a letter to Wolfe last summer, he received a reply in which Wolfe said, "Writing one of these things is like trying to clamber up the back of a truck that's already going 15 miles per hour. You don't know if you're heading down the road or head-first into the dust. Wish me luck."

A former newspaper and magazine reporter, Thomas Kennerly Wolfe Jr. is known for his "lively rhetoric and amusing observations of American social life... As a contributor to Esquire, he established a type of journalism that is characterized by the flagrant use of fictional devices to present intentionally colored facts," according to Academic American Encyclopedia. He is a graduate of Washington and Lee University and has a Ph.D. in American studies from Yale University.

One Longwood student, Donna Breckenridge of Farmville, plans to write a master's thesis in English, pending approval, that analyzes Wolfe's new novel, which Dr. Lund called "the only living serial novel." She attended the reading and spoke with Wolfe at a reception later in the Alumni House.

"I asked him how it would end," said Mrs. Breckenridge, who has read the novel from the beginning. "He said, 'Look for a happy ending.' But he added, 'Remember that happy endings are sometimes sad'."

The Bonfire of the Vanities is Wolfe's first major-length work since The Right Stuff, which, coincidentally, grew out of a series of articles in Rolling Stone in 1973. It is scheduled to end in mid-summer.

Dorm Fire Brings Safety Questions

By Mark Holland

"You only lose when you play with fire; it's not a game."

It is ironic that this bulletin board message should be displayed inside the Cunningham complex. On the first floor of Main Cunningham, one of the extinguisher is empty, the other, last checked on the 19th of November, needs a safety pin along with its overdue recharge. On the second floor of South Cunningham, there is only one fire extinguisher. In the entire Cunningham complex there are only four fire extinguishers at the acceptable 100% level.

The problem was evident on Friday night. This situation was never more evident than on Friday night when a room on the first floor of South Cunningham caught on fire. According to Doug Samuels, the R.E.C. on duty that weekend, the 10:30 blaze was apparently touched off by a stray cigarette butt that fell onto the window ledge and caught the shade on fire.

The flame then spread into the room and caught an 8' x 4' wall-hanging on fire. By the time the first students entered the room it was filled with smoke and the flames were licking up the walls. The first fire extinguisher could barely manage a stream. It did more to soak the bed than dampen the flames. Another extinguisher produced a stream more like that of a garden hose. When the wall-hanging fell behind the bed, the situation worsened. Only one extinguisher was in proper working order. Longwood officials are investigating the incident.

Schools Update Dorms

For college students, access to cable television, automated banking machines and an occasional lobster dinner or late night pizza used to mean having to go off campus.

Not anymore.

Thanks to administrators' worries about attracting students to their dorms and intensifying competition for rents with off-campus apartment complexes, an increasing number of schools are offering a smorgasboard of once-unheard-of amenities for next fall.

At the University of North Dakota, some dorms have weight rooms and saunas.

At Eastern Michigan University, some on-campus residents have access to computer rooms in their dormitories, and are offered 12-month leases.

At the University of Oklahoma, free cable television in dormitory lounges, a pizza bar and an automated banking machine are in the works for next fall.

The school also has hired a new food service director and given free reign to plan what administrations call "monotony breakers," such as lobster dinners.

"Try as we might, there re some areas in which we just cannot compete with apartment complex owners," say OU assistant housing director Craig Pulliam.

"But there is an awful lot we can do."

Dormitory residents are not pampered at every school. Many institutions still face perennial dormitory over-crowding, particularly at the beginning of the school year.

"It's sporadic across the country," says Jim Grimm, housing director at the University of Florida and president of a national housing officers group.

Grimm estimates that between 20 and 25 percent of the nation's colleges now have a hard time filling their dorms.

Some schools—Oklahoma and the Superior and Oshkosh campuses of the University of Wisconsin among them—are being forced to close dormitories.

But the schools still have to pay of mortgages on closed dorms, so, to avoid similar fates, most vacant dorms are turning increasingly to more aggressive marketing.

And some schools that are still full are offering students more to stay on campus, if only to keep

Academic Awards Commentary

By Eric T. Houseknecht

Last Wednesday evening, April 7, saw the first of what is hoped to become a yearly tradition of Academic Awards Banquets. Held in Blackwell Dining Hall and catered by A.R.A., the event lasted just under two hours and saw many of Longwood's academic achievers honored.

Unlike those of past years, this year's ceremony was limited to awards strictly academic. While several student groups have expressed discontent over the elimination of non-academic awards from the annual proceedings it's probably safe to say that the semi-formal, dinner style presentation was a much more tolerable format for most students than the afternoon-long auditorium events of previous years.

The ceremony opened with short speeches by Dr. Vail, Dr. Greenwood, and the recently named V. P. for Academic Affairs 1985-86, Dr. James Adams.

The actual presentation of awards lasted less than an hour as preliminary comments and prefacing remarks were kept short and concise. Most of what transpired was no big surprise but, as always, there were a couple of sleepers who came into their own as the fateful envelopes were opened. Unsuspecting winners included senior Steve Badtke (John R. Clark Math Education Award), Freshman Bobby J. Orndorff (H. R. Blackwell Scholarship), and yours truly as one of the select few to receive the coveted Who's Who in American Colleges and Universities certificate.

The food was great and everyone who didn't receive an invitation had to eat on Wheeler Mall. It was, undoubtedly, a special evening for those whose academic achievements allowed them to be there and hopefully created some incentive for those whose didn't.

SGA Election Procedures

Petitions are available in the information office and are due back to the same place by midnight April 24.

Election will be April 30 from 9 a.m. until 6:30 p.m. in the new Smoker. Show that you care about the students' life in college, vote.

Vote for class officers, honor board members - 15, campus life chairman, and judicial board members - 30.

Thanks,

Your Turn

Gay Awareness Supported

To the editor:

I am writing in response to student reaction on April 10. Last week The Rotunda staff asked Longwood students to wear jeans in support of Gay Awareness Week or in other words, education regarding homosexuals. This simply means that you support learning more on a subject that most of us know little about.

By supporting education you are neither condemning or condoning the lifestyle.

On April 10, I saw fewer jeans worn than on any day since I've been here. It's sad to think that in 1985 there is a college population who rejects education, or worse, that there exists a population who cannot read and comprehend well enough to know what support of an awareness week means!

Sincerely,
Gretchen Young

Chili Reception

To the editor:

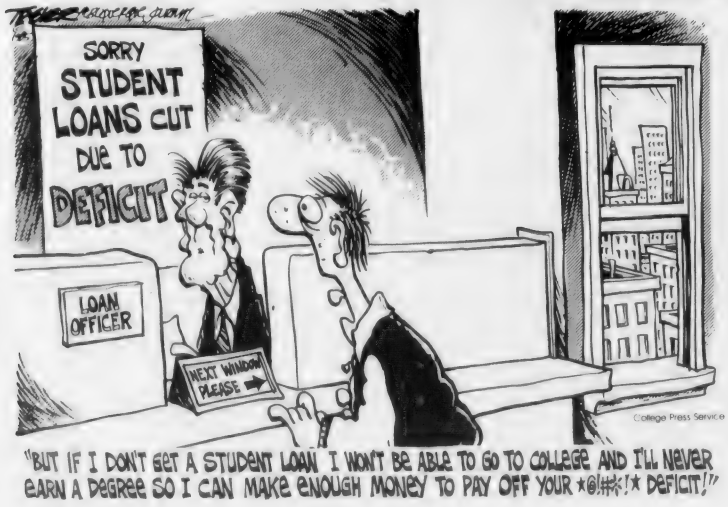
In response to the article on Spring Weekend in the April 16th issue, we would like to inform you of an error. The first place winner of the Chili Cook Off was Alpha Pi Omega, National Service Fraternity. It was not Delta Sigma Pi. In the future, your information should be checked before it is put in print.

Alpha Pi Omega

In The Limelight

To the editor:

As a careful reader of your publication, I get tired of seeing the same old faces in every issue. It is not that I dislike them, but variety should be used. Other people and other subjects could be photographed. I don't care whether Eric, Frank, or Mick are showing the lastest fashions, mellowing out in the construction sight of the new snack bar, or looking happy at a journalism convention. Now that they are known on sight as self-made campus stars, could you please take pictures of something else?



The Critic

To "The Critic",

Admittedly, you are "a careful reader" (so astute of you to recognize us in all of those pictures), but a genius you are not. Does anyone complain about Ronald Reagan being on the front page of the N.Y. Times four days a week or Brook Shields making it into every other issue of The Star? Celebrities like us are constantly hounded by photographers and reporters from hundreds of national and international publications. Your lack of compassion for those who lead such harrowed lifestyles is typical of the ignorance displayed by today's unfeeling public.

If you want some variety, try this one on for size: Here's me last fall trying to enjoy an evening of privacy at a sorority social function.

Unwillingly yours,
Eric T. Houseknecht

"Can't you photographers ever leave me alone?"

The Balcony Reviewed

By Randy Copeland

In their final play of the semester, The Longwood Players and Department of Speech and Theater presented The Balcony, a play by Jean Genet. The production is set in a brothel that specializes in fantasy to satisfy customers, while it protects them from reality of the revolution that surrounds the house.

The first act introduces a "John" who has a great desire to become a bishop, but only achieves his fantasy by wearing a costume and elevated shoes to feel power. The bishop looks at the mirror on the wall to verify to himself the powerful position he has assumed. Following this scene a judge is similarly dressed up to decide a verdict against his "mistress" and achieve an equal feeling of importance. He, also, uses a mirror to view himself in the fantasy role he has taken. Next, another customer is clad in military gear, complete with medals and elevated shoes, to force his girl to act as his horse and tell him of his great heroism as a general.

The madame of the brothel, Irma (Becky Etzler), is a forceful and powerful business woman who does whatever is necessary to please her customers and satisfy their desires. Eventually, Irma, the bishop, the judge, and the general are all adopted to replace the queen and her court, thus realizing their personal fantasies. This, of course, making a long story short, however, in a play of this length and depth, it would be impossible to go into details, however, the irony and individual struggles by the characters was powerful and attempted to make the audience realize that everyone wants to see themselves as a grand illusion instead of what we may actually be.

As for the performance, the acting was generally superb, but occasionally overdone. Etzler, who had over 700 lines, was very successful in portraying a every bitchy Irma. She made very appropriate smirk or glance that made her a most convincing character. Glenn A. Gilmer (the bishop) seemed to flicker between accents a bit too often, but was very funny, and similar to a television evangelist. Curt Walker (the judge) pressed his character a bit too much in the early scenes, but later relaxed to make a very plausible and entertaining performance. Jeff Fleming (the general) was very comfortable with his character and managed to transform from a nervous "John" to a heroic leader with great ease. Jerry Dagenhart, who played the Chief of Police of the beseiged city, was a less heroic Indiana Jones, who seemed to lack originality in his part. Despite this, his voice was very strong and his acting is highly commendable. Sam St. Phard (Arther) is very funny in his performance and Anna Prow (thief) also is humorous when she teases with the judge. Michele Watson (Dove) is flawless in her dealings with the general while exhibiting courage by wearing a very risque costume. Mark Holland (the tramp) and Ashby Conway (the redhead) were most successful in presenting their episode with the most action compared to the least words. Their movements and activities were very easily interpreted to exhibit the apprehension felt by visitors to the house.

Toby Embert added a cynical side as the court envoy, and he was as easily despised as J.R. Ewing or Alexis Carrington. Joyce Rollandini (Carmen), Vince Decker (the rebel leader), and Connie Watkins (Chantal), all gave strong, steady performances and were very enjoyable. The entire cast and crew should be congratulated for an excellent production with a very attractive, sturdy set.

Sociology Conference

By Tim Fitzgerald

On April 11-13, Longwood's Sociology and Anthropology departemtns attended the Southern Sociological Society Annual Meetings held in Charlotte, N. C. Over 2,000 people attended this conference which is one of the larger regional conferences in the nation. Dr. Ballard, Dr. Jordan and Dr. Perkins accompanied Yolanda Thomas, Herman McDonald, Charles Green, Melba Whitaker, Karen Haddock and Benji Smith to the conference.

At the conference, Dr. Perkins presented a paper titled "Towards a Theory of Occupational Solidarity, Part I: On the Causes of Occupational Communities." Dr. Ballard presented a paper titled "Social Change at Local Community Level: Community Responses to Reestablishment of Cambodian Refugees." He also served as a discussant in a session on Applied Human Sociology.

Two students, Yolanda Thomas and Herman McDonald, were in the Undergraduate Student Paper Competition.

According to Dr. Ballard, "This was a good experience for all the students who went. They got a chance to see how these meetings are conducted."

Business Students Awarded At Convention

By Deanna Moore

The Phi Beta Lambda Business Fraternity attended the annual State convention in Staunton on April 12-13. Of the 16 Longwood students that attended the convention, 11 of them placed and received awards.

These students received first place and are now eligible to compete in National competition in Houston, Texas from July 4 through July 8. The three are as follows: Michael Tupper, Mr. Future Business Teacher; Shirley Smith, Business Law; Lisa Jessup, Marketing. Mike Tupper will also receive a $75 savings bond from the Virginia Business Education Association.

In case the first place winners are unable to attend the National competition, the three students that received second place will attend. They are as follows: Mary Beth Blessing, Ms. Future Business Teacher; Sherry Southall, Business Communications; Judy Goodridge, Job Interview.

The five students that received third place are: Richard Schmidgale, Mr. Future Executive; Allison Berry, Ms. Future Business Executive; Brent Shaw, Impromptu Speaking; Michael Harris, Accounting II; Bobbie Williams, Administrative Assistant - Secretary.

In addition to Mike Tupper's Mr. Future Business Teacher award, he was also named alternate recipient for the Mary B. McGinty Memorial Scholarship.

Congratulations to everyone that attended and especially to everyone that placed! Approximately 300 students attended the State convention so it is a real honor for Longwood students to receive a total of 11 awards.

Presidential Assistant Named

Meredith Strohm, director of student services at Longwood College, has been appointed assistant to the president at Longwood.

She succeeds Sarah Kennedy, who is returning to full-time doctoral study at William and Mary and a teaching position at St. Leo College.

The position has been changed from "intern" status to a regular staff appointment.

Strohm came to Longwood in July, 1983 from the University of Maryland, where she was working on her doctorate and serving on the faculty associate staff. She has an M.S. degree in College Student Personnel Administration from Indiana University and a B.A. in sociology from Miami University of Ohio.

In addition to her work in student development at Longwood, Strohm is teaching a course in social work and co-directing the Faculty and Curriculum Development Project on integrating women's studies throughout the curriculum. She and Dr. Chester C. Ballard, assistant professor of sociology, are conducting the project under a grant from the Duke/University of North Carolina Regional Women's Studies Center.

Strohm, 33, has written four articles for professional journals and presented papers at numerous conferences and workshops. She was selected to participate in a series of Moral Development Institutes at Harvard University last January. She will give the keynote address at a regional conference of the National Association for Student Personnel Administrators in June. Her remarks will focus on student development and the mission of undergraduate education.

Tech Requiring P. C.

In following the example set by the Virginia Tech School of Engineering which requires incoming freshmen to purchase IBM personal computers, all Freshmen entering Tech's computer science department next Fall will be required to purchase Apple Macintosh L computers.

According to Donald Allison, the Head of the computer science department, the owning of personal computers is being implemented to provide a "better educational environment" for the students simply by having systems that are more available.

The total cost of having such availability will run about $2500, including hardwear and softwear packages

H. L. Mencken in
"The Sahara of the Bozart"

There are single acres in Europe that house more first rate men than all the states south of the Potomac, than there are probably single square miles in America. If the whole of the late Confederacy were to be engulfed by a tidal wave tomorrow, the effect upon the civilized minority of men in the world would be but little greater than that of a flood on the Yang-Tse-Kiang. It would be impossible in all history to match so complete a drying-up of a civilization.

U.S.C. INVESTIGATES 40 STUDENTS IN COMPUTER GRADE TAMPERING PROBE—What began last summer as one university employee paid to falsify five students' grades, has led to an investigation of 40 students for "unauthorized discrepancies" in their grade transcripts.

A faculty panel is conducting review hearings and will recommend sanctions in each case, says Vice Provost Sylvia Manning.

PEER TUTORS HELP IMPROVE COURSE WORK BETTER THAN MORE TEACHER ATTENTION—A Stanford University study shows peer tutoring improves students' work almost four times more effectively than smaller classes or greater teaching time.

The study says computer-assisted instruction, the second most cost-effective method, is twice as costly as peer tutoring.

DOMINO'S PIZZA DELIVERY CARS were temporarily banned from the Univ. of Southern California campus because of repeated traffic violations. The Office of Security and Parking Operations lifted the ban after Domino's agreed to spend more time training drivers and to take disciplinary action against drivers who receive campus traffic citations.

BLACK STUDENTS STAGED A SIT—IN in the Univ. of Pennsylvania classroom of a professor they say is harassing black students. The Black Student League staged the protest after the professor allegedly called two black students "ex-slaves." The professor involved apologized for his comments. The BSL later met with administrators to press for racism awareness seminars and more black faculty members, but walked out of that meeting, calling the administration "unresponsive."

IT'S THE YIPPIES OVER THE YUPPIES, at least if victory is measured by who is winning the bulk of applause at the popular Yippie vs. Yuppie campus debates between radical activist Abbie Hoffman and Wall Street investor Jerry Ruben. At recent appearances at the universities of Virginia and North Carolina, Hoffman was the obvious favorite.

THE BLACK STUDENT MOVEMENT at the Univ. of North Carolina lost a referendum to get constitutionally protected funding for its organization. By a 94-vote margin, among over 4,000 votes cast, the UNC student body rejected the plan. The one positive note, said BSM leaders, was increased awareness of the organization campuswide.

A STUDENT PRESIDENT CANDIDATE at the Univ. of North Carolina-Chapel Hill filed Honor Court charges against two other student officers, claiming they distributed negative campaign materials that contributed to his defeat. The pair reportedly put up posters identifying the candidate as a socialist. One of those involved admitted distributing the posters, but says that action is within his right to free speech.

STUDENT SHOULD EARN INTEREST from their student fees, the Associated Students of the Univ. of Oregon is claiming. Its finance coordinator wants the state legislature to turn over the interest earned on student fee surpluses to the ASUO. Under current practice, the state receives the interest on the account, although the money belongs to the students and is used in years when student fees fall short of expected budgets.

A VIRGINIA PRINTER FACES A BOYCOTT by the Univ. of Virginia Student Council, after he refused to print a poster advertising the council's "Homosexuals in Society" forum. PRIOR RESTRAINT IS UNDER DEBATE AT THE UNIV. OF CONNECTICUT where the Undergraduate Student Government passed a resolution opposing a student group's publication of a "Pledge of Resistance." The group, Students for Peace, printed the pledge in its newsletter to encourage students to commit civil disobedience at federal facilities in the event the U. S. invaded Nicaragua. The USG's response is an attempt to exercise prior restraint, says the student newspaper, The Daily Campus. Not so, says the USG, which claims it's only exercising its own freedom of expression in asking the Students for Peace to get prior approval of controversial material which USG helps fund.

EDITORS OF EIGHT IVY LEAGUE PAPERS put their heads together to produce an editorial that came down hard on the Reagan administration's proposed federal aid cuts. The statement was then published in all eight papers. It targets the effects of the proposed cuts of Ivy League schools, which might have to abandon need-blind admission policies, and says the cuts would make higher education "the exclusive privilege of the wealthy."

SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS SELECTIVE SERVICE PROSECUTION POLICY—By a 7 to 2 vote the Court rules the government's policy of prosecuting young men who refuse to register for the draft only if they publicize that refusal does not violate free speech rights.

The decision affects 18 men to publicized their decisions to resist draft registration by writing letters to President Reagan or to the Selective Service.

The Justice Department says it now seeks out all eligible men who have failed to register for the draft, not just "known" non-registrants.

SCHOOLS PLAN NEW ALCOHOL GUIDELINES—The Univ. of Illinois-Urbana-Champaign student senate has banned uncontrolled alcohol sampling, drinking contests and alcoholic awards on campus.

The proposal, however, contains no enforcement provisions.

And Roanoke (VA) College President Norman Fintel hopes to ban beer kegs from campus next fall.

Fintel says kegs symbolize "the essence of alcoholic abuse."

CAMPUS COPS CLIP WINGS OF PHOENIX COVERAGE—The proverbial open records struggle between student newspapers and campus police forces has hit San Francisco State Univ.

"Relations have never been exactly the best between the Department of Public Safety and the Phoenix," says student managing editor Christine Feldhorn. But those strained relations reached the breaking point after the weekly paper reported that the DPS was under criticism from the San Francisco Police Department chief. The paper had obtained a letter from the chief to the campus DPS office, complaining that DPS had failed to file a follow-up report on an October campus rape.

After that report came a virtual news blackout, says Feldhorn. "Whenever we'd call, all the they'd say was 'We are not speaking to Phoenix.' For about a week there they cut us off completely." Meanwhile the DPS did provide information to the other SFSU student newspaper, The Golden Gater.

Grimm notes the University of Florida is establishing dormitories with a strong academic thrust: computers, quiet halls and live-in faculty advisors.

In some cases, innovative university administrators are acting on their own initiative. In others, they have no choice.

Norman, for example, has developed a massive apartment glut off campus, Pulliam points out.

Landlords are offering a range of inducements to attract students, including a month's free rent.

The number of OU students living on campus reached an all-time high in 1982-83. Dormitory enrollment has declined by about 10 percent since then, and school officials expect it go go down again next year.

Lancers Lose At UMBC

Stunned by a doubleheader loss at Maryland Baltimore County Sunday, Longwood's 18th ranked baseball team will have to bounce back strong this week if the Lancers hope to make a return trip to the NCAA Playoffs in May.

Now 29-9, Longwood has a tough road ahead this week. Following a home game with Hampden-Sydney Monday, the Lancers visit Norfolk State for two Tuesday, Richmond for a single game Thursday and Mount St. Mary's for two contests Saturday. Coach Buddy Bolding's squad hosts St. Mary's Sunday at 1 p.m. and wraps up the season at Virginia Commonwealth next Tuesday, April 30.

The Lancers had beaten Maryland Baltimore County 12-9 back in March, but Sunday afternoon the Retrievers put the bite on Longwood 9-2 and 7-6 in eight innings. the nightcap loss was a back-breaker for the Lancers who held a 6-3 lead going into the bottom of the seventh inning. Longwood's Scott Mills walked two batters before giving up a homer which tied the game at 6-6. UMBC won it in the bottom of the eighth.

Mills gave up an astounding 13 walks in the contest, but the Lancers almost won anyway thanks to the hitting heroics of senior Allen Lawter.

record 57 runs, beating the old mark of 52 which Mayone set last season. Lawter is also batting .455 with nine homers. He and Mayone are tied for the career lead in homers with 18 each.

What makes Lawter's season even more amazing is that many of his hits have come in key situations with men on base.

In the first game UMBC battered Lancer starter Rob Furth for seven runs in the third inning to take a commanding 9-0 lead. Dennis Leftwich slugged a two-run homer in the fifth as Longwood avoided the shutout. Retriever pitcher Craig Varner limited the Lancers to four hits. Four Longwood errors also hurt the cause.

Earlier last week, Longwood took two from Radford Thursday 11-1 and 8-4 and staged a ninth inning rally to nip Virginia Commonwealth 11-10 Wednesday. Todd Ashby and Tony Browning hurled complete game victories against the Highlanders. Ashby is now 5-1 and Browning 6-1.

Junior Todd Thompson drove in the winning run in the bottom of the ninth as the Lancers scored three to overcome a 10-8 VCU lead.

Lawter Shatters RBI Mark

In the midst of what may be the best season yet by a Longwood batter, Lawter ripped two homers and drove in five runs. His three-run shot in the first, along with a solo homer by Jeff Mayone staked the Lancers to a 4-0 lead. Then in the top of the seventh, his two-run blast put Longwood up 6-3.

Lawter has now driven in a

Lancer Baseball Notes

—Leftwich passed a major milestone in his career last week, topping the 100 mark in stolen bases. The junior centerfielder has swiped 46 in 50 attempts this season and 102 of 107 in three years for a percentage of .953. A Northside High graduate, Leftwich raised his batting average to .384 heading into the games at UMBC.

—Sophomore Jeff Rohm broke the single season record for doubles Thursday. The catcher now has 16 doubles, most ever by a Lancer player in one season.

Lady Cagers Receive National Honors

Longwood senior forwards Florence Holmes and Valerie Turner and Lady Lancer coach Shirley Duncan have been honored by the American Women's Sports Federation.

Holmes and Turner, who led the Longwood women's basketball squad to a 16-13 season, have been named to the AWSF Division II All-America squad on the fourth team. Holmes also landed a spot on the AWSF South Atlantic All-Region team.

Duncan was selected as an All-American Coach for 1984-85. The Longwood coach has led her team to back-to-back winning seasons, 16-13 this year and 16-10 last season, reversing a five-year losing trend.

Holmes had been picked previously on the All Mason-Dixon Conference first team. The 5-9 forward scored 1,304 points and grabbed 821 rebounds in her career, ranking as Longwood's second leading all-time rebounder and scorer.

Turner had received All-MDAC first team and VaSID College Division All-State honors earlier this spring. The Lady Lancer career rebounding leader, Turner pulled off 915 missed shots and scored 1,131 points in four years. She ranks fourth on Longwood's career scoring lists.

Putters Last Stroke

The Longwood men's golf team competed in the Chowan Invitational Thursday and the Shipbuilder's Tournament, hosted by Newport News Apprentice, Friday in action last week.

The Lancer wrap-up spring play this week, hosting Newport News, Washington and Lee and Bluefield Tuesday at Longwood Golf Course and competing against Hampden-Sydney and Liberty Baptist Wednesday in Keysville.

Player of the Week

Senior Lanie Gerken led Longwood to a third place finish in the National Small College Women's Golf Tournament last week, and for her performance, Gerken has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period April 12-19. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

One of the top golfers in Longwood history, Gerken fired a 71-79-78-228 at the national tournament, finished third out of over 40 golfers. Her first round 71 (1-under par) was the low round of the event played at Seminole Golf Course in Tallahassee, Florida.

Her top five finish enabled Gerken to be named a first team All-American, the fifth in Longwood history. Her 228 total is the third best LC score ever for three rounds of play, and the 71 equals her previous career best which came in last year's Small College tourney. Only Penny Stallins has shot a better round than Gerken, a 70 which was recorded in 1973.

Gerken holds the school record for three round score, a 74-74-74-222, which she shot at last fall's Longwood Invitational.

A participant in last year's NCAA Women's Golf Championship, Gerken has been a vital cog in Longwood's success over the past two seasons.

Softball Team Ends Up 16 and 11

Paced by senior pitcher M. J. Campbell, the Longwood women's softball team closed out the season with five wins in its last six games. The Lady Lancers finished 16-10, winning the most games in school history.

In the season finale Saturday Campbell got credit for both wins. Coach Nanette Fisher's squad dispatched visiting Mary Washington 4-1 and 15-0. Thursday, the Lady Lancers split with Liberty Baptist, losing the opener 3-2, but bouncing back to take the second game 8-3.

Longwood began the week Wednesday with a sweep of UNC-Greensboro, 5-1 and 7-4. The softball team has notched a winning record in four of the five seasons Longwood has fielded a squad.

Campbell ended her career in fine style, tossing a four-hitter and a one-hitter in the sweep of Mary Washington. She also went 2-3 at the plate in the second game when the Lady Lancers benefited from 15 walks by the Blue Tide.

With a 9-6 pitching record this season, Campbell had a 14-9 career mark. Earlier last week she had a homer, a double and three RBI's to pace Longwood wins over LBC and UNC-G.

Freshman pitcher Andrea Samsky finished her first year of action with a 7-4 record. She had wins over UNC-G and LBC in the final week.

Other top performers last week were Julie Biscoe with four runs-batted-in, Annette Easterling with two doubles and four RBI's and Bobbi Shuler with three RBI's. Shuler drove in 18 runs for the season to lead the team.

FLAME ON THE LOOSE—Longwood's Julie Biscoe (left) and Janet Lee await Liberty Baptist baserunner as the ball bounce loose in Thursday's contest.

Men's Tennis Drops Five

Longwood's men's tennis team dropped five matches last week and won a sixth by forfeit. The Lancers fell to Randolph-Macon 9-0, Monday, to Averett 8-1 Tuesday, to Roanoke 9-0 Wednesday, to Hampden-Sydney 6-3 Thursday and to Newport News Apprentice 8-1 Saturday. The Lancers got a forfeit win Sunday when Ferrum failed to show up for a scheduled match.

Now 2-14, the Lancers got wins from Arjun Rishi and J. D. Almond in singles and Rishi and Almond in doubles in Thursday's loss to Hampden-Sydney. Longwood is scheduled to wind up the season Wednesday at Ferrum.

IAA Update

Softball fever is building in the Intramural Athletic Association with the finals of the winners brackets in both the men's and women's division to be held this week.

Eight teams are remaining in the A League Softball Tournament with Fever and Keggers I, both undefeated. The B League has only six teams still competing.

The Women's Bracket has eight teams currently in the battle for the championship. Images and Totally Awesome are undefeated.

In men's tennis doubles, Kidwell Haldeman will play the winner of Clark-Jimenez vs. Young-Gemborowicz for the title.

Entry blanks and Captain's Meeting for foul shooting contest are due on Wednesday, April 22.

Golfers In The Swing

Longwood played solid golf in the National Small College Women's Golf Championship Monday through Wednesday at Seminole Golf Course, but the end result was a third place finish behind two teams which played even better.

Led by senior Lanie Gerken and freshmen Marcia Melone and Tina Barrett, Longwood carded a 315-307-312-934. Weber State (Utah) was the winner with a 304-302-315-921 while Troy State (Alabama) was second at 314-302-309-925.

Longwood took consolation from the fact that Gerken, Melone and Barrett received All-American honors, based on the top 10 finish in the individual standings.

Gerken, who shot the low round of the tournament on day one (71), was third and earned first team All-American honors. She shot 71-79-78-228 to lead Longwood in the tournament. She had finished sixth last season in the Small College Nationals.

Melone tied for eighth with an 81-75-75-231 and Barrett was 10th at 79-74-79-232. The freshmen earned berths on the second team All-American squad.

"I'm pleased overall with the way we played," said coach Barbara Smith. "Our score was not bad, but it wasn't quite good enough to win.'"

Melone received a special award for being the low freshman in the tournament. She earned the Mike Ferrell Award, named after the late Weber State coach.

Lacrosse Team Splits Week

The Longwood women's lacrosse team went 1-1 last week, beating Bridgewater 14-7 Saturday, but falling at Lynchburg 14-10 Wednesday.

Improving as the week progressed, the Lady Lancers put together one of their best games of the year Saturday at Bridgewater. Racing to a 6-3 halftime edge, Longwood got seven goals from leading scorer Sue Groff and outscored the Eagles 8-4 in the second half.

"We played really well as a team on both offense and defense," said assistant coach Terry Chumley.

Backing up Groff in the scoring column were Rala Heinen and Teresa Alvis with two goals each, and Kim Rhodes, Mariana Johnson and Sharon Smith with one each. Goalkeeper Jackie Smith had 10 saves.

Groff had four goals, Heinen two, Alvis three and Johnson one in Wednesday's loss at Lynchburg. Smith had 16 saves, but the Hornets out-shot Longwood 35-25.

Now 5-3, the Lady Lancers closed out their season Monday afternoon with a home game against Hollins.

Netters End Season At Home

With hopes of finishing with a winning record, Longwood's women's tennis team closes out its 1985 season this week, visiting Ferrum Tuesday and returning home to host Southern Seminary Thursday at 3:30 p.m. and Bridgewater Friday at 2 p.m.

Coach Bill Moore's squad, which has won three of its last four matches, will take a 4-5 record into Tuesday's match. In the only action last week Mary Baldwin beat LC 8-1 Tuesday afternoon. Heather Gardner took a three-set victory in singles to help Longwood avoid the shutout.

Insurance Companies Threaten Drinking Ban

North Dartmouth, MA—In a trend which many experts claim could soon spread nationwide, all Massachusetts state colleges and universities are being forced to halt campus alcohol sales because they can't find an insurance company to carry their alcohol liability policies.

It could make college bars and on-campus liquor sales obsolete.

"No other state is in as severe a position as Massachusetts, yet," notes Mark Rosenberg of the Insurance Information Institute (III). "But it's a growing problem around the country and it could easily become as severe in other areas."

The problem arose first at Southeastern Massachusetts University (SMU), when administrators recently learned their insurance broker couldn't locate a company willing to renew their alcohol liability insurance.

Such coverage protects the university, campus bar employees, administrators, and regents from lawsuits connected with on-campus alcohol consumption.

SMU received notice its alcohol coverage would not be renewed at the end of March because insurance companies were getting out of the alcohol liability business.

"The underwriters are simply no longer renewing any bar or club liability policies," explains Francis Gordon, director of auxiliary services at SMU. "They're getting out of alcohol liability coverage except for establishments with an 80/20 food-alcohol mix. And there's no way a campus bar can serve that much food."

Only days after SMU learned its alcohol coverage would not be renewed, state colleges throughout Massachusetts were told their alcohol policies would be cancelled April 1.

Because Massachusetts law requires state schools to carry liability insurance before they can serve alcohol, on-campus alcohol sales in the state virtually have ended, Gordon says.

"We've (SMU) already stopped selling alcohol here," he says, "and the other schools will have to do the same thing real soon. Even without the state law, we couldn't afford to continue serving alcohol without liability insurance."

Experts say the lack of alcohol liability insurance easily could spread to other states.

"The commercial liability industry is in a very tough time," notes Bob Fulton, an insurance broker with Child, Savory, and Hayward in Boston, which unsuccessfully tried to find a company to renew SMU's alcohol liability policy.

"From what we've seen, insurance companies are very anxious to get out of the liability market in general, and alcohol liability coverage in particular," he says.

The reason, Fulton and other experts say, is a combination of tougher drinking laws, increased liability of bars and taverns for the actions of intoxicated patrons, and mushrooming court awards in alcohol-related lawsuits.

In addition, 35 states now have "dram shop" laws that extend liability for alcohol-related accidents to the parties that served liquor to the person who caused the accident, explains Edward Hammond, vice president for student affairs at the University of Louisville, and member of a newly-established national task force on college alcohol issues.

Colleges, too, have faced increasing liability in recent years for accidents, crimes and injuries resulting from institutional negligence.

Cases involving such schools as Ohio State, Virginia and Oregon, to name a few, have held student organizations and fraternities responsible for the actions of intoxicated guests, Hammond points out.

Even raising the legal drinking age can make colleges more vulnerable to lawsuits.

In Minnesota, for instance, the drinking age may soon jump from 19 to 21, greatly increasing the chances of colleges accidentally serving liquor to minors, and opening up tremendous liability potential, warns University of Minnesota attorney Mark Karon.

"If you were at a fraternity, a sorority, or a dormitory or any other kind of party and you gave liquor to a minor, you impose the possibility of common-law negligence" by selling liquor to underaged students, he warns.

"In the wake of all these law changes and crackdowns, what's happening is that someone drinks himself blind, goes out and wraps his car around a telephone pole or crashes into another car, and then the victims and their families sue the bar or fraternity for huge financial settlements," says Donna McKenna of the Professional Insurance Agents Association.

"That's why (insurance companies) are dropping alcohol liability.

If more insurance companies quit offering alcohol liability policies, colleges may find it increasingly costly to serve liquor, or to allow alcohol on campus at all.

SMU is a completely "dry" campus now, says Auxiliary Services Director Gordon. Other Massachusetts schools soon will do the same thing, he predicts.

Indeed, without liability insurance, "many colleges around the country may decide to simply ban alcohol from campus rather than face the risk it poses to the institution," says Louisville's Hammond, noting a number of campuses already have gone dry even with liability insurance.

"It's not something I agree with," he adds, "but it's certainly making more and more sense—at least financially and legally—for colleges to get away from alcohol altogether."

ALMOST Snack Bar Open

Opening Postponed

Friday, September 20 is the date set for the rescheduled grandopening of the Lance Cafe/Recreation Center, although Rick Johnson, Director of ARA Dining Services, seems doubtful of its completion by this time.

The newest part of the facility, where the old bookstore used to be, has already been completed. The delays seem to be in getting the old snack bar area in shape, while awaiting the arrival of updated kitchen equipment lack of available labor also seems to be a major consideration in the opening's deadline was supposed to be opened last year.

By the time Lance Cafe is completed, it will have cost around $200,000, says Johnson with the money coming totally from student fees. However, according to Phyllis Mable VP of Student of Affairs, included in tuition. These fees have not been increased to accomodate the new center, but rather have been managed wisely over a period of time. Upon completion, The Lancer Cafe will hold 300 people and is tentatively scheduled to be open 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. Monday thru Thursday and will be open until midnight on weekends. Sundays hours will be 1 p.m. to 7 p.m.

The Rec Center will basically have two sections: an eatery and an entertainment center although food and drink will be available on both sides. Johnson hesitates to call the new entertainment section a bar because that carries the idea of liberal drinking - an idea that Longwood is trying to deter.

As promised last year, beer will be served to those of age, but mixed drinks will be not be served. Virgin Drinks or Mocktails (mixed drinks without alcohol) will be available for $1.00. A 16 oz. glass of beer will cost only $1.00 and a mug of beer will be 60 cents. Six-packs will still be sold, but only as carry out - they may not be consumed in the cafe under the guidelines of the ABC License ARA currently holds.

ARA will utilize a system of hand stamping that designates drinkers from non-drinkers. Students will be admitted with their Longwood ID and will be permitted to bring as many as two guests, as customary, guests will be the responsbility of their host.

In an effort to make the process of distinguishing those that are of legal age to drink from those that aren't, Longwood Colege has come up with a system that involves the new I.D.'s. These individuals who are under aged will find a red dot appearing in the upper left hand corner of their student I.D.'s. Those who are of age will not.

Special organizations such as fraternites, sororities and residence halls will not be able to reserve the cafe for special events. "The theme behind the student Rec Center is the student, not an organization. It is the to be open to all students at all times," said Phylis Mable.

When the cafe is finally completed, it will house a small dance floor with music being played by the bartender. Future plans for a D.J. booth are currently under consideration.

Snack Bar? What Snack Bar?

by Bruce Souza

Returning Longwood students will recognize many familiar sights upon resumption of the academic year. The long lines at the book store, the Freshmen who are trying to figure out the difference between West Ruffner and Grainger, and the girl who takes 45 minutes at the salad bar customizing her lettuce. These types of situations are to be expected with a high influx of new students and the general confusion associated with the beginning of the year. As the confusion wanes and people begin to settle in, a latent, and fairly recent manifestation begins to stir in the hearts and guts of many a Longwood scholar. What happened to our cheesy snack bar? Moreover, where's the "Lancer Cafe" that has been promised since I was a young man?

My first car always worked until I tried to "fix" it. The example above seems analagous to the snack bar situation. It seems that three months should have been enough time to finish the project, considering half was already finished at the end of last semester. Haven't most of us heard the sardonic warnings of doing a "half-ass" job? Now we have one half completely renovated and the other half in shambles. The scenario is hauntingly reminicent of the way the old bookstore looked at the beginning of last year. Will it take another year for the snack bar/Lancer Cafe to open? Perhaps we are witnessing the beginning of a tradition, and should appreciate its historical significance.

Recently an informed insider told me that the snack bar would open on October 1. Yet another delay! What happened to opening in August? Do the construction workers of the greater Farmville area hibernate during the summer? Perhaps we are funneling snack bar funds to the Contras in Nicaragua? Or do we need Congressional approval? Oh, and by the way, isn't it just a little unnerving to walk by everyday and never see a soul in there working.

So why the delays? First it was plans being re-drawn. Other reasons cited included the time and tedious nature of complying with state law in reference to processing bids from contractors. Unfortunately, this past lip service has worn thin. The same frustrated remarks are heard from students as they parade past the snack bar debacle. I would have thought the administration involved would have seen to a certain August opening date. It would have provided a comfortable on campus lounge, boosted morale for returning students, and impressed new ones. Perhaps, it is a low priority. I guess eveybody just got too involved bureaucratizing the new alcohol guidelines or making posters for the highly popular Y.A.C. Center. Maybe the guys who were supposed to refurbish the snack bar found steady work fixing the old Red Lion?

There really must be some embarrassed administrators at Longwood, considering all the promises and subsequent delays. The February 5, 1985, Rotunda article "Campus Pub Likely To Open In The Fall" is an ugly reminder and epitomizes the failure of the adminstration on this project. History shows us that Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon quickly became accountable to an angry public. I wonder who's accountable at Longwood? Maybe this is what "Living Fully" is all about? Nevertheless, I'm still hoping that my first beer at the new snack bar won't be purchased as an alumnus.

My Page

Well, The Rotunda is back on your favorite newsstands once again. This year's first issue is three weeks late because the newspaper was handed over. . . nah, punted over to me in a state of financial chaos. With the 1985-1986 Editorship, I received a debt from last year estimated at about $4,000.00 (I say estimated because the bills keep rolling in, some in the mail and some through the window with rocks). In addition, I must make up for the 'Special-Super-Duper-Graduation-Extravaganza-Issue'. The super duper thing about this issue was that for the first time ever, ads were paid for in advance. What a concept! Only the issue was never published. Whoops! So some of the advertisements you see this year will be printed free of charge, out of the goodness of my heart (and mankind's inherent fear of lawyers).

In all fairness, I must say that Jeff Abernathy was a great leader, a tireless worker and a talented writer. I can only dream of putting out such a quality paper with as much consistency as Abernathy did last year. But for Godssake don't let that man get near a checkbook! I mean this guy thinks a ledger is someone who climbs to risky places to get a better view of the Greatful Dead show.

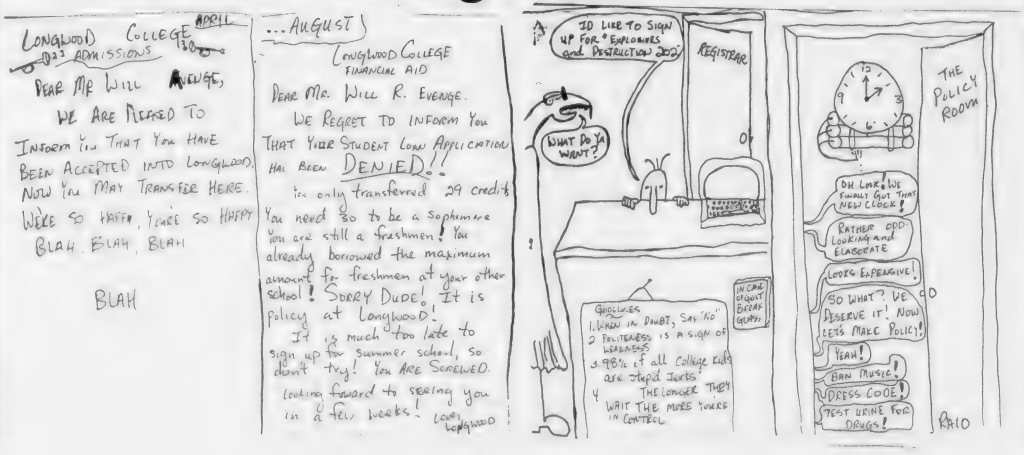
Anyhow, The Rotunda is back on its own fiscal feet; it could not have been done without the trust and assistance given to me by Christine Harbour and Phillis Mable.

This assistance was not without some strings attached. I mean, check out some of the things we have to do this year:

- We may no longer pay for things with cash.
- We are not permitted any more $400.00 Christmas parties.
- The Rotunda can no longer buy groceries for the Editor or finance a phone in his apartment.
- You know those little stub things that hold the checks in your checkbook? Well, they're telling me that I gotta fill them out everytime I write a check. Geez!
- And you know those little white pieces of paper the cashier hands you when you buy something (Harbour calls them receipts, I thought they were coupons or business cards), I gotta save them. I guess they're recyclable or something

No matter, now I can get back to the business of running a newspaper. With all of the help Phyllis Mable has given me, I sincerely hope that my inevitable fun-poking at the Administation is not interpretted as a slap in the face; they are certainly are not intended to be. It is my job. Plus I like to do it.

The Administration often asks for abuse. Sometimes they beg.



Have you seen the new, improved Longwood College alcohol policy? I mean, really, these guys are writing my jokes for me. . .

Help Stop Drinking Games

Drinking games are naughty. You know it, I know it. Drinking games make you destroy dorms, kill each other and/or have sex. Not to mention miss classes. The Rotunda is honored to be the only student newspaper at the only college in the world to ban drinking games (Liberty University is a church, not a college). We are in the forefront of an advancing society and I like it. As a public service in support of the new Longwood policy of "No drinking games," The Rotunda will have a life-size piggy bank set up in the New Smoker every Friday morning. All students will be asked to bring all of their quarters to this location for safe-keeping over the weekend. No quarters no drinking games, right? Well, that's exactly what I was thinking. All quarters will be tagged for identification and may be picked up on Monday at the same location. In addition, The Rotunda will no longer accept advertising from local businesses which give change in anything larger than a dime on weekends.

THANK YOU FOR YOUR SUPPORT

WUTA Returns

Although there isn't a defininte time, WUTA, the Longwood College Radion Station will be returning to the airwaves very soon. Returning are a solid core of trained DJ's and a diverse selection of music catering to many tastes.

An organizational meeting for prospective DJ's will be held Wednesday, September 11 in Grainger Room 19. The meeting is open to all students, faculty, and administration seriously interested in college radio. There are still good time spots available, and 10-15 DJ's are needed to complete a full schedule.

The station is in the middle of some renovation, and General Manager, Sonny Merchant is hoping WUTA will be fully operational within a two week period. The station will feature compact disc capabilities, and a new studio quality Denon cassette deck. WUTA will operate at 90.1 FM, and has 10 watts of transmitting power. Returning DJ's include: Jonah Hex's hardcore show, The Captain and The Count to soothe those pounders on weekends with classical and jazz. Also back is the Doctor, the sweet sounds of Melanie and Beth, and the ugly metal vibes of Mike Horinko. Stay put and look for the "Broadcaster" the new WUTA weekly bulletin.

Elections

Extra Curricular Activities Help

Participation in extracurricular activities is the second most important clue in identifying potential managers, says an AT&T study. The undergraduate major was the most important predictor with humanities or social science majors ranking highest in managerial skills.

Other predictors – grades or the quality of the institution attended -- were less important. The study said grades are useful as a measure of intellectual ability and high work standards but do not relate to most other managerial characteristics. And attending a "high quality" insitution is likewise no sign on its own of managerial success, although it might once have been. "Attending high quality schools has become associated with motivational and personality characteristics that cannot be considered favorable for managers," the study says.

The study combined the findings of several surveys conducted over a period of 20 years involving both AT&T employes and others.

In the chart below a • indicates statistically significant predictors.

	Major	Extrcur. Act.	College Quality	GPA

Some recommendations the study made to those recruiting managment trainees:

•Pay more attention to those getting bachelors degrees at night while employed by the company;

•Liberal arts graduates are excellent sources of general management talent;

•Extracurricular activities can be an indication of a well-rounded educational experience. Engineering majors, for instance, generally scored low in interpersonal abilities, but an engineering major with student government experience might be an outstanding find.

Resume Resuscitation

Your grades are only a small part of what a job interviewer will look at. Extracurricular activities on your resume show alot about your interpersonal skills. You should think about joining the staff of Longwood's Student Newspaper. The Rotunda has only a handful of returning staffers (2).

If you would like to join the fast pace world of travel, high fashion and celebrity that is The Rotunda come to the organizational meeting on Thursday, September 12 at 7:00 p.m. in The Rotunda office (that's in Lankford near the post office).

Art Contest

The Rotunda is seeking a new design for it's flag (The name of the paper on page 1). The artist who submits the winning flag will receive $25.00. All work must be done on white paper with black ink. Enter as many times as you wish.

You may slide your art under the publications office door in Lankford, near the post office or bring it to the New Smoker Thursday, September 12 during dinner hours.

Job Recruiters Give Drug Tests

CPS -- Students entering the job market this year are increasingly likely to face a new hurdle: drug test.

Companies that for the past few years have tested their employees for drug use are now making students who apply for jobs take the same tests, campus job centers around the country report.

"It's just starting to surface, in part because more firms seem to be willing to admit they do it," says Robert Riegle, assistant director of placement services at Wayne State University and athor of a recent article on the subject.

Riegle learned of the practice last summer, when a student received a letter from an employer notifying him that a job offer was being withdrawn.

"The letter didn't say why, but in person they told him they detected marijuana through the use of urinalysis," Reigel says.

Reigle says the tests can detect marijuana use up to three weeks after consumption.

Moveover, he says companies don't alwys tell students they're taking drug tests.

Representatives of firms contacted by College Press Service say they do tell job applicants the tests' purpose.

They say positive results do not automatically disqualify job applicants.

"Keeping the workplace safe is an increasing concern," explains Robert McKee, Atlantic Richfield Company health department director, "particularly given that the use of drugs is becoming so prevalent."

ARCO, based in Los Angeles, plans to begin giving drug tests to applicants later this month, he says.

McKee acknowledges the test detects marijuana up to 21 days after use, jeopardizing someone who can smoke the drug on a weekend, for example, without hurting Monday's performance because the drug's psychoactive effects have worn off long before.

That is why ARCO officials are being told to use the test only as a guideline, he says.

ARCO adopted the test policy in part because it operates several facilities that use hazardous materials.

But white-collar firms also are turning increasingly to drug tests.

IBM officials, for example, began requiring drug tests for all job applicants late last year.

"We feel a paramount responsibility to ensure the safety of the workplace for all our employees," IBM spokesman Tom Mattia says.

Problems with excessive drug use by IBM employees in several departments have caused problems, Mattia says.

He declined, however, to provide examples of safety-related problems among white-collar workers.

IBM job applicants get the opportunity to explain positive drug test results, Mattia says.

Other firms, such as General Motors, allow administrators at local plants to ask job applicants to take drug tests. GM's local-option drug policy has been in effect since the early 1970's.

At the Adolph Coors Co. brewery in Golden, Colo., job applicants take polygraph exams during which they are asked, among other things, whether they have abused drugs or alcohol.

Officials at the firms using drug tests declined to reveal figures on the rate at which job applicants test positive for drug use.

Reigel says students who learn they will be tested for drug use can also find ways to beat the tests.

Beyond that, he is trying to convince employers the tests are of limited value.

"There is the potential for people to lose employment unfairly," Riegle says. "You can't tell with these tests, for example, whether a person smoked pot while on the job, like you can with alcohol tests."

Occasional marijuana use should not disqualify a person from employment, Riegle maintains.

"If businesses started firing everyone who used pot, they'd lose a lot more people than they expect," he asserts.

Volleyball

By: Lee Watterton

Longwood's women's volleyball team, under the direction of first-year coach Linda Elliott, open it's 1985 season Saturday afternoon with a home game against Chowan at 2:00.

Coach Elliott guarantees there will be an improvement on last year's record of 9-24. Five players return from last season and the experience should help the team. Karen Moye returns as the only three-year veteran.

"We have made goals as a team such as learning proper techniques, winning our first home and opening match, upsetting a team that's favored to beat us, and playing to the talent level of the team. The girls are working extremely hard to reach these goals and I guarantee that we will," said the coach.

The Lady Lancers played a scrimmage game against Virginia Commonwealth University Thursday and although they the match, Elliott was very pleased with their performance.

Golf

Longwood women's golf coach Barbara Smith has to deal with something of a paradox when it comes to describing her 1985-86 team. This year's squad is probably her youngest team ever, but it may turn out to be her best as well.

"I'm very optimistic," said Dr. Smith whose team will kick-off the season Friday through Sunday in the ninth Longwood Invitational Tournament at Longwood Golf Course. "We have probably the best group of young players we've ever had. We should improve as the year goes along, but a lack of experience and senior leadership could work against us."

Lady Lancers Golf Team

There are six sophomores, two freshmen and two juniors on the team. Gone from last year are five golfers, including co-captains Janie Gerken and Carol Rhoades. Gerken was an All-American and one of Longwood's all-time best, while Rhoades was the sparkplug on last year's squad.

Longwood enjoyed a tremendous year in 1984-85, winning the ECAC and Lady Lion Tournaments, finishing second in the LC Invitational and Yale Invitational and third in the National Small College Tournament. In addition, three Longwood golfers made All-American and one qualified for the NCAA Tournament.

Sophomores Tina Barrett and Marcia Melone, two of the three All-Americans, figure to battle for the number one slot this year. Barrett was the top Division II finisher in the NCAA Tournament, placing 66th out of 102 individuals. She also set an LC record for stroke average - 78.6. Barrett shot 72 on three separate occasions.

Melone was close behind, coming on fast after a slow start. She ended up with a stroke average of 80.8 for the year, fourth best in LC history. She placed eighth in the National Small College Tournament with an 81-75-75-231, and just missing making the NCAA Tournament.

Barrett and Melone have been elected co-captains for the upcoming season.

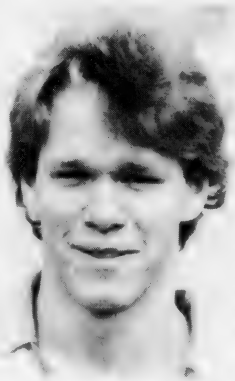
Ten fingers about to be smashed.

Ford Player Of Week



Senior Tim Ford helped Longwood gets its soccer season started with a bang Sunday afternoon, scoring two goals as the Lancers beat Guilford 3-1. For his performance, Ford has been named Longwood College Player Of The Week for the period September 2-9. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

An All-Eastern Division selection in the Virginia Intercollegiate Soccer Association last season, Ford took up right where he left off last season Sunday. Putting pressure on the defense, Ford scored twice on break-aways, going one-on-one with the Guilford keeper.

He probably would have scored a third goad, but was tripped by the goalkeeper. Mark McArdle slammed in the resulting penalty shot to account for the other Lance goal.

Ford spent quite a bit of time sprinting toward the Guilford goal Sunday afternoon and he seemed to have an extra burst of speed every time he needed it.

"Rich (Posipanko) really got us into shape with our preseason work," Ford explained about his ability to out-run the Quakers. "I was just running good and they (LC teamates) just kept kicking the ball out ahead."

Ford who transferred to Longwood last year from Bucks Co. (PA) Community College, had 12 goals and six assists for the Co-State Champs in 1984.

A graduate of Pennsbury High School, Ford is majoring in business. He was an All-State and All-Region performer at Bucks County.

Sparked by two goals from Tim Ford, the 12th ranked Longwood soccer team beat Gilford College 3-1 Sunday afternoon in what coach Rich Posipanko called his toughest season opener to date.

Longwood will take its 1-0 record to Baltimore, Maryland Saturday and Sunday for the Maryland Baltimore County Retriever Tournament. Saturday it's LC vs. Charleston (WV) at 3:00, after UMBC faces Pittsburgh-Johnstown at 1:00. The championship game is set for 2:00 Sunday with a contest for third place at 12 Noon.

"We played very well in the first half Sunday," said Posipnko, "We were well-prepared and our depth was a factor in the heat."

Posipanko was able to use 18 players in the first half, helping Longwood shake off the effects of 95 degree heat.

A break-away goal by Ford and a penalty kick by Mark McArdle gave Longwood a 2-0 lead at the half. Ford scored on another break-away in the second half up to the margin to 3-0. Then Guilford caught the Lancer defenders napping to cut the margin to 3-1.

Goalkeeper Rob Liessem came up with several nice saves in the final moments when Guilford frantically tried to catch up. The Quakers had come into the game with a 3-0 record and a 5-0 win over Averett.

Each team had 15 shots on goal in the contest and Liessem and Guilford keeper Mark Kramer each came up with five saves. Longwood's next home game is Wednesday, September 18 when Newport News visits. The Lancers are ranked 12th in the ISAA-Adidas Div. II preseason poll.

Longwood may be without the services of senior Dan Bubnis for several weeks, if not the remainder of the season. Bubnis was injured in practice Thursday, suffering either a sprained ankle or a fracture. The injury was to be diagnosed Mondy.

Longwood Archeologists

At the Morris Field Archeological Site in Buckingham County this summer the 38 students of the Longwood College Archeology Field School faced a problem. The archeology site, located on the banks of the Appomattox, River on the farm of Mr. R. T. Morris, Jr., was the location of ten weeks of digging for Indian remains. Dr. James Jordan, Associate Professor of Anthropology at Longwood College and Director of the Archeology Field School, observed, "the Morris Field Archeological Site is extremely rich in prehistoric Indian remains. My students unearthed 2,481 artifacts during the summer ranging from clay pottery to stone projectile points, scrapers, blades, drills and pieces of smooth bone probably used as needles." Based on the styles of clay pots the archeologists found, Jordan believes the site was an Indian village inhabited as long ago as 2,000 years before the present. The site has been registered with the Virginia Research Center for Archeology and has been assigned the site number 44BK212.

Many of the finds came from two trash pits which the Indians had apparently dug as a place to throw away garbage such as bone and other waste from butchering and food preparation activities. Jordan said it appeared the Indians dug a hole in the ground about 3 feet in diameter and about 3 feet deep, and then threw trash in it until it was about full. Based on what the archeologists found, it seems the Indians then piled red clay in a mound of 6 inches or so on top of the full trash pit and built a fire on this clay to harden it and seal their garbage can shut against insects, rodents, and other pests which they did not want drawn to their living area.

When unearthed by the Longwood archeologists, these Indian "garbage cans" stood out clearly from the surrounding soil because the organic items thrown in the trash pit by the Indians had decayed over the centuries producing a rich black compost which showed the outline of the orignial trash pit. States Dr. Jordan, "In this soil which was like moist coffee grounds, were probably hundreds of small parts of plants and animals which would give us a good idea of what the Indians were eating. The problem was these organic remains, like parts of fish scales, fragments of charred nut hulls, bits of grass seeds and slivers of bone, were microscopic in size and in such a state of decay they could not be separated from soil particles by the naked eye and fingers. In the dirt of the two trash pits uncovered was much valuable information on prehistoric diet--more than we could get from the 2,481 artifacts--but how to get it out of the dirt?"

Faced with this difficulty, four students in the Archeology Field School, Amy Alvis, Keith Russell, Curtis Vest, and Jeanne Willoz set to work searching the site reports of others archeologists who had also found trash pits in Indian villages. The students devised a machine which would separate the small plant and animal parts from the dirt. The machine is called a flotation device. Using a gasoline pump and fire hose, water was pumped from the Appomattox River over the ridge to the archeological site. The water was forced under pressure into the bottom of a large metal drum. In the middle of the drum were suspended several wire mesh screens onto which dirt from the trash pits were spread. The water washed, lifted and separated the food parts from the dirt. These were then skimmed off through a cheese cloth filter and the dirt sank to the bottom of the flotation device. About 3 quarts of dirt could be processed in one hour. Dr. Jordan is now preparing to send 21 samples of these organic remains to specialists at the Virginia Research Center for Archeology who may be able to identify the specific plants and animals which ended up in the trash pits. Jordan says, "It is one thing to know the kinds of stone tools or clay pots these Indians were using, but it will really give us an insight into more intimate aspects of their lives if we can find out the very foods they were savoring around their cooking fires on the banks of the Appomattox River each evening, 2,000 years ago."

What does this mean to you?

Longwood archeology students Skip Freeberg, Curtis Vest and Benji Smith excavate samples of organic remains from Indian trash pit.

Longwood University?

As of January 1, 1986, Longwood College will be nonexistant. Our new University will be called one of the following names: University of Southern Virginia, University of South Side, Farmville University or Longwood University. This final list of names were decided upon by the Janitorial Staff of Longwood College. The final name will be decided upon by Longwood students. Students suggestions and opinions are welcome and should be submitted to Shorty Giles.

Commode Statement

by Micheal T. Clements

As the sun peeked over the horizon early Sunday morning, a ray of light surely struck the toilet perched upon the sign at the corner of Spruce and Redord. As students passed this social statement many wondered about it's purpose and many conversations erupted about it's true significance.

As a scholar of Longwood College, I pose a question to you, the readers of this fine literary work - what does this mean? I ask, "What posessed the rebels of today to place such controversial, yet commonplace item on public display. After hours of pondering this I have brought many feelings from deep within myself. I have sit gazing at the toilet wondering if it is simply a product of (an intoxiating party). Is is simply an act of those falsely stimulated by unexplainable drugs. Or is it an intentional act by a Longwood College Student in order to voice his veiws about the institution surrounding him. And if so what are those views. It is easy for one to interpret a toilet in various ways. A toilet can be associated with the flush or dismissing of accepted ideas or it can be associated with the accepted ways that are often used. Or is it even possible that this was an act of some unknown being in it's effort to express its feelings of Longwood, Farmville, or the modern day college student. I suppose we will never know the real truth behind this stand on society. I just ask that you, the leaders of tomorrow, never alienate yourselves from new ideas.

My Page

On Alcohol Policy

Just as Longwood College continues the war on campus alcohol abuse with rules that are more strict, studies are coming out that show 'getting tough' is a self-defeating strategy when it comes to controlling alcohol abuse.

A joint study by the American Association of University Students and the Metropolitian Life Insurance Company found that the more prohibitive the campus alcohol policy, the more likely the school was to experience alcohol related problems.

The study looked at 32 schools and rated the restrictiveness of each alcohol policy. The campuses were then rated for the prevalence of alcohol-related problems based on judicial board cases and counseling referrals.

The study showed that schools with permissive alcohol policies fared much better than the schools with harsh alcohol policies.

Apparently the administrative jugheads who made our alcohol policy ignored studies like this. Some of the new alcohol rule lowlights are:

- •Parties may no longer be organized for Thursday nights
- •Fewer kegs are allowed at events.
- •No 'drinking games' are allowed.

This rule about Thursday night parties is a farce. The rule will not control drinking. The biggest consequence of the rule has been to cut the single largest fundraising opportunity of the week. The Rotunda had planned on hosting a few Thursday night parties to raise money for a word-processor/computer. But noooooo. Other groups had used Thursday night parties to raise money for memorial scholarship funds, the sponsoring of children in undeveloped nations and other worth-while causes. Now the local watering holes will reap the profits of Thursday night parties. This fact is certain. The off-campus night spots do outrageous business on Thursday nights, which was to be expected. But what was not expected was the opening of D.T. Bradley's, Farmville's newest hot-spot. D.T. Bradley's is just far enough from Longwood to encourage some students to drive. I predict that when the weather turns cold even more students will pile into even more 'drunk-mobiles' and venture out into the night. If the purpose of outlawing Thursday kegs is to insure that students come to Friday morning class in good shape, what will happen when the first students turn up dead? I know what will happen, the administration will blame alcohol and use the inevitable deaths to futher restrict the alcohol rules. I won't blame alcohol. I will blame the hooligans who run the alcohol task force.

Perhaps this is a good time to explain what happened at the final, decisive alcohol task force meeting.

In the April 16, 1985 issue of the Rotunda, "Keg Dispute Arouses Students", a true "alcohol awareness committee" was described. A few hundred students filled the Prince Edward room to voice their opinions about kegs in dorms. For once, the task force czar was given student input.

The April meeting took place during lunch time on a normal school day. But the meeting at which the big 'no Thursday night parties' rule came down was different. The decisive meeting was scheduled on reading day before last spring's exams. Reading day at 8:00 a.m. Seven committee members showed up. Only three were students. Arguments went back and forth. Finally it came down to an ultimatum: Either we have no kegs in the dorms ever, or we have no Thursday night parties, which do you choose? Waitaminute! What happened to all those arguments put forth by students to keep the alcohol policy 'pro-choice'? What happened to student input of any kind? It looked like a vote in the Soviet Union. "All in favor? Fine, thanks for stopping by, comrades"

So the task force voted for the less harsh "no Thursday night parties". Within two days, some jerks had printed and circulated flyers accusing one of the task forces' student members of screwing the student body. There was nothing anybody could have done. Another task force member commented to me that it seemed [task force committee chairperson] Barb Gorski knew all along that some kind of harsh change in the alcohol policy was going to take place, that it was planned out the whole time. Perhaps Gorski was getting pressure from the faculty, or maybe she was trying to make herself look good. In the memo attached to the Alcohol Procedure pamphlet that was put in the faculty mailboxes, Gorski writes, "I'm pleased to give you the new Alcohol Procedures. Some of the highlights are:" Gorski goes on to list only the restrictive changes and ends with "Call me if you have any questions, concerns or compliments!"

Maybe Gorski is now trying to bring her 'Soviet style' to the student-run judicial and honor boards? But that is next week's editorial . . .

Next week: Why is Barb Gorski the new, highly verbal and influential advisor to both the judicial board and the honor board?

F.F RAIO

To Err is Human, to admit it painful.

Last week My Page insinuated that last's year's Editor-In-Chief, Jeff Abernathy used Rotunda funds to finance a phone in his apartment and groceries. Abernathy has assured me that he did not in fact own a phone or buy groceries at the expense of The Rotunda.

I apologize for making this assumption based on sloppy record keeping. Abernathy has also informed me that the last three editors have left similar debts to their successors.

STATEMENT OF CLARIFICATION

We would like to clarify a misunderstanding that may have occurred from the September 10 issue in the article "Opening Postponed"; All funds used to remodel the snack bar are coming from student fees, not from tuition monies.

Cultural Mecca In Danger

by Bruce Souza

The Farmville Town Council has opened debate on whether or not to restore one of the town's oldest cultural anomalies. Meanwhile, angry citizen groups have formed to protest any alteration to the hallowed ground. The tract in question is the paved suface extending from the northern end of Popes to the beginning of Sunny's restaurant. The site itself supposedly emits a mystic aura, which attracts a plethora of visitors annually.

Locals feel that any rejuvenation of this revered area might disturb the supernatural forces within it's divine boundaries. Most people just sit in their cars and meditate, oblivious to the presence of others in their cars and the human activity in the bustling shopping center. The assert that by doing so, a mental state very near nirvana can be reached. Sometimes whole families return day after day attempting to become one with the cosmic waves that foster the sought spiritual identiy. One Farmvilliam, Mr. O.L. Buick told us that "Peoples comes from all over state just to park here for a few moments." One skeptic who perferred to remain unnamed was quoted as saying "It just looks like a bunch of people with nothing better to do than sit around in beat up cars."

Unfotunately, the recent intrusion of out of town visitors and vandals has created a problem for local government officials. It seems visitors are now bringing tools and chiselling out portions of the holy tarmac for personal mementos. This has forced local commerce leaders to push for a renovation project, which regular patrons object to. Steady users of the Messa complain that the government is trying to displace and interrupt a way of life.

The Farmville Mecca is open 365 days a year, from dawn to dusk. Visitors are asked not to use economy cars or bring any sharp tools. The visitors gallery is located in front of the Safeway store where interested parties may observe on foot.

Welcome To Downtown Farmville

Longwood Ambassadors Attend Leadership Conference

by Robert Smith

The executive council of the Longwood College Student Ambassadors traveled to Michigan State University recently for a four day National Student Alumni Association (SAA) and Student Foundation (SF) National Conference.

Approximately 500 delegates from across the nation were participating in the seminars. Some of the colleges and universities that attended were: University of Nebraska, U.C.L.A., Clemson, Boston College and Michigan State-the host school.

Longwood College was represented by ten student delegates and the two advisors of the Longwood Ambassadors. The following officers of the Longwood Ambassadors attended the conference: Tami Bostian-Co-President, Teresa Alvis Co-President, Doug Howell-Vice President, Deanna Moore -Secretary Treasurer and Holly A. Daugherty -Admissions-Tours.

Other officers in attendance were: Robert Smith-Publicity, Sonya Knur-Promotions, Kirk Vetter-Special Projects Fund Raising, Dee Booker-Telefund and Amy Etheridge-Telefund.

The conference covered such topics as building team spirit, marketing your group, leadership styles and tapping into Alvis second semester.

The Longwood Ambassador Executive Council captured the national spirit competition title as members of S.A.A. regional district. Adding much excitement and laughter to the mighty district three team were Clemson, University of South Carolina, Radford and Valdosta State. The district three team easily surpassed the other seven districts which account for the rest of the nations colleges and universities.

The Executive Council felt very lucky to have had the opportunity to attend the prestigious S.A.A./S.F. National Conference and are very grateful to the Longwood College Foundation for funding the trip. The location for next years conference is the University of California at Santa Barbara.

The Ambassador Executive Council learned and shared many excellent ideas and programs and are very excited in putting them into action.

Parking Problem

by Jeffery Kerr Fleming

Last year many students complained to the Parking Appeals Comm. about unfair ticketing to no avail. Last year this student based committee allowed only a very small percentage of appeals to be passed. Many of you, like myself, felt you'd been given a bad deal when you had a wheel-lock put on your car. Many of you, like myself, observed the gross inconsistencies of ticketing. And finally, many of your, like myself, were told that we didn't have a parking problem; plenty of room at Wynn Building.

So if you can't find a "legal" parking space take these precautions.

1) Get a campus map and find Wynn Building Parking Lot. (That's right, the one way over there.)

2) Get out your hiking boots, compass, and canteen.

3) Get a police flashlight. (One of those long billy knockers that Rambo would carry)

4) Turn your car burgular alarm system on extra loud (Oh, you don't have one? You better park illegally)

5) Leave your car at home and let everyone else pay for gas, tickets and vandelism.

Breil Lectures

David Breil, professor of biology, will give the first lecture in this year's Faculty Colloquim Series at Longwood College.

He will speak on Wednesday, September 18, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium. The lecture, entitled "The Wee Worts of Peninsular Florida," is open to the public free of charge.

Dr. Breil will discuss his 17-year investigation of the more than 160 species of liverworts (moss-like plants) to be found in Florida. He has "rediscovered" several liverworts that were presumed to be extinct in Florida and found some new varieties of the plants.

Liverworts grow in several different habitats -- some even grow on rock such as limestone -- but the majority of them grow on tree trunks in damp locations.

"I have done a lot of tramping around through swamps, being on guard for moccasins and 'gators," Dr. Breil said. "The major problem was accessibility. There's always the danger of getting lost in the great cyprus swamps of southern Florida."

Most of his field work was done during winter breaks between semesters. He also spent the spring semester of 1981 in Florida. He returned from these field trips with "collections of plants in their own brown paper bags -- anywhere from 300 to 700 from each trip -- to identify in the lab here at Longwood." The plant samples were then preserved so that Dr. Breil can make drawings from them for a manual he is preparing.

Dr. Breil is a graduate of the University of Massachusetts and received his Ph.D. in botany from Florida State University. He has received research grants from the Virginia Academy of Sciences, the Society of Sigma Xi, and the Longwood College Foundation to support his ongoing study of mosses and liverworts in Virginia and in Florida.

Follow The K-Mart Blue Light

Kim Setzer

Fashion sometimes turns out to be a four-letter word. It is hard deciding what's in, what's not, what's cold, and what's hot. Have you ever seen someone with the ugliest outfit on one week, and the next week, you're wearing a replica? Don't feel bad, everyone does this. Many people on campus seem to have their own special look. The looks range between Preppie, Punk, New Wave, K-Mart blue light special, and the basic Salvation Army Wardrobe. Take this quiz and see how you fall in the world of fashion.

(1) It is Saturday morning and as you pry your eyes open, you are looking for something to wear. Do you:

a. put on what you wore to the mixer the night before

b. put on what your roommate wore to the mixer

c. throw on a pair of shorts and a T shirt

d. wear your Sunday best for Saturday brunch

(2) It is 95 degrees outside and you can't decide what to wear to class. Do you:

a. go ahead and start on you winter wardrobe, better early then never

b. wear nothing

c. wear a thin, comfortable, classy outfit

d. don't go to class, and unless you live in Curry or Frazier, aim every fan in your suite at your bed and go back to sleep.

(3) There is a lecture at Jarman that your English teacher requires you to go to. Do you:

a. wear bleached cut-off shorts, a shirt you've had since fourth grade and no shoes.

b. wear something classy, but not overdoing it

c. wear nothing

d. don't go

The answers;

For question one, no one is going to remember what you had on last night, nor what you roommate wore. But beer smells pretty bad after it has been sitting in a shirt a while. Go ahead and throw on the shorts and the T shirt. don't wear Sunday's best to Saturday's brunch.

For question two, don't wear your winter ward robe because you are looking for a heatstroke. Don't wear nothing because you are looking for the campus police. Either wear something cool, comfortable, and classy, or go back to sleep.

For question three, only do B if you want a decent grade.

•PEPSI BRINGS YOUR ANCESTORS BACK FROM THE GRAVE that's how the "Come Alive with Pepsi" slogan translated when Pepsi first introduced its product to Taiwan. A Dartmouth College professor says U.S. businesses have lost incalculable billions of dollars because of the inability to speak anything other than English. To correct the problem, more than 100 top national and international executives are moving into dorm rooms at Dartmouth this summer for intensive training in French or Spanish.

•MINORS ARE A MAJOR TREND of the 1980's at Oklahoma U. and elsewhere. The increase in the number of students officially declaring minor fields of study is being attributed, by OU officials, to the "more sophisticated" demands of employers. The officials say that while minors were widely ignored during the 1970's their return to favor seems to be a national development of this decade.

•BUGS BUNNY is #1 with college students, according to a survey by a Radford U. business professor. The survey found that 82 percent of students still watch Saturday morning cartoons. Roadrunner was also a favorite; Scooby Doo came in a distant third.

•"SILLY AND PERNICIOUS" is how one U. of Iowa professor described the plan of a conservative group, Accuracy in Academia, to officially audit classes nationwide to expose what it claims are more than 10,000 Marxist faculty members. The group claims students are incapable of handling the "misinformation an disinformation" conveyed by the "liberal" faculty. Critics of the group say it is attempting to inhibit the free discussion of ideas.

Researchers at the U. of California--Los Angeles and California State U.-Northridge say there is growing college student use of "magic" mushrooms, which are natural hallucinogenics with effects similiar to, but milder than, LSD. Their survey found that nearly 15 percent of college students have tried the mushrooms.

Summer In France

by John Tipton

How would you like to have the experience of your lifetime and get credits for it? If you have a free month this coming summer and have had three semesters of college French then you're just about ready to go.

Longwood College offers a program which enables a student to improve his French by living his French, too.

THe cost for the program is $1300. Which may seem like a lot to spend in a month, however; it will be worth far more. The ability to speak two languages fluently as well as abroad will score high with prospective employers. The costs include class, transportation, and room and board. Students stay in a dormitory in Toulousse with students from France.

The program consists of an intensive study of the French language which earns the student three credits. For the cost of summer school credits at Longwood the student may also do an independent study in his major for up to three additional credits. Classes meet five days a week. There are over six hours of class per day with nights left open for studying.

There is time for day excursions on the weekends. The plane tickets are open so the student may spend time traveling in Europe after the session before returning home.

French students hold social events in honor of the Longwood students throughout their stay.

A Longwood student may also study abroad through another college's program (for instance, Belgium for a semester through VPI or France for a semester through James Madison).

At Longwood there are some direct programs in which the student may study abroad in Spain and Germany. It is not requried to have had college courses of Spanish or German to participate in these programs. The classes are taught in English but any knowledge of the languages would prove helpful once out of the classroom.

Students experience intensive classes at the Goethe Institute, a German language institute. In Spain studies carry on at Forsprov. The classes offered deal with government and politics.

Geist Tapping

Giest tapping was Wednesday, September 11, at a special dinner honoring the newly tapped members. After dinner at a candlelight ceremony 13 seniors were welcomed into the honorary leadership organization. The new members are Fran Walker, Amy Ethridge, Suzanne Piotrowski, Ken Vaiden, Toby Emert, Dee Booker, Hope King, Benji Smith, Karen Moye, Garth Wentzel, Renay Bradshaw, Tammy Zirkle and Mable Hamlette.

Players Cast New Students

Melisa Gibbs

The Longwood Players are now rehearsing for their first of four shows this season. The play, "Blithe Spirit" by Noel Coward, was labeled as an "impossible farce" during its tenure on Broadway. It will be presented in Jarman Auditorium from October 9-12. Dr. Patton Lockwood, Director, has cast several new students for this show.

Robin Martin, Kim Tally, Laura Boyett and Sandra Clayton will all give debut performances on the Jarman Stage. Robin, an education major, will protray Ruth. Kim, an English major, will protray the role of Elvira. Laura, a History and Government major will protray the role of Madame Arcarti. Sandra, an English major, will protray the role of Edith.

"Blithe Spirit" is a three-act play with a small cast. Each role presents quite a challenge for these young actresses. The Longwood Players promise another enjoyable night of theater.

LC HOCKEY TEAM HAS 3-0 RECORD

Sparked by a high-scoring offense, Longwood's field hockey team got off to its best start in years last week with three one-sided victories. The Lady Lancers dispatched Randolph-Macon on the road Monday 4-1, Randolph-Macon Woman's College 6-0 at home Wednesday and Eastern Mennonite 5-1 Saturday at home.

This week coach Sue Finnie's squad faces a tough assignment Tuesday when Lynchburg visits for a 3 p.m. contest. Longwood plays Appalachian State and University of the South Friday and Saturday in Boone, North Carolina.

Wednesday Win - LC's Traci Strickland heads for the RMWC goal as teammates Sharon Bruce (36), Sue Groff (20) and Mary Dey (middle) look on. Longwood won by a 6-0 score.

GOFF NAMED PLAYER OF WEEK

Senior Sue Groff scored six goals and added two assists in three games last week, leading the Longwood field hockey team to three wins. For her performance, Groff has been named "Longwood College Player of the Week" for the period September 9-16. The Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Groff has now scored 34 career goals, tying Julie Dayton for third place on Longwood's all-time career scoring list.

LADY LANCER GOLFERS THIRD IN NINTH LONGWOOD INVITATIONAL

Longwood finished a distant third to defending champ Wake Forest in the ninth Longwood Invitational Women's Golf Tournament which was played Friday through Sunday at Longwood Golf Course.

The Deasons put together rounds of 313-308-318 for a 54-hole total of 939. State was second of 321-314-321-956 while Longwood scored a 331-319-319-969. Trailing the leaders were MNU, William & Mary, Appalachian State, Tennessee-Chatanooga, North Carolina-Wilmington, Methodist and Longwood II.

Wake's Brenda Corrie won the individual title with a 73-75-78-226. Lady Lancer Tina Barrett was seventh at 82-78-79-239. Other LC scores were as follows: Getchen Pugh 83-80-79-242, Marcia Melone 92-79-77-248, Nancy Ryan 82-82-84-248 and Tammy Lohren 84-83-87-254.

LANCER BASEBALL TEAM SPLITS WITH VIRGINIA

Longwood blew a 7-2 lead in the opener, falling 8-7, but came back to win the second game 10-5 in a doubleheader baseball scrimmage with Virginia at Lancer Field Sunday afternoon.

Top performers were Mike Haskine with a 3-run triple, Jeff Rohm with a homer, and Dennis Leftwich with three stolen bases in the opener. In the second game Rohm had two hits, Marty Ford three and Jeff Majone a home run to lead the Lancers, now 1-1 in fall scrimmages.

SPIKERS FALL TO CHOWAN

Chowan pinned a pair of defeats on the Longwood women's volleyball team Saturday afternoon in Lancer Hall, winning the first match 15-9, 15-4 and the second 15-5, 15-8.

The Lady Lancers play at Randolph-Macon College Friday night at 6:30 in this week's action, seeking to improve their 0-2 record.

Coach Linda Elliott said her team received praise from the Chowan coach following Saturday's action. "The Chowan coach said Longwood looked better than ever in the 10 years her teams have played against us," said Elliott. "Our players reached a lot of goals that I set for them and the reserves off the bench showed a lot of spirit and effort," said Elliott.

LONGWOOD SPORTS NEWS

This week Longwood faces Newport News Apprentice Wednesday at home with a 4 p.m. starting time and then hosts the Southside Virginia Soccer Tournament Saturday and Sunday with Hampden-Sydney. Saturday, Hampden-Sydney plays Shenandoah at 12 noon and the Lancers battle Slippery Rock at 2. The consolation and championship games will be at 12 noon and 2 p.m. Sunday afternoon. Slippery Rock won the title a year ago, beating the Lancers 4-0 in the opening round.

After the way Longwood has dominated over the past three years, perhaps the Retriver Classic should be renamed the "Lancer Invitational". The Lancers are 6-0 in the event and have outscored the opposition 20-1 in those six games.

The Lancers, now 3-0 and ranked 13th in Division II, blanked a solid Charleston (WV) team 3-0 Saturday in the tournament's opening round. Sunday, Longwood dispatched host UMBC 3-0 to claim the Retriever title.

Junior goalkeeper Rob Liessem and midfielder Mahfoud Kyoud led the Lancer victories Saturday and Sunday.

"Mahfoud was the class of the whole thing," said coach Rich Posipanko. "He was doing things on the field that no one else could even thing about. Rob was unbelievable. He really takes charge out there."

For the record, Kyoud had an assist in Saturday's win and a goal in Sunday's victory while Liessem had 11 saves in the two games.

Senior John Kennen had a fine tournament with a goal and three assists. Mark McArdle and Tim Ford had a goal and an assist each, and Jeff Robinson and Mark Kremen had a goal each.

"We're playing pretty good right now," said Posipanko. "On paper, we should be favored in this week's game, but we can't let down.

SINGLES CHAMP - Freshman Mary Arthur won the women's singles crown in the Longwood-Southside Tennis Classic Sunday Afternoon.

Tennis

Longwood freshman Mary Arthur won the women's singles title in the Longwood-Southside Tennis Classic Sunday afternoon, defeating her Lady Lancer teammate Karla Boggs 6-3, 6-2 in the championship match.

LADY LANCER METTERS BEAT CHRIS-NEWPORT

Freshman Mary Lynn Lawman made her presence felt in her first intercollegiate singles action Friday afternoon, taking a win at number three singles to spark Longwood's 8-1 decision over host Christopher-Newport.

Longwood had dropped its opening match to visiting Randolph-Macon Women's College Tuesday afternoon 8-1, before rebounding to capture a win Friday. Other singles winners at CNC were Mary Arthur at No. 1, Lisa Storm at No. 2, Karla Boggs at No. 4, Diane Rogers at No. 5 and Lisa Pinchbeck at No. 6.

Lawman teamed with Connie Harrell to win No. 1 doubles while Heather Gardner and Elizabeth Cho won No. 3 doubles.

Longwood's next action is October 5 at home against Emory & Henry.

Lancer Cafe opens

By Kim Deaner

The Lancer Cafe grand opening could not be postponed another day, as fate would have it, the festive ribbon cutting took place as scheduled on September 20. Garth Wentzel, president of SGA, said, "I'm glad I was able to come in here before I became an alumni." This appeared to be the general consensus of the crowd; they are sorry about the delay, but pleased with the $160,000 result.

Those attending included Farmville Mayor Crute, Dr. Sue Saunders, Dean of Students Paul Streiffolino, Director of Student Union, Darcie Brackett, President of Student Union, Rick Johnson, Director of ARA Dining Services, Bob Cottrell, Mgr. Lancer Cafe, and Garth Wentzel, President of SGA.

The evening began with free baked potatoes, and pizza. At 8:00 the Monarchs stayed until 12:00.

Lancer cafe ribbon cutting (from l to r) Farmville Mayor Crute, Rick Johnson, Bob Cottrel, Darcie Brackett, Paul Striffolino, Dr. Sue Saunders, and Garth Wentzel (again).

Rick Johnson was there for all the fun, he said he felt things were going well, and the delay in the opening of the lounge area was because he wanted to achieve the "Grand Opening effect" by opening both sides at once.

Everyone appeared to be having a good time, Rob Turner, cafe bartender, stated that "Lancer Cafe is where it's at." The cafe offers burgers, sandwiches, Mexican favorites, stuffed potatoes, the old famous "itza" pizza and "fun foods." Each day there is a different special with live entertainment, sponsored by S-UN.

Gorski asked to step down

In a decisive move to establish the authority of student-run disciplinary boards, the Student Government Association passed a motion last Thursday stating that Barb Gorski could no longer sit as advisor to both Honor Board and Judicial Board hearings.

"It was felt by a majority of the Student Senate," stated SGA President Garth Wentzel, "that the position of Judicial Affairs Coordinator was a conflict of interest with the position of advisor." Wentzel went on to say that the Board should run without her or not at all until a faculty advisor could be appointed.

Gorski, as Judicial Affairs Coordinator, is responsible for the administrative duties of the Honor-Judicial Boards. In the eyes of the Student Senate, Gorski appointed herself to the position.

To remedy the situation, the SGA has sent letters to faculty members seeking a new advisor and hope to have one sometime next week.

"In Praise of Larry Holmes"

By S.G. and P. R.

In the press conference following the dethroning of boxing king, Larry Holmes, the public had an opportunity to see the true character of this upstanding individual. Holmes displayed tact, grace, poise and devastating wit in his conversation following his defeat at the hands of light-heavyweight Michael Spinks, Saturday night.

When asked how he felt about falling short of the deceased Rocky Marciano's record of forty-nine successful title defenses, Mr. Holmes cleverly replied, "Rocky couldn't hold my jockstrap." Rumor has it that President Reagan is seeking Mr. Holmes' advice in regard to the upcoming summit talks. Mr. Holmes has already accepted an invitation to be the master of ceremonies at this fall's Oxford debate finals.

In addressing the late Marciano's brother, Peter, Holmes conveyed a sense of tact with the classy statement, "Peter, you're just a free-loader living off your dead brother. In light of his eloquence, Mr. Holmes has been nominated to be Chairman of the United States Bureau of Protocol.

Mr. Holmes' somewhat pungent remarks bordered on being offensive. Holmes summoned all of his oratorical skills to console Peter Marciano and stated, "Sonny, is that your name? . . . Peter, if I have hurt you, so +&—8$+ ! what!"

Mr. Holmes has chosen an opportune time to reveal his true nature since, as of Saturday night, he is a washed-up, unemployed disgrace to his sport. Really, Larry, get a job.

Rotunda moves back to The Herald

By Michael T. Clements

After almost a year's break in what had been tradition for some fifty years, the Rotunda has decided to move back to The Farmville Herald printers. The problem all began when Bill Wall, General Manager of The Herald, refused to print an editorial entitled, "Bypasses . . . One toke over the line . . ." by last year's editor-in-chief, Jeff Abernathy. In the editorial Abernathy used questionable language to explain fraternity and sorority pledging and the Greek system. Since termination of the contract on September 17, 1984, the Rotunda has been juggled between three different printers — The last being The Amelia Bulletin Monitor. When asked the reason for the change, Frank Raio, present editor-in-chief, stated, "I started at Amelia because I felt that the print-type was more attractive than that at The Herald; as it turned out though, it seemed Amelia was training new typesetters. I mean it was worse than any high school paper. There were 'typos' everywhere and one advertiser even refused to pay for an ad because there were eleven errors." Raio seemed to be confident about his decision when he remarked, "I have talked things over with Bill Wall and feel certain that Mr. Wall and myself hold the same views about censorship and obscenity. Things will work out fine." So all you loyal Rotunda readers, the change should make this issue a real keeper.

My Page

On The Disciplinary System

Since the Student Government Association has taken decisive action to remove Barb Gorski from her posts as judicial and honor board advisor, it is no longer necessary for me to rage about this issue.

Nevertheless, it is important for the Longwood community to know what the deal was.

Barb Gorski, in the ever-changing administrative scheme of things, has been assigned the duty of judicial affairs coordinator. The judicial affairs coordinator, according to the student handbook (p. 69), "will review each case and make a referral to the appropriate hearing board or take administrative action." She compiles the facts of the case, decides if the case should go to the hearing stage, and if so, which board the case should go to. The coordinator then puts together a handout for the board members to review before the hearing. The role of the judicial affairs coordinator should end at this point. The students elected to the boards now hear the case, decide whether the accused is responsible or not; if found responsible, the students of the board choose a sanction for the student, a punishment. Last year, when I was on the judicial board, sanctions ranged anywhere from a verbal warning or educational task (researching and writing an essay on fire safety, for example), to suspension from school.

Everything these student boards do, the findings and sanction, are carefully documented and sent (with a tape recording of all that has happened), to the Dean of Students for review. The Dean may then accept the recommendations of the boards or reject all recommendations and make up new ones.

Most everybody is happy with this system, as this is the generally accepted way that most colleges do this type of thing.

It is called a student-run system. The student part of the system only includes the actual hearing. Barb Gorski has seen fit to bring administrative input to the hearing. This is highly irregular, if not uncool.

This situation was brought to my attention by board members who told me that Gorski was "playing the prosecutor" at the hearings. Gorski herself told me that she was in fact speaking at the hearings, "playing the devil's advocate," forcing some board members to look at points of view that they hadn't considered before. Gorski sees her current role as that of a model for the board members to follow. She is "training" the board members.

This simply does not flush right. On the-job-training during real cases? If the boards are not trained, stop all the cases and train them during mock trials or something. We can't play around with real students facing real trouble.

What kind of training is required here anyway? All we want from these student board members is good judgement. How do you teach "good judgement?" Who decides what "good judgement" is? Who is to say banning Thursday night parties "good judgement"? Maybe. How long does it take to learn "good judgement" when the classes involve watching Barb Gorski's "good judgement?"

Gorski told me that the board members must be familiar with the Kohlberg personality types in order to better know which sanctions will be effective with different people. This must be taught to board members. When asked, one honor board member said "Yea, she said something about that." One judicial board member said "Kohlberg, doesn't he play for the Yankees?" I guess the Kohlberg theory is on the agenda for next week's role model-lecture, because these board members are clue-less. I submit that even without Kohlberg, these board members will dish out fair sanctions that fit the violation. I would also guess that half of the U. S. Supreme Court judges do not know Kohlberg from Dave Winfield either.

Gorski went on to say that if the board screws up, and lawyers arrive on the scene, the school will be in trouble. Is that a joke or what?

The Dean of Student reviews each case, she has the authority to change each case. This is the school's safeguard against law-suits. The Dean of Students would never allow an unfair decision by her. If she does, the heat is on her. The school likes it that way and the students like it that way.

The advisors to these boards should be faculty members or R.E.C.'s, it doesn't matter which. But the advisor surely should not be the judicial affairs coordinator, who already has a major influence on the system.

Let the hardworking student board members make their own judgements. The administration has the final say anyway.

I encourage every faculty member who is approached by the S. G.A. to carefully consider spending 3-4 hours per week as an advisor to one of the boards. We need your help and "good judgement."

Sitting Pretty

(Or is that a one-eyed Cat?)

By Bruce Souza

It is a well-known fact that the average person spends one-third of their life sleeping. What isn't known is that the average person also spends one-tenth to one-twelfth of their lives standing near or sitting on a toilet. The variation in the time above is subject to differences in diet and geography. Some residents of the island resort of San Clemente, California say that some residents there haven't used toilets in years. While a recent cross section survey of Longwood students has indicated a much higher than average use. It would seem, therefore that proper bathroom selection becomes an important matter. It's an issue we seem to ignore in our daily treks across campus. We tend to prefer convenience over variety and entertainment in our most intimate relaxed moments. To simply list the best Johnnys would be dull. So, first, the criteria and crucial background information must be disseminated to prospective porcelain connoisseurs.

To many of us the bathroom and library have become synonymous terms, especially in the private home. Unfortunately, the public lavatory provides us with the bound literature to peruse. This is not to say that public toilets don't foster own unique endeavors. For it is a well-known fact that without reading material in the stall mankind will begin to write on the wall. Personally, I don't view bathroom graffiti as vandalism, but more as a necessary cultural bulletin board.

No one can deny that the stall wall is a place for personal expression. Where else can one disseminate a libelous attack on a person, organization, or race and know that you're absolutely safe from any possible recriminations. What would Freud have said about venting aggressions while sitting on the can? It would probably fit into the anal-expulsive model, no pun intended.

Pastino

Souza and the prescribed etching method.

All right, all right, I know, cut the B.S., and tell me the best place to squat on campus. In all seriousness this wasn't an easy piece to write. I had to question my journalistic integrity, and make valid judgments based on personal research. In mathematical terms my journalistic integrity can be described as the null set, but my research has been infallible. It took a week, and some hasty cross-campus walks in my quest for the best thrones at Longwood. Unfortunately, the inquiry focuses on men's toilets, and is - sexist in approach.

Thanks to A.R.A. most of us are so regular we can set our watches by the eating schedule. The grimaces on many people's faces as they leave the cafeteria suggest only one thing: immediate need of a latrine. Let me suggest a nearby convenience known as the President's bathroom. It is located in East Ruffner right by President Greenwood's office. This place is clean! Graffitti won't last 24 hours in this john. Nevertheless, one gets a warm feeling doing business there knowing you're safe within the bowels of the administration. This john is unique because there's always a chance of meeting a local or visiting luminary. The only drawback is the height of the stall walls. They are just high enough for easy shoe identification if an accident should occur.

Perhaps the most historic doniker on campus is the bathroom in Cox. John Houseman would describe taking a dump here as doing it the "old-fashioned way." The Cox lavatory has the luxury of a cloakroom which is twice as big as the toilet, which is confusing even to the most culturally inept. Although cosy, the Cox bathroom lacks in adequate ventilation and a pungent odor might drive out the most self righteous person.

Like the Cox bathroom, the famous Lancaster Library bathroom has fallen into recent disarray. Almost every shred of decadent graffit has been cleaned up or removed! Until recently the Cox bathrooms had philosophical statements dating back to the late 1970's. Who could forget the Independent-Greek debate that raged on in last year's Library bathroom. Such intelligent statements as "Deltas are cool, but SPE's rule the school" are etched in my mental scrapbook. My own personal addition of "The Fraternity IQ Graph" was also sadly erased.

This censorship has depressed some, but there still remains a few unspoiled (or spoiled) waterclosets on campus. Take, for instance, the 2nd floor West Ruffner 2½ stall model. This is a classic. Graffiti here centers on Greek organizations, racial hatred, and above all, Hamster hatred. Such proverbs as "Hamster Season — Shoot To Kill," and "Hampden-Sydney Diploma" next to the toilet roll will live in infamy. Besides, the graffiti this bathroom was built by the same guy who built the Edsel. The cracks between the doors and the frame are so wide that you can shake hands with the people on the outside. Locks must have also been an option that year, and it's not uncommon to walk in on your history professor or vice-versa.

The high rise complex offer us a new phenomena, the coed bathrooms. The only twist here is you may be lucky or unlucky depending on your view to surprise a member of the opposite sex. This usually just leads to a guilt trip, and not really worth chancing it.

Arguably, the best pit stop on campus may be the Grainger 2nd floor men's room. I highly recommend this to anybody with sexual hangups or perverse habits in general. Here we have probably the highest ratio of graffiti to the square foot on campus, not to mention one of the narrowest stalls on campus. The wall is covered with everything from sexual innuendo to sexual misconception. I highly recommend coming to this can with a pen in hand. Also featured in this john we have the sexually explicit bondage and domination cartoon, which is too racy to comment on.

Sure, I know you're saying to yourself that I forgot to mention your favorite latrine, but I just couldn't eat enough food to test them all. Also everybody knows that the Longwood issue "Sweetheart" 80 grit toilet tissue should be called bleeding heart instead, but this is irrelevant. The real issue is the demise of some of the best splurging holes on campus. All it takes is a little imagination, and remember that etching is more effective. Let's start whipping the local bathrooms back into shape.

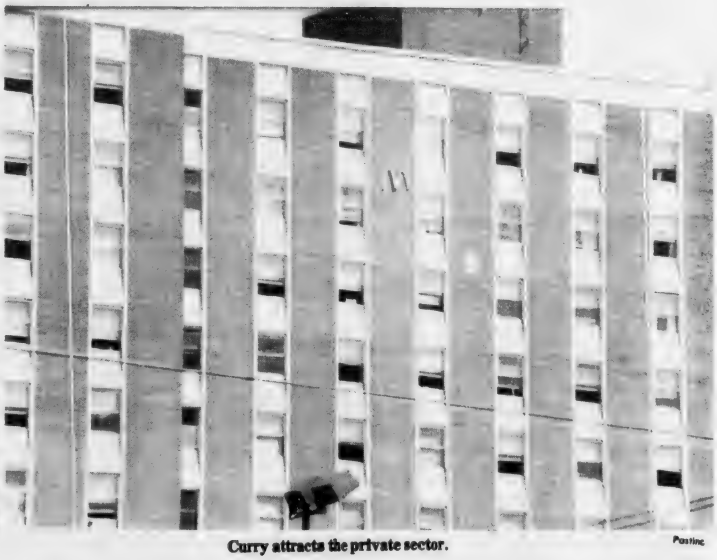
"McDonnie's moves corporate headquarter to Curry"

By Bruce Souza and Frank Raio



The COWPIE, in a news exclusive has uncovered a major coup in corporate re-shuffling. To avoid being gobbled up by merger-hungry corporations McDonnie's has moved their corporate headquarters to the 9th floor of Curry residence hall.

Chairman and Chief Executive of McDonnie's, Fred L. Tuner, said, "the current abusive take-over environment" is prompting our new low-profile-get close to the customer approach. "We at McDonnie's have always been innovators," Tuner said, citing the recent reinvention of putting lettuce and tomato on a hamburger.

Housing Director, Ric Weibl, said, "We at the 'Wood have always been innovators," citing the efficiency and fairness of last year's room draw. After a short stint at the Farmville Motel and the pre-planned freshman attrition rate, McDonnies was ready to move in early this week.

McDonnie big-wigs feel that Longwood in Farmville is the perfect place for the Headquarters. "Farmville, gosh, just the name of the town exudes anonimity," Tuner said, "plus there are simply jillions of cows and cow-like animals around here — Curry is dandy. You know there isn't even a phone on the 9th floor."

In cahoots with A.R.A., McDonnie's and Longwood College have decided to offer a new fast food curriculum. The highlights of the program include: FF 102 — "Types of meat and reasonable faxsimiles," FFV 269 — "Meat Ethics, does four legs constitute a cow," FF 455 — "Upper Level Law Course — Is meat a justiciable question; and has the Supreme Court ever defined "meat."

Curry attracts the private sector.

The Diary of George the Geek

By Kim Setzer

Monday: Dear Diary,

Hi Diary! It's me, George. What a beautiful day. I just love Mondays. I just can't figure out why everyone else on campus hates Mondays. I love my classes, I love my teachers! Golly, I just think everything is so neatto here at Longwood. I love being a freshman. Well, Diary, I have a Zoology lab. I just love my Zoology lab.

Well, I'm back from Zoology lab. Everything was great until my glasses fell in the sulfuric acid. Well, I did need a new pair. The band-aid wasn't holding up that well anyway. But I wonder if my tongue is going to be alright.

Tuesday: Hey Diary!

How's tricks (new phrase I just learned here at college). You know diary, there is something that I am totally confused about. Who is this D. T. Bradley? Everyone says if you want a good time, go to D. T. Bradley's. Saturday night, I went to Cox, the Cunninghams, Curry and Frazier and looked on all the doors. No D. T. Bradley. Then someone told me to look on Main Street. What dorm is on Main Street? Maybe he lives off of campus.

Guess what? Diary, I am becoming very radical. I decided to have a party in my room Friday night. I am going to register it and everything. Neatto, huh? I thought I would invite a few close friends over for a chess tournament and maybe a few crossword puzzles. How exciting! I'm going to ride my Huffy bike over to Safeway for Cheetos and Cokes. How radical!

Wednesday: Hi Diary,

School is great. Two foreign exchange students from Afghanistan are coming. Yeah, I know that they are my roommates. But just wait we are going to have a swell time anyway. I decided that I want to do an article for the Rotunda. I am going to do a story about the Alaskan Crab migration and mating during mid-December. That should be a juicy story. I know Frank will just love it. Maybe even a picture. Maybe even my picture.

Well, the weekend is coming up really fast. I still only have two people coming to my party. That's okay. They will be flocking here when they hear about the chess tournament. You know, Diary, I knew the parking situation was bad, but they actually towed away my Huffy. Can you believe that?

Friday: Well Diary,

I decided to go to something called a mixer. The party sorta fell through. The Afghanistans had an emergency anti-nuclear meeting. I really don't quite know what a mixer is. But maybe if I like it, I can go to a blender next week. What do you think?

Sincerely Yours,
George

Advice from Billy Bob the townie

Dear Billy Bob,

Q. How does Farmville rank on the Russian's priorities for nuclear war hit list?

A: Weell, Farmville of course is the capital of South Central Virginia. That right there puts us right up there. No doubt them Shriners driving them little cars around during last years Christmas parade created a ruckus with them kremlins. And where do those AMC people get off on calling a car a kremlin? No wonder that model stunk.

Q: Billy Bob,

This fraternity guy keeps bugging me for a date. I don't like him. What should I do?

A: Well, the first thing I'd do is I'd get you in my pickup truck, oh that's right I'm answering your question. Well, like my grand-pappy used to say, if you want to keep the rooster out of the hen house, tie his cocky-self to a tree. But that ain't gonna help you none is it? Actually this is one of them delicate-type matters. Why don't you'all come around my place and we'll handle this personal-like. Bring some of your friends, and I'll seminar you'all on it.

Billy Bob,

Q: Please tell me your position on the state of Apartheid.

A: Well, I'm glad you asked. Back in '66 I played football for Apartheid State, offensive line you know. I'm not impartial about discussing my college career. I liked old A.S.U. up until they went bilingual on me. I could not stand them damn women, their lips flappin' in the breeze. They never did give them cuts under their noses a chance to heal. Often entertain the idea of prolonging my education purely on a short-term remedial basis of course. But not as long as they keep letting them women in there.

Dear Billy Bob:

Q: How do you explain the sudden weather change last week where we went from an extreme week of heat to instant winter.

A: It has something to do with a Russian plot. You see, they have installed and manned a space station on the moon equipped with large reflecting mirrors and some real extra big air conditioning units. There plot was to evaporate large quantites of the Nations water supply and catch the condensation in big plastic bags. These bags are then frozen by the air conditioning units and the result is either rocheted back to the Motherland or sold to other various communist speaking countries for a large profit.

You'all have a nice week now. See ya next time.

Please send letters to: Billy Bob, The Townie Box 1133, Longwood College.

Last Will and Testament on parking

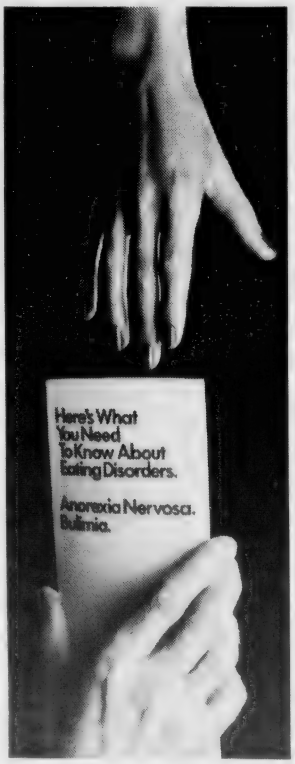
By Jeff Fleming

This is the last article I'm writing on parking at Longwood College. In this last article I hope to inform you, humor you, and finally tell you where to go.

To begin with, I was appointed to the Parking Appeals Committee. This committee consists of two people in the administration, two faculty members, two day students, and two dorm students. To date, the total amount of tickets on appeal for this semester are 61. We've had two meetings this semester. In addition to appeals we have discussed lot changes and problems with our map. The biggest change from last year is the Lankford parking lot has been given to dorm students.

This has put many day students, that don't have early classes, in the dreaded Wynne lot. My only suggestion to the day students is to try to get to campus early. If you don't have an early class; wear your hiking boots. There is one mistake in the color coded parking map that was distributed. The map shows that spaces are available in Iler lot for students. All spaces in Iler lot are for the faculty. The police dept. also assures us that more signs are going up.

In the first three weeks of school 1000 tickets were issued by the police officers. Of the 1000 given 148 were paid and 57 were voided. Believe it or not all that money the dept. eventually collects in tickets and late fines does not go back into the dept. It goes back to the State of Va. (Don't we pay enough taxes already?). The best way to avoid a ticket is to first spend $10.00 for a parking sticker. Second, keep the color coded map in your car that you get when you buy the sticker. Third, don't park in fire zones unless you're driving a firetruck. Finally, don't park in the handicapped zones unless you're really HANDICAPPED. (Faking doesn't count).



So, it's late at night, you can't find a legal spot; you park in a faculty space. If it's during the week you should move your car before 8:00 in the morning. Keep in mind the police dept. does have an escort service for people that have to park in Wynne lot; late at night.

My last word is on the parking appeals. Personally I welcome all student appeals for tickets with a legitimate excuse. 2. Don't base your appeal on, "not knowing you were suppose to be there." 1. Make sure your appeal form is filled out completely. 3. Don't say you never got a ticket, the police dept. doesn't fib about ticket distribution.

"But seriously folks"

Some People Are Dying To Know The Facts About Eating Disorders.

The truth is, bulimia and anorexia nervosa are being diagnosed at an almost epidemic rate. An estimated 15 to 20 percent of all college women are bulimic, and approximately one out of every 100-250 young women suffer from anorexia.

People with bulimia go on periodic eating binges, only to force up or "purge" their food later. Anorectics typically starve themselves to as little as 65 percent of their normal body weight—or even less.

Eating disorders are illnesses, ones that can take over your life. But it doesn't have to be that way—effective treatment can turn your life around.

Don't wait. Get the facts now. Clip and mail this coupon, or call Dominion Hospital at 536-2000 for a free booklet.

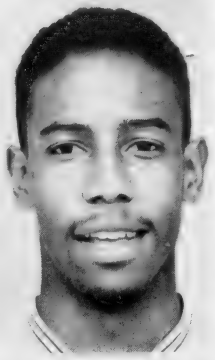
Frank Tennyson

By Tim Fitzgerald

FARMVILLE, VA. — Everyone should have at least one chance to live the life of Walter Mitty. This summer Franklin Delano Roosevelt Tennyson got his chance.

Tennyson, a 5-8 point guard on Longwood's basketball team, spent much of his summer in a dream world. Tennyson worked as a counselor at various basketball camps and had the chance to rub elbows with such superstars as Ralph Sampson and Michael Jordan.



With the help of Longwood basketball coach Cal Luther, Tennyson was originally scheduled to work one week at the James Madison Basketball camp. But, he did such an outstanding job at JMU that he was asked to work at Ralph Sampson's first camp the following week in Harrisonburg.

At Madison, the counselors spent the entire day refereeing games. Tennyson did an exceptional job and was selected to officiate the championship game.

Each night, after officiating as many as seven or eight games, the counselors held live scrimmages until 11:30 or 12:00. "It was intense, all out, hard-nosed basketball," said Tennyson.

It was Roger Bergey, Ralph Sampson's high school coach from Harrisonburg, who was impressed with Tennyson's work at the JMU camp and asked him to work the next week at Ralph's camp.

While there, Tennyson roomed with former Highland Springs High teammate and UVA star

Ricky Stokes. "We stayed with Ralph, and we became friends. He's really a great guy. Every morning he would spend about a half hour giving the kids free shirts, shoes, sweats, basketballs and other items. He was always there for the kids. He never missed a session."

Each counselor, most of whom were from Divison I schools, was assigned to coach a team, and Tennyson's team won the camp championship. "It was a really big event. We were on TV, and we got a lot of recognition. I was really happy for the kids," said Tennyson.

As at Madison, night hours were reserved for live scrimmages by the counselors. "I improved a lot playing with those guys. When you play above your level you've got to improve or get out."

After showing his playing and coaching abilities, Tennyson was in high demand. "I had the opportunity to work at a different camp everyday for the rest of the summer, but I couldn't do it because of my job at the Boys Club of Richmond."

For Tennyson it was a summer of nothing but basketball. By the time he came back to Longwood, he had met such stars as Ralph Sampson, Michael Jordan, John Lucas, Alex English, Calvin Murphey, Othel Wilson, Johnny Dawkins, Ricky Stokes and many others. "Being around these people and playing with the people I played with has really helped my confidence offensively. I've always been consistent on defense, but now I am more confident in my ability to score."

According to coach Cal Luther, "I wish every player could have these experiences to help his confidence the way they have obviously helped Frank's." Last season as a junior, Tennyson averaged 3.8 points per game while leading the Lancers in field goal percentage (.556) and finishing third in free throw percentage (.730). Longwood, however, experienced its first losing season in six years.

After a summer of preparation, Longwood's Walter Mitty, Frank Tennyson, is ready for the challenges that lie ahead in the Mason-Dixon Conference. "I don't want to make a definite prediction, but I feel that we can win the conferences. I have confidence in our recruits and our returning players. I don't want to sound over-confident, but I think this can be our best year ever."

Soccer

Kyoud, a junior who keys the Longwood attack with his passes from midfield, headed up the 11-man All-Tournament team. The tournament MVP was joined by Lancer teammates Mike Harris, the tournament Most Valuable Defender, back Shawn McArdle, and forward Tim Ford on the all-tourney squad.

While L[illegible]gwood's tournament games [illegible]eared to be relatively even battles according to the scores, the Lancers actually dominated both Slippery Rock and Hampden-Sydney.

Longwood had 30 shots to Slippery Rock's 9 in the first round and 26 shots to Hampden-Sydney's 2 in the tournament championship game. In building a 6-0 record, the Lancers have out-scored their opponents 20-6.

Staked to a 2-0 lead on goals by Mark Kremen and Tim Ford, Longwood had to go overtime when The Rock came up with two goals which bounced off Lancer defenders. Another goal by Ford, who has five with the two assists thus far, in the first overtime and a score by sophomore Chris Erard-Coupe in the second extra period, gave Longwood the win. The Lancers avenged a 4-0 setback to Slippery Rock in last year's tourney.

Senior John Kennen tied a school mark with three assists in Saturday's victory.

Junior midfielder Mahfoud Kyoud has led the Longwood team to two tournament championships and five straight victories over the past eight days. For his performance, the 5-9, 160-pounder has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period September 16-23. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Hockey

Senior forward Sue Groff moved into second place on Longwood's all-time scoring list and the Longwood field hockey team picked up two wins in a successful weekend of action in Boone, North Carolina Friday and Saturday.

Longwood shut-out host Appalachian State 1-0 Friday behind a goal by senior Sharon Bruce and Saturday morning the Lady Lancers beat the University of the South (Sewanee) 3-1 as Groff knocked in all three scores.

With the goals, Groff increased her career total to 37, moving past Carol Filo (35) and into second place in career goals behind Terry Voit (93). Groff has now scored nine goals in helping Coach Sue Finnie's team get off to a 5-1 start.

Longwood has now outscored its six opponents by a whopping 20-3 margin, but coach Finnie has also been pleased with her team's defense.

While Groff and Bruce shared the offensive player of the game award in Friday's victory, senior Tammy Marshall was tabbed the defensive player of the game. Marshall was credited with 16 interceptions and had a crucial save on a corner. Claye Conkwright had 20 interceptions and Lesley Rapoza had 17.

"We're playing very well now," said Finnie. "We had a great game Friday in terms of passing. Our timing was superb."

This week Longwood entertains Mary Washington Wednesday at 4:00 and has a pair of games scheduled at James Madison over the weekend. Friday at 6:00 Appalachian will be set for a rematch and Saturday morning the Lady Lancers will face Radford.

Golfers

Plagued by a slow start, the Longwood men's golf team finished 16th out of 17 teams in the VMI and Washington & Lee Invitational Tournament over the weekend.

Longwood carded rounds of 335 and 328 for a 36-hole total of 663. Elon won the event with a 298-294-592, topping seven Division I teams. This week, the Lancer golfers host Chowan, Liberty University and Hampden-Sydney Thursday at Longwood Golf Course for a four-team match.

"We didn't play that well overall, but I was pleased with Ty Bordner's first round score," said Coach Steve Nelson. "I think if we can get everybody playing up to their capabilities at the same time, we'll be okay."

Volleyball

Longwood's volleyball team had a shot at winning all three games Friday night, but came away a loser as homestanding Randolph-Macon Woman's College took a 15-7, 15-10 and 15-11 victory in Lynchburg.

The Lady Lancers trailed 7-0 before rallying in the first game, were ahead 10-4 in the second contest and cut a 14-1 deficit to 14-11 before bowing in the third game.

"We played better than in our opening loss to Chowan, but we lost a lot of points on serve-receive," said coach Linda Elliott. "The biggest problem we have is we just don't know how to win."

Rugby

On Saturday, September 21, the Longwood College Rugby Club played in its first match of the season.

Their opponents on this warm fall day were none other than last year's Virginia Rugby Union Champions, the Norfolk Blues. The first half saw some tough hitting; however, the only points scored were by Norfolk on a penalty kick. The half ended with the score Norfolk 3, Longwood 0.

Longwood came back in the second half to take the lead on a try scored by Dave Rackley. The point after attempt missed and the score stood at 4-3 Longwood.

Longwood's lead was brief as Norfolk came back and scored 13 consecutive points after attempt, to take the lead 16-4.

Longwood's final score came from a drop kick executed by Phillipe Casenave. The game ended with Norfolk as the winners 16-7.

The Longwood College Rugby Club has the following matches left:

September 28	University of Richmond	Away
October 5	T.C. Williams Law School	Home
October 12	Lynchburg	Home
October 26	Washington & Lee	Away
November 2	Ed Lee State Tournament	Away
November 9	George Mason University	Home

Sean Marsee's Smokeless Death

The Angry Red Spot with its hard white core was the size of a half-dollar. It belonged, thought Dr. Carl Hook, in the mouth of a 75-year-old who had been dipping snuff since the age of three, not on the tongue of the high school boy who sat across from him. "I'm sorry, Sean," said the Ada, Okla., throat specialist. "It doesn't look good. We'll have to do a biopsy."

Sean Marsee was stunned. He didn't smoke or drink. You couldn't and win 28 medals running anchor leg on the 400-meter relay. A tapered five-foot-five, 130 pounds, Sean had always taken excellent care of his body: watching his diet, lifting weights, running five miles a day six months of the year.

Now this. How could it be? True, he was never without a dip. He used up a can of snuff, a type of smokeless tobacco, every day and a half, holding it in his mouth to get a nicotine jolt without smoking. It was popular among high-school athletes who didn't want to break training. "But I didn't know snuff could be that bad for you," Sean said. "No warning label or anything. And all those ads on TV . . ."

Eighteen-year-old Sean had been secretly using "smokeless" — chewing tobacco briefly, then snuff — since he was 12. His mother, Betty, a registered nurse, had hit the roof when she found out. Didn't he know tobacco was hazardous, smoke or no smoke?

Now Dr. Hook was saying, "I'm afraid we'll have to remove that part of your tongue, Sean."

The high-school senior was silent. "Can I still run in the state track meet this weekend?" he finally asked. "And graduate next month?" Dr. Hook nodded.

On May 16, 1983, the operation was performed at the Valley View Hospital in Ada. More of Sean's tongue had to be removed than Dr. Hook had anticipated. Worse, the tumor biopsy was positive. Once the swelling in his mouth went down, Sean agreed to see a radiation therapist.

Before therapy could begin, however, a newly swollen lymph node was found in Sean's neck, an ominous sign that the cancer had spread. Radical neck surgery would now be needed. Gently Dr. Hook recommended the severest option: removing the lower jaw on the right side as well as all lymph nodes, muscles and blood vessels except the life-sustaining carotid artery. There might be some sinking but the chin would support the general planes of the face.

Betty Marsee began to cry. Sean was being asked to approve his own mutilation — Sean who was so fastidious about his appearance that he'd even swallow his dip rather than he caught spitting tobacco juice. They sat in silence for ten minutes. Then, dimly, she heard him say, "Not the jawbone. Don't take the jawbone."

"Okay, Sean," Dr. Hook said softly. "But the rest; that's the least we should do." ●

On June 20 Sean underwent a second operation, which lasted eight hours. That same month 150 students and teachers at Talihina High assembled to honor their most outstanding athlete. Sean could not be there to receive his award.

Miraculously, Sean snapped back. When Dr. Hook saw him that August, he showed no trace of his ordeal except the white incision scar. Five weeks of radiation therapy were behind him. Sean greeted his doctor with enthusiasm, plainly happy to be alive.

But in October, however, Sean started having headaches. A CAT scan showed twin tentacles of fresh malignancy, one snaking down his back, the other curling under the base of his brain.

Sean had his third operation in November 1983. It was the jawbone operation he had feared — and more. After ten hours on the operating table, he had four huge drains coming from a foot-long crescent wound, a breathing tube sticking out of a hole in his throat, a feeding tube through his nose, and two tubes in his arm veins. Sean looked at Betty as if to say, My God, Mom, I didn't know it was going to hurt like this.

The Marsees brought Sean home for Christmas. Even then, he remained optimistic, until the day in January when he found lumps in the left side of his neck. Later, Betty answered when the hospital phoned the results of another biopsy. Sean knew the news was bad by her silent tears as she listened. When she hung up, he was in her arms, and for the first time since the awful nightmare started, grit-tough Sean Marsee began to sob.

After several minutes, he straightened and said, "Don't worry. I'm going to be fine." Like the winning runner he was, he still had faith in his finishing kick.

Almost to the end Sean insisted on caring for himself, packing his wound and cleaning and reinserting his breathing tube several times a day.

One day Sean confessed to Betty that he still craved snuff. "I catch myself thinking," he said, "I'll just reach over and have a dip." Then he added that he wished he could visit the high school locker room to show the athletes "what you look like when you use it." His appearance, he knew, would be persuasive. A classmate who had come to see him fainted dead away.

One friend who didn't flinch was John O'Dell, then 29, a former football player from the local Fellowship of Christian Athletes. John asked Sean, when he became unable to speak, if he'd like to pencil something to share with young athletes "later." Sean wrote two brief messages. One was a simple declaration of Christian faith. The other was a plea: Don't dip snuff.

Early on February 25, 1984, Sean smiled a tired smile at his sister Marian and flashed an index finger skyward. An hour later he died.

There are now 6 million to 10 million consumers of snuff, and sales are rising 8 percent annually. "The more I dipped, the more I liked it," said Paul Hughes, 18, a six-four football co-captain from North Easton, Mass. "Makes you feel — you know, calms you down. When I tried to stop, I couldn't." Alan Lawrence, his co-captain of the

Ambassadors: Longwood's Leaders

By KIM SETZER

Remember when you came to Longwood your junior or senior year of high school for a tour which was given by a student? Or what about the student from Longwood who came to your school on college night? These students are Longwood Ambassadors. The purpose of Longwood Ambassadors is to involve selected students in the goals of advancing Longwood College's image and support. As an organization, the Ambassadors have been designated as official host and hostesses for all college relations and activities. In addition, they provide the leadership for campus tours and student recruitment programs. They provide the volunteer person power for the alumni and parent's annual fund phone-a-thon.

The Longwood Ambassadors are available to all organizations and departments as official host and hostesses for all Longwood activities. A long-range goal of the Ambassadors is to be the leadership group of the campus that builds student pride, involvement and support for the benefit of the institution. In addition, the Ambassadors intend to expand their fund-raising activities to gain financial support from entities other than alumni and parents for generating school funds for the students of Longwood.

The membership of the Longwood Ambassadors consists of a maximum of 65 members. Right now, there are approximately 50 members. This fall, 21 new members joined the organization. There are membership campaigns at the beginning of each semester. It was established in the Fall of 1982. The requirements for membership are:

(1) Must be a currently enrolled student

2) Must have a cumulative grade point average of no less than 2.3

(3) Must have been enrolled in Longwood for at least one semester with exception of incoming transfer students

There are ten students on an executive council and there are five advisors. These advisors include: Don Lemish, Vice-President of Institutional Advancement; Barbara Stonikinis, Co-ordinating advisor; Candy Dowdy of Admissions; Nancy Shelton, Alumni and Paula Clay, Institutional Advancement.

Don Lemish, of the Ambassadors, states, "Ambassadors are students who want to advance this college and want to give of themselves for the benefit of the institution as a whole." Ambassadors are involved in every official social function on and off the campus. They personally call every student who is officially admitted to Longwood College. They call 12,000 people asking for pledges to the college. One of the greatest

Professional Counselor Joins Longwood's Staff

Dr. Ann T. Chapin, of Blacksburg, will join the staff of Longwood College's Counseling Services on October 16.

Chapin has extensive experience in personal and career counseling, career development programming, and job search training.

She has worked with the Virginia VIEW Project (statewide career information system) and has been a counselor at New River, Virginia Highlands, and Northern Virginia Community Colleges and at Powhatan and Culpeper County High Schools.

A graduate of Phillips University in Oklahoma, Chapin holds the master's degree from Virginia Commonwealth University, the Education Specialist certificate from the University of Virginia, and the doctorate in counselor education from VPI & SU.

Her appointment is subject to confirmation by Longwood's Board of Visitors at their November meeting.

My Page

On Our Rotunda

Recently the various schweenies of the Longwood community have reared back on their collective hind legs to shout "Hey, The Rotunda sucks!" "Trash!" and "Hey Raio, Wasamatta you? Why come such an abundance of garbage in The Rotunda?"

Illiterate students write letters to our staff complaining that they cannot tell when we are serious. Faculty members, apparently unprepared for a more relevant topic, lecture their classes on the sorry state of The Rotunda. Even the administration has let their feelings be known; a Rotunda staff member has had his room searched for bathroom graffiti and I have been informed that The Rotunda books must be audited on the first day of every month.

On the other hand, hundreds of students have approached our staff with compliments and this week we will be increasing the number of copies printed by 400 over last year's average.

It seems that a love-hate situation has developed. Isn't that neato?

What follows may seem to be an excuse for why The Rotunda is such a rag, it is not; the small Rotunda staff is proud of each issue published this year — just because we don't send copies along with our resumes, doesn't mean that we are not proud.

Last spring, when I was sentenced to the position of Editor-in-Chief, I began to picture the new, improved Rotunda. We would double the advertising rates, quadruple the advertising staff, thereby having more money for more pages. We would have a pull-out humor section every three weeks or so, The Cowpie. I set out recruiting staff, three staffs actually, one for business, one for Cowpie and one (the biggest and most important) for news.

The business end has been great. Although still losing money on each issue, every week of sales breaks the record set the week before. We may even have enough money to print a paper every week. What a concept!

The Cowpie staff, although small, is hard-working enough to get the job done. Sure, some of the material in Cowpie may warrant a "PG" rating, but we're all of age here and hey, that crap is funny.

Then there is the news staff. This group is potentially over 3,000 strong. It includes students, faculty and administration. What I get from this group is called "diddly-squat." Sparky Lyle defines this term as a pitcher who doesn't have good stuff. To me it meant no paper last week. This problem is faced not only by The Rotunda; apathy is a Longwood problem. The SGA battles it every day. Apathy, not alcohol, is the reason why students miss class, don't get involved, don't take pride in Longwood. Heck, we don't even have a yearbook!

As editor, I must decide what gets printed. My choices are limited. If you had a choice between blank space on the front page or a picture of a toilet on a sign, which would you choose? Do you think there would have been a toilet on page one if I had an interview with the new Dean of Students (or any of the other 40 stories assigned had materialized)? Of course not. I have been forced to use what was meant for Cowpie to fill space in The Rotunda.

I don't walk around saying, "hey we need something stupid for this week's front page." And unlike last year's editor, I do not have the unlimited energy to write half of the copy. Frankly, I'm beginning to wonder why I spend 30 hours per week putting out a paper for you soft-headed, pencil-neck ignoramuses anyway. Maybe it's not worth the convertible Mercedes that The Rotunda is buying for me next week (in the audit, it will look like "office supplies").

It is only possible for us to print what is written for us. And considering the personality types that make up The Rotunda staff, an occasional tasteless humor section is inevitable. I cannot be removed as editor (as some have suggested) unless I "substantially disrupt" the learning process of Longwood, the 1st amendment of the U. S. Constitution sees to that. So don't even think about it. You couldn't find anybody to be editor anyway.

Simply put: If you don't like what you read, write. If you don't write, shutup, because you are the cause of the problem.

Letter To The Editor

Dear Editor,

As members of last year's Alcohol Task Force, we feel compelled to reply to the recent Rotunda editorial attack on our committee's recommendations and the particularly objectionable remarks directed against our committee chair, Barb Gorski. Unfortunately Mr. Raio's column contained so many errors and distortions that space will permit us to point out only the most offensive.

1. The editorial claimed that the committee was dominated by "jughead" administrators. Mr. Raio attended at least two of our meetings before apparently losing interest. He should remember that student government leaders comprised the largest element of the committee, while faculty and administrative staff (including Amy Thompson, then R.E.C. for Frazer) made up the rest. On the question of eliminating Thursday night Lower Dining Hall parties, the vote was unanimous.

2. The editorial charged that the committee was bullied and manipulated by "Soviet-style" tactics. Such a claim is absurd. On the contrary, even when we disagreed with Barb Gorski on particular issues, we could not have been other than impressed by her fairness and concern for the welfare of students.

3. Mr. Raio seems to believe that we were given a choice of banning kegs or Thursday night parties. Again the claim is baseless; the issues were entirely separate and at no time did the committee chair or any member suggest a linkage.

4. The editorial charged that we have created a tangle of new alcohol regulations to further burden the lives of Longwood students. At last there is a shred of truth to the claim. The committee's task was to make our alcohol regulations conform to those being instituted by the state. Had we banned kegs from the dormitories altogether, we could have put in place regulations which would have been much clearer and less complicated than those finally recommended by the committee. Yet the committee was swayed by the outpouring of student sentiment against the elimination of kegs. Consequently we struggled to form what are admittedly complicated regulations, but ones which are as liberal as Virginia alcohol laws will allow. Longwood's alcohol policy is as lenient as any in the state of Virginia and more lenient than those of most academic institutions. It should be noted that some of the nation's leading institutions have banned alcohol entirely on their campuses, e.g., University of Maryland, University of Wisconsin.

In sum, your assault on our committee's efforts and on a college administration which is committed to protecting student interests, was both uninformed and unwarrented.

Sincerely,
Sandra K. Cross
James W. Crowl

Editor's Reply:

1. "Mr. Raio" (I like the sound of that) attended one meeting as a representative of the SGA, I went to make sure that you guys weren't doing anything radical. You weren't, those meetings were boring, until that fateful meeting shortly after dawn on reading day.

2. No Comment.

3. I am no idiot. I would never write such a harsh editorial without checking my information with at least two sources. This week my two task force member sources have told me that they stick to their stories. I stick to my story.

4. Janet Greenwood says the same thing. I still do not understand how outlawing Thursday night parties is in compliance with any state law. A Virginia state agency (A.B.C.) sells liquor on Thursday evenings and all the bars are open. What's the deal? Maybe I am an idiot, will someone please point out this elusive Virginia law to me?

In sum, I am glad that you guys took the time to give the other side of the story to the students. Also, it was really nice to receive a letter to the editor which was not written with a crayon. I will say however that I wake up every morning and thank my genetic make-up for giving me the foresight to fulfill my history (with Crowl) and health (with Cross) requirements last semester, before I became editor.

Oktoberfest

By BRUCE SOUZA

It was so hot he was wearing his Bermuda shorts. Around his neck were a cheap pair of binoculars, and clutched in his right hand were two folding deck chairs. He and Jane would sit and watch while the kids would stand or sit on the grass. Five minutes later John was trying not to trip over his drooping lower lip.

Meet John D. Doe, an average income Virginian with three kids, one a freshman attending Longwood College. This was the first family visit to Longwood, and by 10 a.m. that Saturday morning they were on their way. As John was driving he thought "I finally get to see where all my extra bucks go."

They arrived just in time to get front row seats for the 1984 Oktoberfest parade. It was called the OOOP parade — "Our Outrageous Oktoberfest Parade." It was soon after the parade started that the problem with John's lip began to occur. It was soon after the parade started that the parade ended! Whether or not the last "parade" was actually a parade is still being debated by the Guinness Book of World Records. The only thing "Outrageous" about last year's parade was its shocking shortness, and its lack of any form or function. The parade lasted at most 5 minutes, and was largely comprised of students in street clothes who looked like they had been bribed to participate in the unsightly debacle. Then, to add insult to injury, the organizers of Oktoberfest spent a good portion of 30 minutes congratulating and thanking everyone in sight for a job well done.

The purpose here is not to attack the members of Geist or those who spend considerable time and effort to organize Oktoberfest. They were plagued like The Rotunda with the job of trying to motivate people while offering no material rewards for time and effort. Nevertheless, I question the institution of Oktoberfest itself. Certainly it is painfully clear that Oktoberfest is used as a substitute for what many schools refer to as homecoming. Like other schools, we here at the "Wood" also need a time when the alumni can return, parents can visit, and students can enjoy a mid-semester break above the average weekend. So, sometime ago an inventive Longwood administrator had to come up with a theme for such a time. Why Oktoberfest? Because it's in October, stupid!

Unfortunately, what we do here at Longwood has very little in common with our European namesake. One could have easily forgiven the OOOP parade and the unusually uninventive midway booths, if we could have at least had a decent beer garden.

Last year's beer garden, simply put, was an atrocity. It consisted of a beer truck and a roped off area of the street, with no where to sit down. Everyone was required to drink within the "beer cage." This arrangement seemed ignorant considering the availability of the seldom used grassy area in front of the Bedford Building. Naw! Everybody knows it's much more fun to drink beer while standing on steamy pavement. This institution tries to deny the drinking of alcoholic beverages at Oktoberfest, when in fact this is largely what Oktoberfest is based on. Instead of being open all day long, the Bier Garten is only open 1 hour and a half. You get one beer and then get hustled into a roped-off area like P.O.W. If this is Oktoberfest, where is the German food, music and pavillion-covered picnic tables where young and old can share food, drink and conversation?

The fact is that our Oktoberfest has very little semblance to a real German Oktoberfest. The students get denied by silly rules and the attitudes of those who are in charge of Oktoberfest; Witness: The administration making an unsuccessful attempt to nix the beer mug from our 1985 Oktoberfest T-shirts. The beer mug held by the Bier Meister would theoretically encourage drinking. How ODD!! A Bier Meister with a beer mug! What else would he be holding — a can of Pepsi Free? At the same time the theme of Oktoberfest is "Cheers To Oktoberfest" and shows two mugs clinking together. Oh! it's just a small contradiction. In fact, the whole idea of Oktoberfest in Farmville turns into a mutated cultural contradiction.

The hardline by the administration the last couple of years, has been to de-emphasize and decrease alcohol usage. Yet the biggest event of the year (next to the sorority walk) is called Oktoberfest, which by all accounts has obvious drinking connotations. We should either screw the rules for a day and have a party, or change the name of Oktoberfest, and stop insulting its historical significance. Oh yeah! If you don't want your folks to turn into John Or Jane Doe just call them after Oktoberfest — it's the next best thing to being there.

Dieting, The Modern Torture Device

By KIM SETZER

Diets are funny things. People diet for a variety of reasons. Some because of health, and some because they want to look like a flag pole's twin. Fad diets seem to be the "in" thing right now. I'm sure you've all seen that miraculous grapefruit diet. A decent looking construction worker with a decent looking body is going on a grapefruit diet. Real macho, huh? He even squeezes the grapefruit to show his masculinity. In the next commercial, he is in a suit. He probably bought it with the money that he made on the first commercials.

Oh yes, and don't those heart-rendering testimonials just make you want to cry? I think for $500 I'd say I lost 200 pounds even though I've never weighed over 116 pounds in my entire life. Well, here are a few tips on dieting:

(1) If you really want to go on a diet, and you really want it to work, and you really want to lose weight, go to the dentist, have a root canal done, get your mouth wired shut, and then buy a pack of handy dandy paper straws and a blender.

(2) If you have a VCR, buy the Texas Chainsaw Massacre and watch it before each meal (if you can, have pizza with lots of tomato sauce).

(3) Hire Clint Eastwood to live in your refrigerator for a week. Every time you open the door, he will stick his gun up your nose and say, "Go ahead, eat the cheesecake, and make my day!!" I'm sure that after about a week of that, you will never break your diet again.

(4) Buy a muzzle.

(5) Read the labels of what you are about to eat. Make a rule to yourself that if you can't pronounce it, you can't eat it.

Blithe Spirit:

An Early Review

By JEFF FLEMING

During the week of Oktoberfest the Longwood Players will open their first show of the season. A comedy by Noel Coward, Blithe Spirit premiered on Broadway in November of 1941. The following critique written by Brooks Atkinson was published in the New York Times on November 6, 1941.

Blithe Spirit . . . is a completely insane farce that is also uproarious. It hardly touches the stage as it rides a demented broomstick to hilarity . . . It is a travesty of ghost stories, told with the sardonic impeccability of a cafe wit.

A novelist is living with his second wife in a state of fashionable discontentment. To accumulate a little useful information about the occult for a novel he is writing he invites a spiritualist to hold a seance in his house. She does, and to such a good purpose that the spirit of his first wife returns from the psychic beyond, and raises with his comestic arrangements. For she is not a noble spirit. She is vain and covetous. Through some eerie mischavee, she even translates the second wife into a spirit. And the third act of the play finds the novelist plagued by two spirits that cannot leave him and cannot get away from each other.

That is the framework of Blithe Spirit. But it hardly suggests the comic absurdity of Mr. Coward's high-spirited lark, which is full of droll malice and farcical insincerity. To him the mumbo-jumbo of spiritualism is an invitation to poke fun at solemn characters and write lines with a coustic stick. He skips through the exposition with witty alacrity. He picks up some vagrant laughs with low-comedy part of the fleet-footed sewart drudge. As usual, smashes crockery to a point aclimax. And the part of the maidenly spiritualist he has translated into a remarkable funny satire on old saws and bogus good cheer."

What Is S-UN?

The lights are dimming, the stage is set, anticipation is high as the band steps on stage to an opening round of applause, you're sitting backstage feeling ten feet tall because this is your event.

Concerts, films, lectures, art shows, leadership, communication, interpersonal skills, business skills, marketing, advertising; all of these are what comprise S-UN, the Student Union programming Organization. There are currently 18-20 student volunteers who decide on the types of programming, develop budgets, work with talent agencies, and promote and produce the activities on campus. The organization needs new members! The more students involved, the greater the depth, variety and quality of program offerings.

The time investment to the organization can vary from a few hours a week to a few hours a day. The rewards for participation are confidence, hands on business experience, a chance to challenge yourself and see what you're capable of accomplishing, as well as contributing to the atmosphere of Longwood College. The students currently involved in S-UN are developing new friends and relationships with students as well as faculty and administrative staff.

If college life is not fulfilling all your wants and needs, go after the opportunities for involvement here at Longwood and consider becoming part of a growing organization like S-UN.

If you are interested in more information, contact Paul Striffolino, Director of Student Union, Lankford Student Union or come to a S-UN meeting, held every Tuesday evening, 6:15 p.m. in the Leadership Lounge.

Rugby

After two hard fought, losing battles against the Norfolk Blues and the University of Richmond, the Longwood College Men's Rugby Club put the pieces together in a 29-0 whipping T. C. Williams Law School.

Longwood took the early lead in the first half on trys by David Grant and Ross Anderson. The half ended with the score Longwood 10, T. C. Williams 0.

In the second half, Longwood built on this 10 point lead, A try each by Dave Larsen and Phillipe Casanave, plus three penalty kicks produced a final score of 29-0, in favor of Longwood.

Longwood College will play rival Hampden-Sydney College in two matches on Wednesday, October 9. The first match will be at 4:00 p.m. at the president's field.

This rivalry has fizzled out in recent years due to Hampden-Sydney's inability to raise a team. The word out is that they feel Longwood College is still a girls' school and that the Longwood club is full of women. All students are invited to attend.

The next match is Saturday, October 12, at 1:00 p.m. against Lynchburg. This match will also be played at the President's Field. All are welcome. Good Luck, Longwood!

Robert Frost Will Lecture Here Jan.

Beorch Eh Thorn Sponsors Program

Robert Frost, noted American poet, will lecture at Farmville January 11, 1940. His coming here was made possible through the efforts of Beorc Eh Thorn, local English honor society which tries each year to bring some eminent literary person to the college. In past years Beorc Eh Thorn has brought John Erskine, Richard Haliburton, and others to the campus.

Robert Frost writes poetry of the thoughts and feelings of the silent New Englanders. Some of his best known poems are "The Death of the Hired Man", and "Mending Walls". He has won the Pulitzer Prize for poetry three times — once in 1924, once in 1930, and again in 1937.

Frost says, "A poem begins with a lump in the throat, a home-sickness or a love-sickness. It is a reaching out toward expression; an effort to find fulfillment.

You Know You Need To Graduate When:

By JEFFRY KERR FLEMING

This article is devoted to all professional students that are making Longwood a career. If you can relate to any of these you should have been long gone. You know you need to graduate when:

1) You've almost completed your first decade.

2) The present freshman class was fresh out of elementary school when you graduated from high school.

3) When you get an invitation to your ten year high school reunion.

4) The clothes you had as a freshman are coming back in style.

5) You feel like you are approaching your mid-life crisis.

6) When you've been published in "Ripley's Believe It or Not" as a long term student.

7) When you've seen the rise and fall of two or three presidential terms.

8) You are more attracted to the professors than the students.

9) When you miss a class because of Alzheimer's disease.

(10) You never have to take your I.D. to mixers.

11) When the new car you got for graduation is now a collector's item.

12) Male enrollment equals female enrollment at Longwood.

(13) The Longwood football team really has an undefeated season.

Hit And Run

By KIMBERLY L. DEANER

On September 7, 1985 at approximately 11:30 p.m., $600 worth of damage was done to a Mustang and a Plymouth in the parking lot behind the Cunningham Dormitories. The description of the car suspected of hit and run is a white Ford with a dark top and is approximately a late model of the 70's, driven by a white female with a white male passenger. passenger.

A second incident occurred on September 20 at approximately 5:55 p.m. on South Redford St. next to the tennis courts. An orange TR7 Triumph was hit by a small blue car that at the time had 30 day tags on it.

Longwood Professor To Discuss Tour Of China

Dr. John Peale, associate professor of philosophy at Longwood College, will lecture and show slides on China on Tuesday, October 8, at 7:30 p.m. in Wygal Auditorium.

His topic will be "Journey To A Changing China." The public is invited to attend the presentation and the reception to follow in the Haga Room.

Dr. and Mrs. Peale visited China this past summer on the Yale University Alumni Study Tour. Among the cities they visited were Beijing (Peking), Xian, Chongqing (Chungking), Yangzi (Yangtze) Gorges, Wuhan, Shanghai, and Guangzhou (Canton).

Dr. Helen Siu, assistant professor of anthropology at Yale, and R. Charles Peterson, professor of history at Cornell University, accompanied the study group and lectured frequently.

"These two well-informed people helped us to understand better what we saw," Dr. Peale said. "Our historical understanding was enriched, and we gained a perspective on many of the interesting changes that are occurring in contemporary Chinese society."

The Peales have a special interest in China since Mrs. Peale was born there while her parents were serving as Presbyterian missionaries. She left China when she was four years old.

Ambassadors

advantages of being an Ambassador is experience. Ambassadors are exposed to alumni, government officials, leaders in the corporate and business world, prospective students and the general public. "We want our students exposed to as many individuals and groups external of the institution as we can possibly expose them to. That is because the best way to sell something is with quality products. Through this experience many students can get their foot in the door for professional job opportunities by people they meet."

Ambassadors have many duties. These include:

(1) Assist the Director of Annual Funds with the Alumni Telefund.

(2) Serve as Official hosts and Hostesses for various parties, programs, events, etc.

(3) Assist Admissions in activities related to attracting qualified students to Longwood College.

(4) Assist Institutional Advancement in support programs for the benefit of Longwood College.

(5) Serve as College Tour Guides.

(6) Serve in other various public relations activities for the benefit of Longwood.

(7) Although the Ambassadors is totally a voluntary organization, it is highly prestigious and is a very beneficial part of college life.

In the future, there are some changes to be made in Ambassadors. It was the job of the executive board to interview students who wished membership into the organization. Now, it will be the duty of the advisors. Barbara Stonikinis is new to the advisory board. She is the co-ordinating advisor from the Institutional Advancement Office. She was asked to be on the board because she is the person they come to, and she doesn't travel as much as the other advisors. Stonikinis states of the Ambassadors, "They are a great bunch of kids, and I am looking forward to working with them this year." Also new is the concept to expand by taking on special projects. The leadership for these special projects would come from the Ambassadors and other students would become involved.

When students were asked what they wanted from Ambassadors, they replied:

(1) leadership
(2) pride and involvement
(3) friendships and relationships
(4) results for advancing the college
(5) to become a greater part of the college
(6) a sense of belonging
(7) gaining self-confidence
(8) a love for Longwood
(9) interesting and exciting experiences
(10) "we want to give"
(11) "to us it is the most important organization on campus"
(12) influence on people

Lemish said of these replies, "I found those remarks to be parallel to Maslov's theory. You build a pyramid of psychological needs. At the base you have the feeling of oneself and that there is safety of doing something with a group. Continuing up the pyramid, there is a great sense of belonging, then self-esteem and then self-actualization." There are also many other advantages to being an Ambassador."

Tami Bostian, the President of Ambassadors, is a senior and has been an Ambassador since she was a second semester freshman. She presides over all the meetings, she participates on every committee, makes sure everything goes smoothly, and she is a liaison between the advisors and the Ambassadors. Tami states, "I learned about it through sorority sisters. It is a public relations group for the school and I love to meet people in school and outside of the college."

This is Kirk Vetter's second semester as an Ambassador. He said he wanted to "help out the school." Kirk is head of Special Projects. At Oktoberfest, the Ambassadors will be selling posters with the Oktoberfest logo. There will also be an information booth at the activity center in Lankford. Many Ambassadors will also be giving tours to prospective students.

Publicity and Communication chairman is Bob Smith. Bob has just received approval to have an information case built and put in the new Smoker. It will consist of important people visiting Longwood, and a calendar of Ambassador's events. Bob also started the LAPS Program-Longwood Ambassador's Pals. Bob states, "I love Longwood and I want to share my enthusiasm and pride with other students." The new Ambassadors are: Lisa Almond, Deb Amos, Laura Clark, Mike Clements, Trish Demonbreun, Ginger Eidson, Omar Fakhoury, Kevin Galligan, JoJo Kutz, Nancy Keedwell, Dede McWilliams, Sharo Mellinax, Peter Nielson, Jennifer Parker, Susan Ragan, Kate Riley, Mary Schraf, Kim Setzer, Colleen Vaughan, Arimah Wadi-Williams and Robin White.

football team in Taunton, Mass., said, "In our school, about three-quarters of the kids who play sports do it. As an everyday thing." Added Andover dental hygienist Joan Walsh, "Many equate it with gum chewing."

Scientific witnesses for the Smokeless Tobacco Council argued that no undisputed scientific evidence exists proving its product causes any human disease or is clinically addictive. Nitrosamines have produced cancer in some laboratory animals, but have not been shown to cause cancer in any human being, they pointed out.

But representatives of the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, American Lung Association, American Dental Society, the U.S. Addiction Research Center and the Centers for Disease Control joined researchers from the National Cancer Institute in condemning the practice of dipping. Concluded Assistant Surgeon General Robert Mecklenburg, chief dental officer of the U.S. Public Health Service: "Why should a chemical time bomb be allowed to tick without warning in the mouths of children?"

Health scientist Elbert Glover of East Carolina University recently conducted two quit-smokeless-tobacco clinics in which only one of 41 participants was able to go for more than four hours without the use of smokeless tobacco. "This, to me," Glover says, "means that smokeless can be highly addictive."

Since the Massachusetts hearing, that state now requires warning labels on snuff cans, and eight other states have similar mandatory warnings under consideration.

Both the World Health Organization and U.S. Surgeon General C. Everett Koop have declared that smokeless tobacco does indeed pose a cancer threat, and the Public Citizen Health Research Group has petitioned the Federal Trade Commission to order warning labels. The FTC, in turn, has asked the Surgeon General to conduct a comprehensive review of existing scientific evidence on health effects before taking action. Last July, Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, held hearings on whether to ban all smokeless advertising from television.

Dr. Gregory Connolly, director of dental health for the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, concedes that "we don't know how much oral cancer is caused by snuff. But we do know that each year we have about 20,000 new cases of oral cancer and 9000 deaths in this country. Tobacco of one kind or another is believed to account for about 70 percent of it. According to the National Cancer Institute, if you use snuff regularly you increase your risk fourfold."

Shortly before his death, Sean Marsee told his mother that there must be a reason God decided not to save him. "I think the reason is what we're doing right now," says Betty Marsee. "Keeping other kids from dying — that's Sean's legacy."

The Dining Service Advisory Committee

The Advisory Committee to the Dining Service is on a role! So far we have changed the cafeteria line set-up from what it was. The reason the first change came about was to improve the safety of the workers (this was not our idea), we changed the position of the cereal, silverware, and vegetables to offer students three entree lines, (notice the tape on the floor?) the exception is brunch.

The committee is also aware of nutrition conscious students. We have now decided the vegetables will be served without salt and butter!, yogurt at breakfast and also a rotation of the jelly flavors. (If you are alert you may one day notice there was something different out, but we will see if ARA can change their three-year track record of the non-stop serving of grape jelly.)

The committee is also interested in having soup at buffet dinners, biscuits more often at dinner, crepes for breakfast, and here's the big one: maybe getting bagels on other days besides every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday . . . oops, I hope I didn't give away the big ARA secret of when we have bagels.

I hope if any student has something to say about the food or ARA service, they will please contact me. Mary Schraf, Main 241, Box 1191.

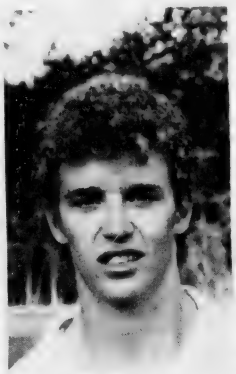
Bordner Leads Golfers In A Week To Remember

Longwood's men's golf team has not had much to crow about since the days of All-American Tim White and the 1982 State Champion squad, but all that changed last week.

In a record-breaking performance by junior Ty Bordner and his teammates, Longwood set a new standard for 36-hole score in the Old Dominion Tournament last Monday and Tuesday and then defeated Randolph-Macon and Liberty University in a three-team match Wednesday afternoon.



Longwood had rounds of 313–299 for a two-day total of 612 at the Hampton Golf and Tennis Club course in Portsmouth Monday and Tuesday. The Lancers ended up tied for fourth with St. Augustine's and turned in the best score ever by a Lancer team for 36 holes.

Bordner led the way with an individual record 71-72-143 which was good for a second place tie out of over 50 golfers. Mike Finney of Newport News won the title with a 67-68-135 and Chowan took the team title with a 285-303-588.

Other team scores were as follows: Newport News 296-297-593, Christopher Newport 304-296-600, Longwood 313-299-612, St. Augustine's 301-311-612, Virginia Wesleyan 303-316-619, Ferrum 319-307-626, Virginia Union 328-325-653, and Hampton 344-342-686.

Also competing for Longwood, in addition to Bordner, were Mike Passarell 80-78-158, Chris Gray 81-75-156. Mark Marshall 81-74-155, Ron Hatch 82-78-160 and Greg Solow 82-83-165.

Longwood had five golfers shoot in the 70's Tuesday and that hasn't happened in three years. The 299 for one round was just two strokes higher than the school record 297 which was recorded in 1982. "We played very well Tuesday," said coach Steve Nelson. "We scrambled well and kept the ball in play."

TY BORDNER

Bordner Named Player Of The Week

Longwood junior Ty Bordner led the men's golf team to its best showing in three years last week and set a school record in the process. For his performance, Bordner has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period September 30 through October 6. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Bordner, back on the team after dropping out of school for a year, shot a record 71-72-143 at the Old Dominion Golf Tournament last Monday and Tuesday and came back to shoot a medalist 73 as Longwood won a tri-match Wednesday in Ashland.

"Ty is certainly playing well right now," said coach Steve Nelson. "He has been an inspiration to his teammates also. They expect him to shoot well and his play has given us more confidence in what we can do as a team."

Currently, Bordner has a stroke average of 75.3 for eight rounds. If he continues to shoot as well this fall and next spring, he might be a contender for a spot in the NCAA Division II Golf Tournament.

In the 1983-84 spring season Bordner had a 79.0 stroke average for the Lancers.

Women's Tennis

A talented Emory & Henry squad dealt Longwood's women netters a 9-0 setback Saturday afternoon, dropping the Lady Lancer record to 1-2 for the fall season.

Longwood visits Randolph-Macon Friday and plays host to Sweet Briar Wednesday, October 16, in its final two matches of the fall season.

Longwood Coach Bill Moore had four freshmen and two sophomores in his top six Saturday.

Catalinas Get New Fish!

By SHERI WILKINSON

Longwood's synchronized swim club would like to welcome Mary Ellen Andrews, Stefanie Clarke, Karen Mayo, Nicole Newsome, Lynn Owens, Renee Robertson, Karen Seldon, Susan Utt, Karen Whitely, Amy Baar and Heidi Greenburg as their new team members. The Catalinas are excited about their new members and they feel they will be an asset to their first performance during Oktoberfest weekend entitled "Water-Works!"

The show will feature water ballet at its best. Each routine is choreographed to popular music by certain members of the team and their coach Sara Bingham.

Last year's show was a splash! Not an empty seat was in the bleachers.

So, come out and cheer on the Catalinas!

Dancers Rehearse

The Longwood Company of Dancers has been rehearsing for 6 weeks in preparation for the Oktoberfest Concert this weekend. The Company will perform 5 dances which progress through the history of dance, showing the variety of styles up to the present. The shows will be on Saturday at 1:30 and 2:15 in Lancer Gym's dance studio, and again on Sunday. The Company's next performances will be November 22, 23 and 24.

Volleyball Team Improves, But Still Needs A Win

Despite tremendous team improvement in both serving and passing, the Longwood volleyball squad dropped four matches last week to fall to 0-11 for the season. This week Longwood visited Ferrum Monday and hosts Sweet Briar and Virginia Union Thursday at 6:00.

Last Wednesday Christopher-Newport beat Longwood 8-15, 17-15, 15-10 after the Lady Lancers had leads of 14-13 and 15-14 in the second game. Host Mary Washington dealt LC a 15-8, 15-7 defeat the same night.

Friday Longwood hosted Gallaudet and Hampton University and came away with two more losses. A hustling Gallaudet team turned back Coach Linda Elliott's charges 15-2, 16-14 and Hampton pinned a 15-7, 15-11 loss on the Lady Lancers.

"We're improving all the time, but the wins won't come until we play more consistently as a team," said Coach Elliot. "Our level of intensity is what's causing us to lose. Instead of playing our own game, we play to the other team's ability. If they play well we do."

Elliott said her team produced a dramatic increase in its number of kills in Wednesday's action. She singled out seniors Holly Hearne and Karen Moye for their play on the front line Wednesday.

"Holly must have put away a dozen kills," said the coach. "That's probably the best she's ever played. Karen also played well and Mary Friga served 100 per cent when she was in there. Sharon Magnuson and Sara Laser were fantastic on defense."

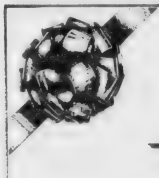
She cited Debbie Turco for her serving off the bench and Dana Shockley for filling in for injured Bobbi Shuler in Friday night's action.

Hockey Team Wins;

Faces Bridgewater Friday

Longwood's field hockey team beat Virginia Tech 8-1 Tuesday and Maryland Baltimore County 2-1 Saturday morning last week to up its season record to 9-2. The Lady Lancers, who visit Bridgewater Friday, have now outscored the opposition 33-8.

Sharon Bruce and Traci Strickland scored first half goals and strong defensive play made the lead stand up in Saturday's victory. Bruce had three goals, Sue Groff four and Cindy Peery one in Tuesday's romp over Virginia Tech.



TRACI STRICKLAND

Groff now has 14 goals, Bruce 11 and Strickland four. Longwood has scored more goals (33) than last year's team scored for the year (32). Coach Finnie's squad still has four games to play.

Claye Conkwright and seniors Tammy Marshall and Lesley Rapoza continue to stand out on defense. Conkwright has 134 interceptions, Marshall 147 and Rapoza 112.

Longwood will scrimmage an Alumni team Saturday morning as part of the Oktoberfest Weekend activities. The contest is slated for 10:00.

Get Horse Happy

By TRICIA O'HANLON

The Lancer, our proudly displayed school emblem, rides his horse on everything from school calendars to the walls of our gymnasium. Joan of Ark also rides a horse as she leads her troops through our collinade beside the Rotunda. As popular and well-loved as horses are, why doesn't anyone know about Longwood's riding team?

Riding is the only college-level sport which enables a student to start as a beginner and compete inter-collegiately. With the different classes of competition ranging from beginner to advanced, riders can compete at the level in which they are best suited.

Located only 12 miles away, the stables are owned by the riding team's Coach Mary Whitlock. Presently, the team consists of 4 returning members and 7 new members. Whitlock, enjoying hier seventh year as coach, led Longwood to Reserve High Point College of the Year honors in 1983-84. Last season Longwood earned 68 ribbons with seven first place ribbons.

If you are an experienced rider or even a beginner, and you are interested in joining the riding team, stop by the Sports Information Office in East Ruffner for more information.

Lady Golfers

Finish Fourth

Longwood's entire team had an off-day Sunday as the Lady Lancer golfers finished fourth out of 13 teams in the rain-shortened Yale University Invitational. Longwood totaled a 346 and finished behind three teams it had beaten easily earlier in the season in the 18-hole event at the Yale Golf Course.

Penn State (332) edged James Madison (332) for the title on the strength of its number five golfer's score. William & Mary (338) was third. The tournament was scheduled for 36 holes, but Saturday's round was rained out.

Longwood scores included: Tammy Lohren 85, Nancy Ryan 86, Marcia Melone 87, Tina Barrett 88 and Leigh Russell 92. Gretchen Pugh, playing as an individual, shot an 84 for LC's best round of the day.

"I can't explain it," said coach Barbara Smith. "We all had an off-day at the same time. The conditions were bad with cold, rainy and windy weather, but that is no excuse. We had beaten the teams that came in ahead of us before."

Yale Invitational scores: Penn State 332, James Madison 332, William & Mary 338, Longwood 346, Methodist 353, Hartford 354, North Carolina Wilmington 365, Mount Holyoke 370, Rutgers 373, Dartmouth 384, Boston College 393, Yale II 452, Yale I 457.

10th Ranked Soccer Team Faces Crucial 3-Game Stretch

After an 8-1 win over Shenandoah Wednesday and a 2-0 loss to nationally ranked Alabama-Huntsville Sunday, Longwood's soccer team will take an 8-2 record into an upcoming 3-game stretch which could make or break the Lancers' season.

In a rematch of last year's state title contest, Longwood will host VISA Eastern Division foe Mary Washington Wednesday at 3:30. While the Lancers are 0-1 in VISA play, the Blue Tide is 1-0 and 7-2-1 overall. Coach Rich Posipanko says his team cannot afford another VISA loss if it hopes to return to the state playoffs for the third time in four years.

Posipanko, whose squad has been hit hard by injuries, felt encouraged after watching his team battle Alabama-Huntsville Sunday. The Lancers visit tough Old Dominion Saturday night and then play at Liberty University next Monday. The Flames were ranked 18th in Division II in last week's poll.

"I felt we played Alabama-Huntsville almost an even game," said the coach. "If we play that way in these next three games we could win all of them. Outside of Virginia and possibly William & Mary a couple of years ago, we haven't played anyone as skilled as Alabama-Huntsville."

Longwood had 14 shots on goal to 17 for the Chargers Sunday afternoon. Goalkeeper Rob Liessem came through with nine saves and backs Erick Karn, Sean McArdle, and Jeff Robinson all played superbly.

Senior Tim Ford was back in action Sunday after being out with a chipped bone in his ankle. Ford has 5 goals and 2 assists, John Kennen 5 goals and 7 assists and Mark Kremen 5 goals and 2 assists to pace Longwood's offense.

Senior co-captain Mark McArdle will likely miss this week's action but could return next week if he gets a good report from the doctor about his fractured arm.

Longwood Student Critically Injured In Accident

By Barrett Baker and Randy Copeland

Heather McCartney, 17, was seriously injured in an auto accident that occurred at the intersection of Oak and High Steets at approximately 2 a.m. Sunday morning.

Miss McCourtney, a Longwood Pre-Business Administration Major from Fairfax, Virginia, was apparently thrown from the back of a brown pick-up truck as it rounded a corner too sharply. She sustained severe head wounds as the result of this fall and is currently listed in critical condition at the MCV Medical Center, according to hospital spokesperson, Phillip Woodson.

Witnesses who arrived on the scene early said that she was bleeding from a gash on her forehead and actually stopped breathing for more than a minute. Jim Balserak, a visiting Pre-Med student from the University of Virginia, took quick action to get her breathing restored by dislodging Miss McCartney's tongue from her throat. According to one Oak Street resident at the scene, Miss McCartney probably would not have made it to the Southside

Longwood Humiliates Hampsters 41-0

By GARTH WENTZEL

On Wednesday, October 9, the Longwood College Men's Rugby Club destroyed the Hampden-Sydney Rugby Club 41-0.

Longwood scored first on a penalty kick by Tim Seymour. Todd Hunt scored the first try of the game on a 30-yard sideline run, 10 minutes into the game. The score stood at Longwood 7, Hampsters 0. Dave Larsen scored a few minutes later to give Longwood a 11-0 lead. This set the pace for the game and Longwood continued to control the ball until halftime. The half ended with the score Longwood 11, Hampsters 0.

In the second half, the Hampsters tried to make a comeback, but there was a breakdown in the Habitrail chain of command and they were forced to play in a defensive mode. This effort to stop Longwood's well coordinated attack failed, and Longwood scored at will. The following people scored trys for Longwood in the second half; Dave Grant 1, Dave Rackley 1, and Philipe Casanave 2. Also adding to the second half deluge were George Miller with one point after attempt and two penalty kicks, and Tim Seymour with one point after attempt.

The final score was Longwood 41, Humpton-Snodney 0. It would have been higher if Longwood had not had quite a few trys called back.

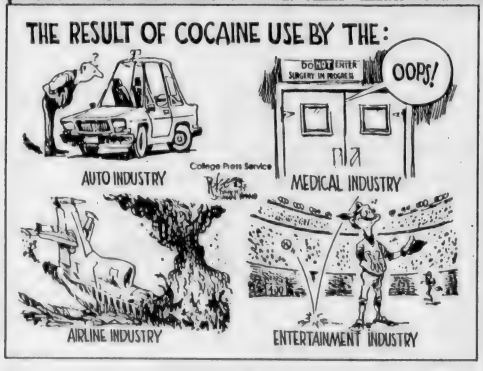
The Hampsters took this loss in the quiet dignity portrayed by many members of their species. (Spoiled Rodentis)

In other action this week, Longwood defeated Lynchburg City Rugby Club 15-4. Longwood scored all of its points in the first half. Philipe Casanave scored the first try and George Miller scored the second try. Tim Seymour kicked one penalty kick and two-point after attempts to top off Longwood's scoring.

Lynchburg city scored a try in the second half, but it was too little, too late. The next match is at Washington and Lee on October 26.

The Rotunda staff would like to wish Omar Fakloury a speedy recovery. Omar broke his leg during Saturday's action and we are all hoping for the best.

Chi Speaks



Longwood, through the years, has seen several secret organizations come and go. The first known of these organizations was the "Mystic Three". They were followed by the "I.M.P.S." in 1909, and the "Black Cats", W.A.N.K.", "FANGS", and "Mu Omega" in 1912. However, by 1930, only ONE secret organization existed at Longwood — CHI — and the ideals of CHI are as strong today as they were 85 years ago!

CHI, established on October 15, 1900, is a secret organization whose essential purpose is to promote and sustain a spirit of cooperation among students in EVERY phase of college life. It is CHI's aim to foster respect for Longwood and loyalty to its academic programs and extracurricualr activities. In fulfilling this aim, CHI hopes to be an organization that commits itself to recognizing the efforts of students, faculty, administration, staff and organizations.

Evidence of CHI's support can be seen through banners appearing at special events, signs on the sidewalks across campus and through latenight "walks". However, the real evidence of CHI can be seen in the hearts and minds of those who seek its real purpose of constructive support and cooperation. One must remember that CHI is not a group of individuals who, for one year, compose its working staff. CHI is an IDEA — never reached — but always reached for. So erase from your mind the personification of the idea, and look instead to your own soul! YOU are the spark . . . YOU are the flame . . . You are the CHI that Longwood respects!

CHI of 1986 encourages ALL students to take full advantage of their academic opportunities as well as their extracurricular opportunities. Support the four aspects of student life — SOCIAL, RECREATIONAL, INTELLECTUAL and SPIRITUAL — by participating and-or supporting intramural activities, athletics, campus organizations, S.G.A., Student Union, religious organizations, academic and departmental organizations (including lectures, programs and seminars) greek organizations, and by upholding the Honor and Judicial codes. College is a time for each individual student to learn more about himself-herself and to experience different aspects of life while learning to live and work with people of all different types. DO NOT LET APATHY RUIN YOUR OPPORTUNITIES! AND REMEMBER . . .CHI IS WATCHING.

THE SPIRIT LIVES . . .
CHI 1986

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

To The Editor:

I never thought that I would be writing a letter in defense of the Editor-in-Chief of this paper. I read Dr. Crowl and Sandra Cross' letter printed in the October 8th Rotunda and felt compelled to reply to it.

I am quite aware that students composed the largest element of the committee. I am also aware that the only voices heard by the administration were those belonging to administrators.

It's very interesting that Dr. Crowl would bring up Mr. Raio's charge that the committee was "bullied and manipulated by 'Soviet-style' tactics." Being the school expert on Russia I'm sure that Dr. Crowl had many helpful hints to offer Comrad Gorski in her crusade. You might have been impressed with her "fairness and concern for the welfare of students", but I am not. I sat through her explanation of the new alcohol policy when I went through the R. A. workshop and I was impressed with her attitude of intense satisfaction at our outrage over these new policies — no drinking games especially. Those in the workshop were not your drunks or rowdies — these were the leaders of our school — our RA's.
our RA's.

I must say what I have thought about these rules since I first heard about them. I think they suck. The laws says that those who are under 19 can't drink. Fine and dandy. It doesn't say you can't play quarters (I wonder how many violators of this rule Comrad Gorski has had the privilege of frying in front of her judicial board — oops — that's another story isn't it) or have parties on Thursday nights. nights.

I think that the main point in Dr. Crowl's and Dr. Cross' letter was that old issue of Barb's "concern for the welfare of students." Please correct me if I'm wrong, but isn't a person considered an adult when they reach 18 years of age. The question I have heard over and over is who the hell does Barb think she is? For that matter, who asked her to be concerned for our welfare? Those whose welfare she is concerned about sure as hell don't appreciate her actions. Those people who "abuse" alcohol do so by their own choice. That is their right as an adult. I personally want to know who died and made Barb all-knowing and who gave her the power to force us to do what she thinks is right. The biggest and most important statement I can direct at Barb is — mind your own damn business — I don't want you in mine. If I had wanted a mother to tell me what to do and not to do I would have brought mine. If I could have one wish it would be that Barb gets married and has some kids of her own so she can stop treating all of us like we were hers.

I also feel compelled to state that while Mr. Raio is glad to have finished his History requirements I have not. I am a History major and have a lot more classes to take in that subject before I graduate. I also would like to say that I will drop dead before I take one of Crowl's classes. I would not take a class from a man who has a poster of Lenin and other Communist propaganda plastered all over his office. I think that Dr. Crowl takes his subject too seriously and that sometimes he forgets where he is — This is America, Doctor, NOT Russia. Maybe you should take Dr. Calahan's Rights and Liberties class next semester — it would obviously do you some good. After completing that class maybe you will have had your head removed from your +!&+.

Sincerely,
J. Andrew O'Connor

Dear Editor:

After three years here I have finally encountered a professor who was born in another country and is trying to teach a subject to me in a language which could at best be called English. It is beyond me why my tuition and tax money goes to pay salaries of several professors I cannot understand.

I feel that if I am paying $6,000 a year for classes, I should at least be able to understand what the professor is saying even if I cannot understand what is being taught.

I know this may be a case of discrimination but I think that if someone is going to teach in America to American English speaking students, they should at least be able to speak the English language properly.

These professors of which I speak are unable to correctly pronounce words and they speak in broken English making everything worse.

Could something be done about this?

Disciplinary Review

Since the beginning of fall semester the following disciplinary cases have been heard by Judicial Board, Honor Board, Residence Education Coordinators and Administrative Hearing Officers. The Rotunda will continue to report this information on a regular basis. This report is intended to notify the college community of actions taken towards individuals involved in inappropriate behavior and therefore, to continue to raise the standards of conduct on our campus.

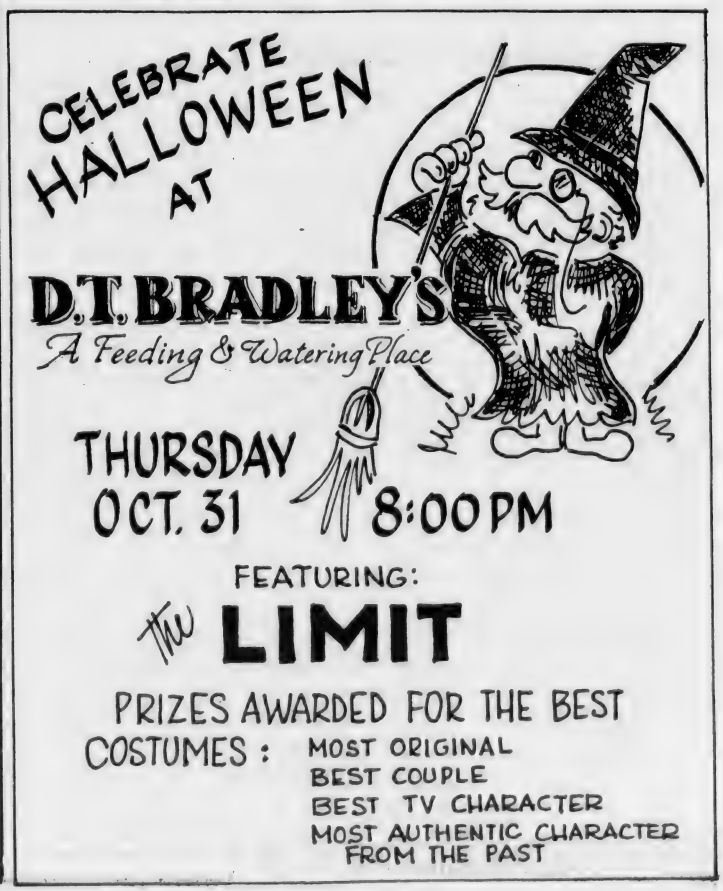
Please Note: Two weeks ago, an investigator from the Pentagon came to check the disciplinary file of a recent graduate who had applied for a job. The alumni had signed a form agreeing to allow us to release his file. The only document his file contained was a case regarding possession of a lounge chair in his room; a situation most of us would believe to be "no big deal". The investigator, upon reading the file, closed it, said, "That's too bad, we really wanted to hire him," and walked away.

Longwood Given Artifacts

Longwood College has received a collection of approximately 5,000 prehistoric Virginia Indian artifacts from an Appomattox County couple.

The gift was presented by Dr. and Mrs. Clyde G. O'Brien. The O'Brien's acquired the collection between 1935 and this year while Dr. O'Brien practiced medicine in Appomattox. The collection contains the full range of prehistoric Indian artifacts which are characteristic of the Piedmont Virginia region.

The O'Briens, who recognized the value of their collection for teaching, research and exhibit purposes, wanted to benefit in the area. During several visits this past summer to the Morris Field Archeological Site, which was being excavated by Longwood's Archeology Field School, Dr. O'Brien first considered letting Longwood manage the collection so that a wider audience could profit from his half-century of acquisitions.



The O'Brien Archeological Collection will be used for teaching and research purposes by students in archeology classes at Longwood. One hundred twenty of the nearly 5,000 artifacts are currently on exhibit on the main floor of Lancaster Library.

Portions of the collection will be placed on exhibit from time to time in the library. The curator of the exhibit is Rebecca Ansell, an anthropology major who spent January through June this year at Hartwick College, in New York, in a special program in museum studies. Martha LeStourgeon, library director, is providing space for the exhibit.

Dr. James Jordan, director of the Archeology Field School and associate professor, will supervise the collection. "This collection is among the largest gathered by a private individual and the benefit which Longwood College students will receive from having these specimens to examine makes the archeology program much stronger," he said.

Caught! Unaware!

Anastasia M. McDonald

I have tried and tried again to sit down and write something relevant to college life and coherent enough for the ordinary college student to understand. I keep coming up zero. Does this mean I'm not a coherent college student, or does it mean I'm not an ordinary one? I'm afraid I have not come up with a succinct definition of an "ordinary college student," but the word "ordinary" really bothers me, actually, it makes me cringe.

At times it is rather consoling to think that one is ordinary — in every sense of the word. If everything about a person is the status quo, there is no fear of rejection or ridicule, merely nice quiet conservatism. The preceding sentence is an ambiguous one. I love ambiguity; it is so abnormal. My contention, therefore, can be read as having no fear of rejection or ridicule because quiet conservatism is a refuge, or the contention can be read as I really intend it: as there being no fear of rejection or ridicule, but there is a fear of quiet conservatism. In my case, this fear has reached the level of petrified horror.

Either this place breeds conservatism or the people who attend this institution are initially conservative. Somehow, it doesn't seem possible or fair that the words "conservative" and "college student" should be uttered consecutively, much less in the same breath. Isn't being conservative one of those things that only adults get? The same goes for being ordinary. You would think that ordinary was the label on the plateau you reach once you run out of individual endeavors. Personally, I don't think you ever "run out" of individual endeavors, but it is possible that you'll get tired of endeavoring along about the age of seventy. But my youth and liberality is showing through with that comment . . . GOOD! RAISE THE CURTAIN!!!!

This place is numb. The Sixties gave rise to the flower children and what are we? None other than the Eighties' "numb" children. Tahdah. Really. What do we have to show for ourselves? On this campus alone, the problem is maddening. Being an English major, the majority of my classes are discussion oriented. Do you know what happens when the professors open the floor to discussion: meaning opinions and thoughts? Ninety-nine percent of the time there is dead silence. Silence. Does this mean that few or none of my fellow collegians has opinions or thoughts to share?? !! Frustration is reaching a boiling point of rage, because not only in the classrooms are people afraid to speak up, but these numb children who are entering their third decades of life are completely oblivious to real happenings in life. AIDS, apartheid, riots, and "star wars," to name only a few, are real issues that college students should at least be aware of vaguely. When someone thinks that AIDS is provisions from the Red Cross or apartheid is a new brand of dog food, something is indeed very, very wrong. Are we afraid we might come across as a halfway intelligent, somewhat sensitive generation if we have thoughts and opinions about the reality of these issues?

Perhaps the attitude I'm trying so desperately to define and understand is apathy. I fear with this, I am back to my original contentions of "ordinariness" and "conservatism." Our little cocoons of the status quo have been wrapped tightly around us, insulating us from the real happenings and issues that give rise to real life. Maybe I am still coming up zero as far as the majority is concerned, but I hope I've at least been revelant and coherent for those who understand what it is I'm trying to drive home.

Nostalgia:

Since the beginning...1920-1985

The following is the second in a series of articles extracted from old Rotunda issues. It is an editorial by Elizabeth Moring that finally tells the secret to survival at Longwood.

Are You A Wreck?

Vol. 3, No. 2, Oct. 12, 1922.

Are you a wreck? Do the cares and burdens of your lessons hang over you? Do your teachers seem unfair in their assignments? Does a spirit of tiredness envelop you?

Most of the girls here in the Normal are weighed down by such burdens. And it is so hard to find a cure for them. Dr. Field and the infirmary will not do. No. Many have tried this and all agree unanimously that no cure is to be found there. All the pills, all the sauce or oil have no effect upon this ailment. You remain a wreck.

But it a serious matter when all the girls of the Normal are wrecks. We must find a cure. The reputation of our school is at stake.

Although I am only a wee little worm I would like to whisper in the ears of the wise ones a cure. It is very simple and if followed closely will produce an immediate effect.

The first trouble arises when the teacher signs those hard lessons. Begin the right way there by grinning your widest and then get to work. There is a consolation in knowing that your burdens are not the hardest. It is a well known fact that those who do the most work are those who complain less and those who go about with long faces are the very laziest ones.

Then at night when your work is done throw open your window and stand there a while. If that does not help there is something wrong with you. The air seems so cool and sweet. It seems to softly caress your cheeks and whisper in your ear promises of renewed strength. The stars twinkle above, seeming so near and yet so far. Then it is that you come closer to God than ever. Somehow we just feel as if we want to pur out a heart of thanks and gratitude to our Maker. He seems so close. Perhaps if we reach out we will touch Him. Worry drops away then as a cloak.

And then in the early morning before assuming the cares of a new day try the same thing. Somehow it is different in the morning. We are refreshed after the night's rest and a new vigor awakens. The air is crisp. It makes you feel as if you must be up and doing. The birds softly twitter. The whole world seems alive and yours for the taking. Before you know it a song arises to your lips and before going down to breakfast you cast that wreck out of the window to a deserving death.

Longwood...A Suitcase College

By SHERI WILKINSON

Have you ever noticed how bare the parking lots are around 2 p.m. on Fridays, how empty the dining hall is for dinner, and how the sound of slamming doors on your hall stop? Could this be because a large majority of students go home on the weekends?

There are many reasons why people go home: (1) Longwood is not necessarily located in an exciting town. If you happen to blink your eyes when riding down Farmville's Main Street you may miss the "whole town." The "whole town," would take only an hour to tour with its five stoplights, four grocery stores, three department stores, and one Movie Theatre with month-old movies.

(2) Longwood's new rules about mixers and parties make all under age students feel like livestock when they have to stand behind roped off areas or be branded on their hands with the letter "X." This results in less people attending mixers and parties. The students who sponsor them lose money which makes them unable to have as many.

(3) Road trips off campus are easy because Longwood lets anyone have a car on campus. Those without cars find it easy to find a ride home with those who have cars. A lot of people live only an hour away which makes it very convenient to go home.

(4) The ratio here is a large factor. There are four girls to every guy so many girls are left out when it comes to dancing partners. Many girls go home to see their boyfriends.

(5) Lots of students go home to work where jobs are easier to find, compared to Farmville. Many people have jobs pertaining to their majors or work for family members. Some work to pay for school, bills, or gas so they can go home every weekend.

(6) Many students go home to get away from it all; there are so many places to go and things to do, Malls, bars, movie theatres with up to date movies and much more. There are many activities that people do when they go home: go to weddings, parties, football games, picnics, etc.

(7) The Lankford Student Union offers little to students who are not obsessed with video games and bowling. Perhaps one day Longwood's nickname "suitcase college" will diminish when there are more reasons for people to stay on campus. Until then, Longwood will be known as a suitcase college.

Dance Company Reviewed

By LEE RICHARDS

The Longwood College Company of Dancers presented their Oktoberfest Dance Scholarship Fund performances this past weekend with the Evolution of Modern Dance.

Featuring the music of Shadowfax, the show opened with a beautiful piece choreographed and performed by Dance Minor and Assistant Dance Company Director, Sherry Massey. The dance, entitled Torch, was based on the dances and costumes of Loie Fuller who pioneered long, flowing costumes that gave the impression of weightlessness, but was not recognized on legacy because she was never formally schooled in dance.

Isadora Duncan was the next stage depicted in the evolution in a dance entitled Autumn and featured Isadorable's Hilary Silvera, and two newcomers to Dance Company, Kim Cecil and Sandi Dovel.

The third piece, Ritual of the Poles, was based on the basic themes and technique of Martha Graham and was depicted as a work in progress by choreographer and Dance Company Director, Nelson Neal. Performed by Margaret Bickerstaff, Tami Bostian, Deb Robbins, Kelly Shannon, and Mary Thompson, the dance bordered on violent featuring the only props used throughout the show.

Contrasts, the fourth piece, has been performed by the Longwood Company previously, and it will probably be seen again later. A somewhat confusing dance, the program handed out at the show notes: "Life is full of contrasts, love-hate, rich-poor, good-bad; so too is dance. In this dance you may see fast and slow, curves and angles, or movers and closet stuff. You will undoubtedly discover some contrasts that were not thought about when the dance was choreographed." If you think that's confusing — you should see the dance!

The final piece, Razz Ma Jazz, was an upbeat dance featuring a really catchey toon by Barry Manilow and performed by Margaret Bickerstaff, Tami Bostian, Kim Cecil, Sandi Dovel, Teri Freeman, Amy Harrell, Deb Robbins, Kelly Shannon, Hilary Silvera, and Dance Company president, Mary Thompson.

Mr. Neal would like to thank everyone who supported this event for helping to raise over $250 for the Dance Scholarship Fund.

Performed by (Hangers) Teri Freeman, Sherry Massey, Kelly Shannon, Hilary Silvera (Runners), Margaret Bickerstaff, Tami Bostian, Deb Robbins, and Mary Thompson.

AMA Meets In Richmond

The Longwood Chapter of the American Marketing Association traveled to Richmond last Tuesday to attend the Richmond Professional Chapter's monthly meeting which is held the second Tuesday of every month from 11:30 - 1:30.

Eight people including Mr. Burt Brooks, the AMA advisor, went to the meeting to view a three part video tape by marketing specialist, Morris Massey and to get a better idea of how the Professional Chapter conducted its meetings.

The videotape, entitled "What We Are Now Is Where We Were When," described why different consumer age groups think and behave the way they do as a result of when they were born and the times in which they grew up. The Longwood AMA is working on getting this tape to show here sometime in the future.

Apart from being the closest Professional Chapter to Longwood College, the Richmond Chapter is considered one of the most successful AMA's in the United States by distinguishing itself three years in a row as the recipient of the "Highest Honors" award for its size category — a feat that has never been accomplished by any other Professional Chapter in the AMA's history.

Being a relatively new club, the Longwood AMA is very interested in boosting membership in order to better reach its organizational goals through student participation. If interested in joining the Longwood AMA, please contact Mr. Burt Brooks in Hiner.

Corrections Internship

By LORI HARRIS

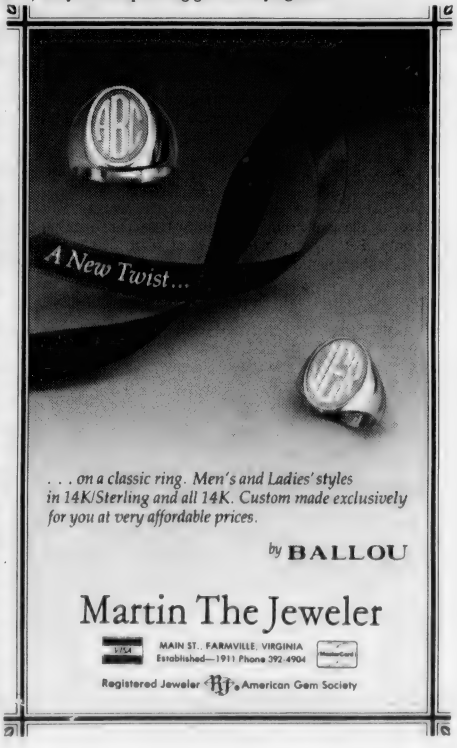
In an effort to develop "hands on" experience for sociology majors with a concentration in criminal justice, Dr. Lawrence G. Hlad of the Sociology Department developed the "Internship In Corrections" program. This program, started last year, allows six to eight junior and senior students to have practical work experience in a prison situation.

Students nominate themselves and are then chosen based on background, interest, and training. Each student spends up to nine hours per week at the Buckingham Correctional Centers. They assist prison counselors as volunteer workers in counseling groups. These groups deal with problems from Alcoholism and drug problems to a program called "MILK" that teaches parenting skills.

The prison is a medium security center, meaning prisoners mingle with guards and other workers rather frequently. This presents a risk factor for the students in this program. They are first asked to sign a release form from the college, as well as every time they enter the prison.

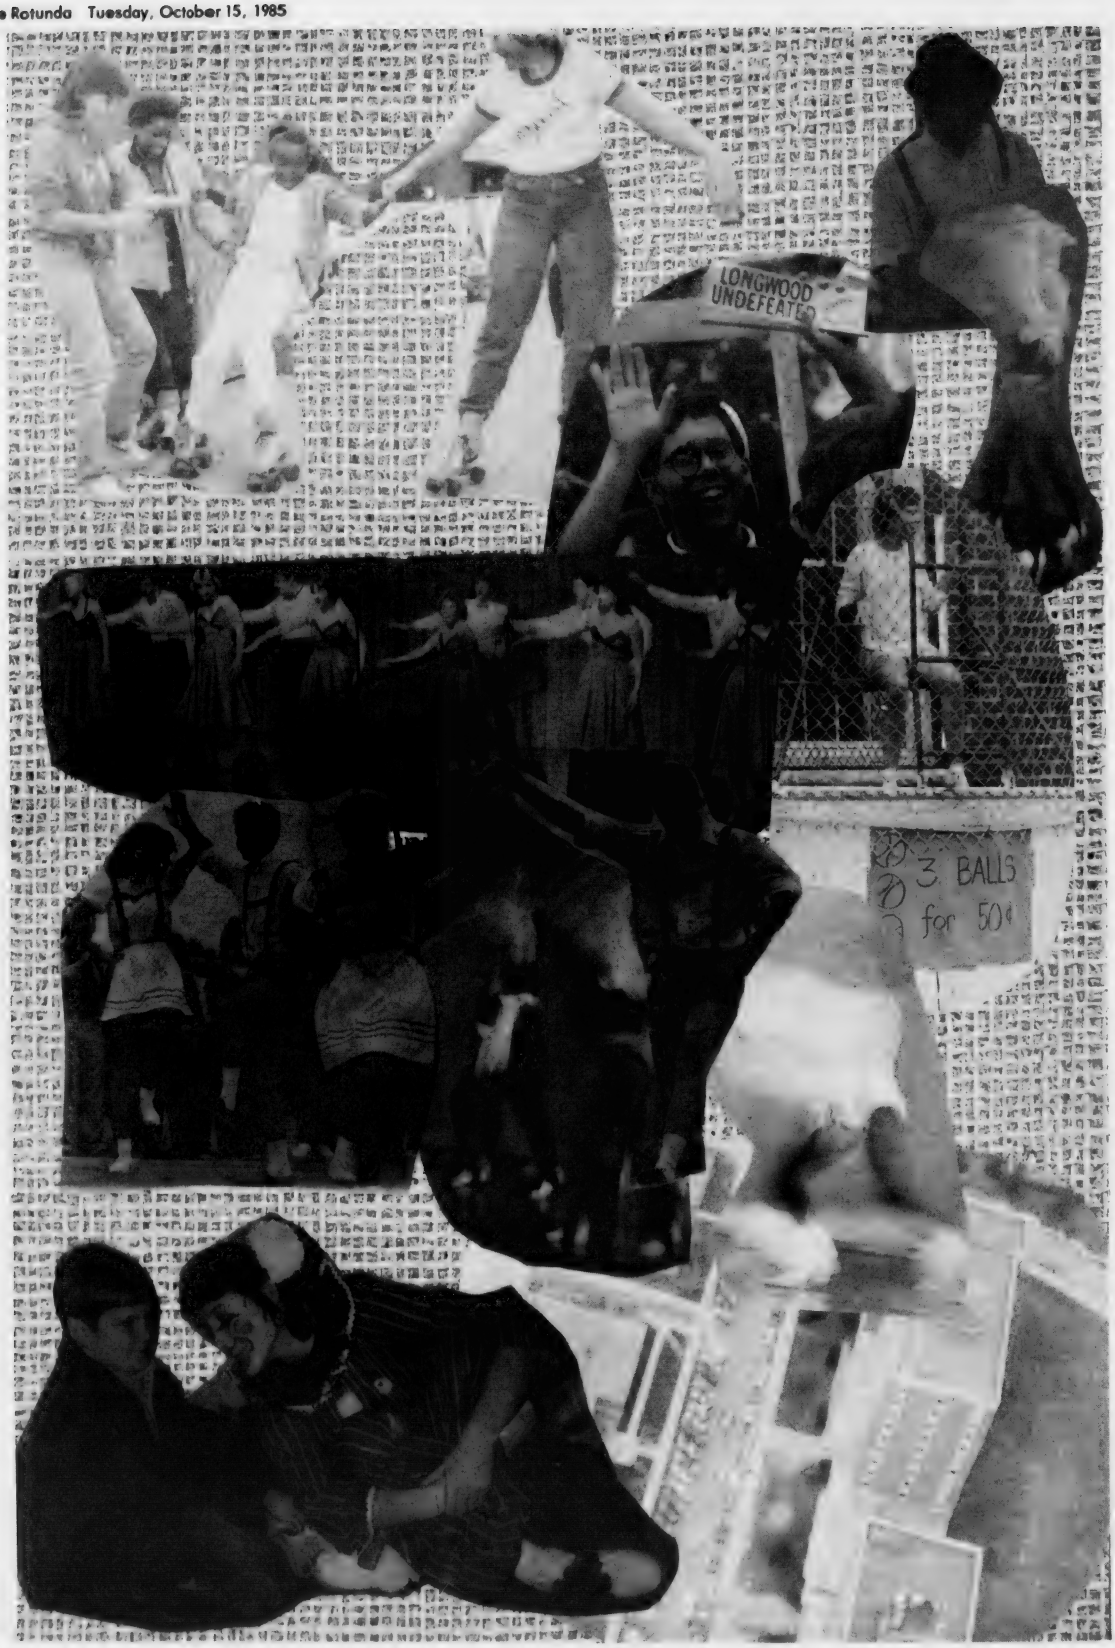
One of these students, Mary Kay Griffith described how she and the others were told to "dress down," not wearing tight or revealing clothing. She also expressed a feeling of culture shock. When she entered Buckingham Correctional Center the first few times she said it was very frightening and inhibiting. They had to sign in so that they could be accounted for in case of an emergency. They then went through a metal detector and then were frisked. After being briefed on what to do in a hostage situation they proceeded into the prison area. The sound of the loud locking doors, the sexual innuendos (at guys as well as girls) were impressions that gave her an uncomfortable feeling about this internship.

Though the experience can be very intense and difficult at times, the students seem eager to continue with the program. Not only does it help in job experience, but students report a great deal of personal growth as well. Three out of the six students in the program last year have applied for jobs at correctional centers. Dr. Hlad hopes to expand this program with involvement in adult probation and parole systems.

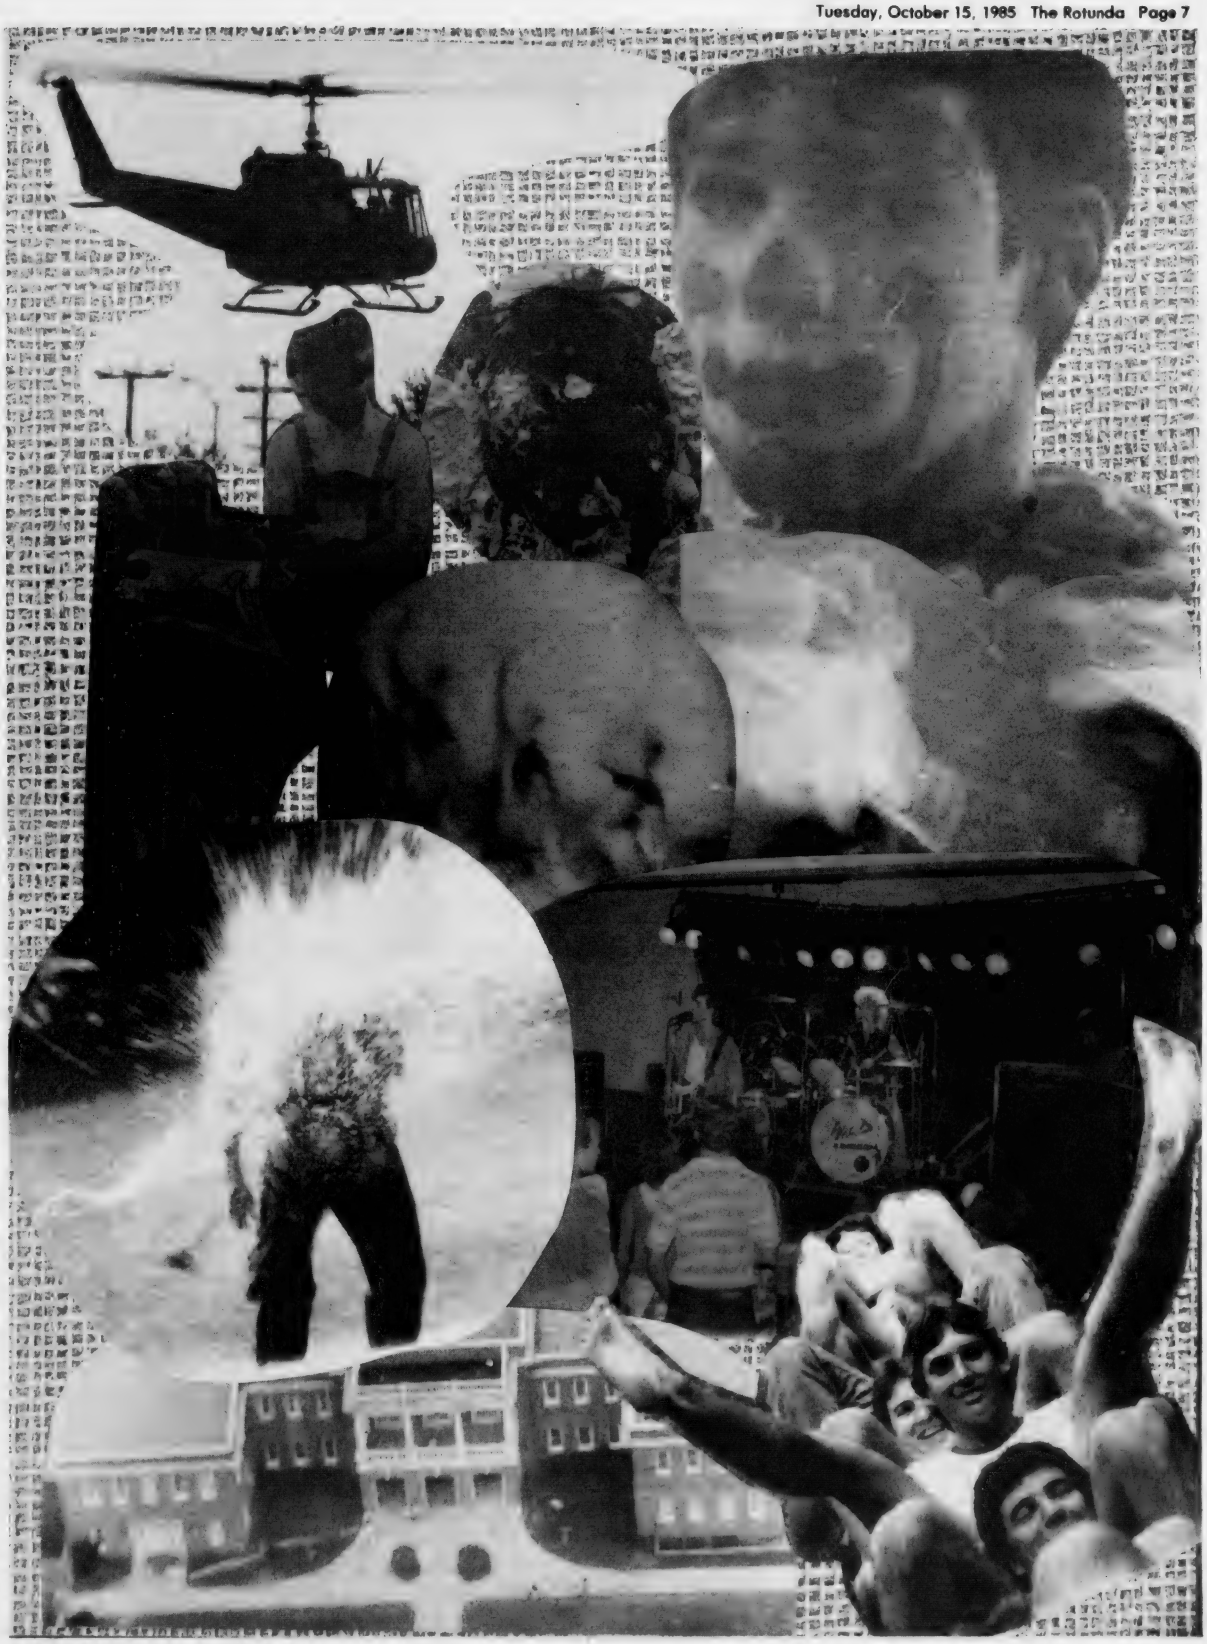


Footnote: Since this article was originally written, the sign-in method at the prison came in handy when Lisa Almond, a student in this program, had to be escorted from the prison when a riot broke out. She was unharmed and clear of the compound before the situation became serious.

Crop Walk



There has been much publicity in recent months about the problem of world hunger. Some of us were fortunate enough to go to the USA for Africa concert, or sent in contributions via MTV, however, the majority has not done much about the situation except to talk about how horrible it is. The Farmville Ministerial Association is sponsoring a CROP walk on Sunday, October 27th. Now is the chance for the college community to help make a difference!



CROP is the name given to local community efforts at hunger education and fund-raising for Church World Service. The Farmville walk will begin at 1 p.m. with registration in front of Jarman Auditorium. After 10 miles, it will end, again in front of Jarman. If you would like to participate, or sponsor a participant, you can contact one of the area churches. The Campus Religious Community will have a booth in the new smoker on October 17th and 18th to answer questions and hand out sponsor envelopes. The object is to get as many people possible to sponsor you so much money for each mile you walk. An interesting bit of information on CROP is that some of the money collected from this walk will stay in the Farmville community to help with hunger needs right in our own neighborhood.

This is an excellent service project for sororities, fraternities, or new pledges (hint, hint) and for all other campus organizations. CROP walks, in my experience, are great to do with friends, strenghten group ties, and make your legs a bit sore, but you end up feeling good inside because you know that you have done something to make this world a better place for others. Like the song says . . . "We are the World . . . let's lend a helping hand!

OKTOBERFEST '85

By T. MICHAEL T. CLEMENTS

The tradition that many apathetic students have called silly and senseless has once again shown brightly this past weekend with Longwood Colleges annual Oktoberfest Dev Giest. The concept of Oktoberfest has been a part of Longwood for many years. It was orginally referred to as a "circus" and served as an alternative for the homecoming which takes place at many other institutions. It now has evolved into a single weekend when the students of Longwood along with the faculty and administration came together to achieve a common goal, with each organization or individual contributing in their own special way.

The word tradition suggests the fact that Oktoberfest is an event which is not forced on anyone, but instead supported and carried out in a very customary way, whether it be the Delta's apple cider or the Bavarian style dress of the ushers and miesters. Among the variety of the past weekend's activities were included a lot of customary events. The first, happening weeks before Oktoberfest weekend, was the Giest topping of ushers, miesters, and of Community Hospital if Balserak had not been there, as the hospital is less than a half mile away from the scene of the accident and the ambulance that finally appeared 10 minutes after notification of the incident.

Upon stabalized condition, Miss McCartney was immediately flown to the MCV Medical Center by a Med-Flight helicopter, where she will remain in intensive care until further notice.

The name of the person driving the truck has not yet been disclosed by the Farmville Police Department, nor have they indicated that any charges will be made.

Med-Flight Helps Save Life

With a cruising speed of 100 m.p.h. and top speed of 125 m.p.h., the Chesterfield-based, Med-Flight helicopter has made it possible for victims of serious accidents to receive treatment in a fully equipped emergency center in a time that is slightly longer than the average ambulance run.

Operated by the Virginia State Police and housed in Fire Station No. 14 in Chesterfield County, the Med-Flight team is made up of two state troopers and trained paramedics from the Medical College of Virginia (MCV) that specialize in handling emergency situations.

Fortunately for accident victim Heather McCartney, Med-Flight made it possible to receive professional treatment at the Medical College of Virginia's Medical Center where she is currently listed in critical condition.

The Rotunda tips its hat to Med-Flight and the people who made it possible and hopes for a speedy recovery for Miss McCartney.

— prepare statistical placement reports

In addition to newsletters, seminars, programs, and individual appointments, the Career Resource Center, which is a joint project of the Counseling Office and the OCPP provides assistance in:

1. Self Assessment — to help you learn more about yourself: your interest, skills, values and goals

2. Career Exploration — general information on occupations, international jobs and employers

3. Academic Options — information on graduate schools, internships, fellowships, and apprenticeships

4. Decision Making-books and handouts to help you with decision making

5. Job Hunting — information on job hunting strategies, resume and letter-writing, interviewing skills, and job vacancies

The Career Resource Center contains written, audiovisual, and computer assisted materials to help you in every phase of your career development. SIGI PLUS is a complete computerized Career Guidance System to help you with the process of making career decisions and plans. SIGI can help you with self assessment, search, information, skills, preparing, coping, deciding and plans to get yourself started. Students need to start utilizing these services. Even freshman and sophomores can benefit early in their college career. Deb Hedrick of OCPP states, "Juniors and seniors think this is only for placement to find jobs, but we want to emphasize the skills of career planning to all Longwood students."

Longwood In Europe '86

Longwood College's Art Department and Office of Continuing Studies are making plans for a six-week, six-credit tour of Europe for the summer of 1986.

The study tour is designed to help the traveler-student learn about and enjoy the great civilizations of Western Europe. The itinerary will include Athens, Rome, Florence, Venice, Paris, Amsterdam, and London, with side trips to Ostia, Siena, Pisa, Chartres, and Canterbury. The tour is open to all Longwood students, alumni, and friends.

Dr. Elisabeth L. Flynn, associate professor of art, will conduct the tour. Enrollment in the program will be limited to 20.

Travel arrangements will be made through Fan Travel, Inc., of Richmond. Cost of the tour will be approximately $2,700 per person, which will include transportation (air and land travel), hotels, two meals per day (continental breakfast and dinner), fees for sightseeing tours, and entrance fees to museums. Longwood tuition for six credit hours will be additional.

Tentative departure date is mid-May, with return in early July.

For additional information on Longwood in Europe 1986, contact Dr. Patricia Lust, Director of Continuing Studies, at 392-9256, or Dr. Flynn at the Art Department, 392-9359.

Lancer Sports

Volleyball Team Ends Losing Streak

Longwood's hard-working volleyball team got some return on its effort Thursday night as the Lady Lancers dispatched visiting Virginia Union 15-10, 15-7, 15-7 for their first win of the season.

Coming up Saturday is the fifth Cindy Smith Memorial Tournament. Longwood will host Christopher-Newport, Methodist, Ferrum, Sweet Briar and Randolph-Macon Woman's College in a round robin tournament which will begin at 8:35 a.m. and end around 5:00 p.m. Each team will play at least five games and the tourney champ will have to play seven.

Longwood played at home Monday against Christopher-Newport and Lynchburg and travels to Radford Thursday to play the Highlanders and Wake Forest.

Coach Linda Elliott hopes her squad will have some new-found confidence after last week's win over Virginia Union

"We had a long team meeting last Wednesday," said the coach, "and I think it helped us get ready. Virginia Union was just as good as some of the teams which had already beaten us, but our play improved tremendously."

Seniors Dana Shockley, Karen Moye and Holly Hearne had 10 kills each in the win.

"We played at our own level and we worked together as a team should," said Elliott.

Longwood, despite its 1-13 record, has been competitive with most of the teams on its schedule.

Women's Tennis Beat RMC

Freshmen Elizabeth Cho and Lisa Pinchbeck teamed up to win the deciding match at No. 3 doubles Friday afternoon as Longwood evened its fall record in women's tennis at 2-2 with a 5-4 victory over Randolph-Macon. Cho also won her match at No. 5 singles to emerge as a double winner in the contest. The Lady Lancer netters close out their fall play this week at home with a match against Sweet Briar Wednesday at 3:30.

Shockley Named Player Of The Week

Senior Dana Shockley played a major role in Longwood's first volleyball win of the season Thursday night and for her performance, Shockley has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period October 7-14. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

A three-year veteran on the Lady Lancer squad, Shockley came up with 10 kills, converted 100 percent of her serves and also passed well in the 15-10, 15-7, 15-7 victory over Virginia Union Thursday night.

"Dana was a real fireball Thursday night," said coach Elliott. "She played her best game of the year."

Shockley, who has been seeing action as reserve, started last Monday against Ferrum and did a good job of setting up her teammates in that contest.

Lancer Golfers Finish Season This Week

Falling on hard times on a tough course, Longwood's men's golf team managed a 10th place finish out of 13 teams in the Ferrum Invitational Tournament last Monday and Tuesday, shooting 345-341-686 in the 36-hole event at Groundhog Mountain, Virginia.

Libersty University tied Wingate College for the team title as both teams wound up with a score of 641.

Longwood finished its season Monday in a six-team match at Chowan. The Lancers will take a 3-1 match record into the action.

Ty Bordner paced the Lancers last week with a 78-85-163. He missed numerous birdie putts in his second round of play.

Also playing for the Lancers were: Ron Hatch 88-83-171, Mike Passarell 90-87-177, Mark Marshall 89-86-175, Lance Reynolds 94-91-185 and Joe Bernat 95-99-194.

"We played horrible," said Coach Nelson. "It is a tough golf course and it ate up some of our younger golfers. We don't seem to play very well on the tough courses."

Hockey Team Faces Tough Opponents This Week

Longwood's high-scoring field hockey team faces a couple of tough foes this week with a visit to Radford Tuesday and a home contest with Virginia Commonwealth Thursday at 4:00. The Lady Lancers who have a 10-2 mark currently.

Last Friday the Lady Lancers dispatched Bridgewater 5-0 behind three goals from Sue Groff and two from Traci Strickland. Strickland added an assist as did Sharon Bruce and Diane Bingler.

Coach Sue Finnie picked Strickland as offensive player of the game and Bingler, who had 12 interceptions and one defensive save, as defensive player of the game.

Longwood has now scored 38 goals this season, more than any Longwood team since the 1980 squad knocked in 43. The Lady Lancers are averaging 3.2 goals per game while giving up just 0.7.

From here on out, however, there is nothing but Division I opposition ahead. Tuesday's foe Radford beat LC September 28 on the astro-turf at James Madison by a 2-0 score.

"We have three of our most difficult games coming up, but we have the potential to beat these teams," said Finnie. "We had twice as many shots as Radford when they beat us. If we could win two of the three games we would be doing very well."

Groff's goal total is up to 17 for the year and the second leading scorer in Longwood history now has 45 career goals. While Bruce, LC's fifth best scorer with 26, has 11 goals in 1985, Strickland has five goals for the year.

Saturday, Longwood fell to an Alumni team 1-0 behind a goal from Rala Heinen, who played on last year's squad.

Groff Is Raging

By TIM FITZGERALD

Sue Groff has just etched her name into the Longwood College record book by becoming the second leading scorer in the history of Longwood field hockey. Amazingly enough, field hockey is not even her best sport.

Groff, a senior, scored career goals number 35, 36 and 37 on September 20-21, in two games at Appalachian State. She has now passed Julie Dayton (34 goals) and Carol Filo (35 goals) to move into second place on the career scoring list. Number one is Terry Voit who scored an eye-popping 93 goals from 1974-1977.

It goes without saying that Groff, a graduate of East High School, in Glen Mills, PA, is a standout in field hockey. Her accomplishments in lacrosse, however, are even more impressive. As the dominant force for the Lady Lancer lacrosse team over the past three years, she has set new records for most goals in a career (128), most goals in a season (50) and she has been selected as the team MVP all three years. Also, for her versatility and overall athletic ability, she was chosen Longwood Freshman Female Athelte of the Year in 1983.

"I came to Longwood," said Groff, "because it is a small school. It has the curriculum that I want, and I was offered a field hockey scholarship."

Groff is living proof that playing for a small southern Virginia school is not a handicap. She has gained national recognition in more ways than one. Along with being a two time All-American in lacrosse, she has also been invited to the United States Women's Lacrosse Association National Trials in each of her three years at Longwood.

Groff's improvement at the trials has been consistent. As a freshman she was selected as an alternate for the South VI squad. She moved up to the South III squad as a sophomore. Her improvement continued last year as she was named to the South II squad.

SUE GROFF

"Being named to the South II squad and being selected as an All-American twice are the biggest honors of my career so far," said Groff.

While Groff has climed high on the ladder of success, there are still a few rungs that she wants to reach.

"I want to make All-American in lacrosse again. But my ultimate goal, the one that I am striving for the most, is to make the U.S. lacrosse team."

With such lofty goals she cannot afford to rest on her laurels. According to new field hockey and lacrosse coach Sue Finnie, this will not be a problem.

"What makes Sue excel is her attitude. She is a very hard worker, and she is extremely coachable. She is not only very conscientious about her practice, but she also thrives on what ever it takes to improve her game."

Groff's hard work has already paid off in field hockey. In scoring 17 goals, she has helped lead the team to a 10-2 record and the best start since 1974.

Is burnout a problem for the two sport standout?

"It is usually not a problem for me," said Groff. Sometimes by the end of lacrosse in the spring I feel a little burned out. But by the time I come back to school I'm ready to go."

Since Groff is focusing her attention on making the national lacrosse team, it is not surprising that on her list lacrosse ranks ahead of hockey.

"I like lacrosse more because for me, individually, it is not as hard as hockey. On the other hand, with the amount of new players on our lacrosse team, lacrosse is harder from a team aspect. Overall, I guess they balance out and compliment each other. Playing field hockey helps my lacrosse game, and playing lacrosse helps my hockey game."

Even though she has achieved a lot on the national level, Groff is still proud of the feats that she has accomplished at Longwood.

"The records and honors that I have at Longwood are very important to me. They really do mean a lot."

In the midst of the field hockey season, with Groff averaging over one goal per game, she is steadily increasing her lead over the third and fourth place scorers. While it may be impossible for her to pass top scorer Terry Voit, if she keeps up her current pace, it may be a while before anyone can surpass her goal total.

Let's also not forget what she has planned for the spring. In the words of Coach Finnie, "I've seen her play field hockey, and I can't wait to see her play lacrosse."

S.A.T. Scores Rise Again

By JIM SCHWARTZ

This year's college freshmen pushed the average Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) score up faster than any year since 1963, the College Board announced.

While board officials, who oversee the administering of the test nationwide, attribute the increases to more scholarly high school students and harder high school courses, some critics think it's because more students are taking SAT coaching classes.

Whatever the reasons, the average verbal test score was 431, up from 426 last year. The average math score was 475, an increase from 471 a year ago.

"1985 is the fourth consecutive year in which at least one of the scores went up," says George H. Hanford, president of the College Board.

All ethnic groups and both men and women recorded higher average scores, Hanford points out.

"All of these trends would seem to indicate that there is a more positive attitude toward academic pursuits in our high schools and that many efforts at the local, state and national levels over the past decade to improve the education of college-bound students have begun to bear fruit," Hanford asserts.

He adds more high school students have been taking honors courses in recent years.

While the trend is encouraging, Hanford says "it is also clear that we have no grounds for being complacent about the state of education in this country. We still have a long way to go."

Hanford adds the approximately one million college freshmen who took the SAT made up only 37 percent of the students in the high school class of 1985.

Others don't credit school reform for the increases, however.

Average scores rose primarily because more students are taking SAT tutoring courses, claims Allan Nairn, co-author of a 1980 critique of the test.

"Some people benefit from the coaching privilege," he says, implying students who can afford to take coaching courses have an advantage over those who can't.

Various studies, all of them disputed by the College Board and the Educational Testing Service (ETS), which actually writes the SATs and computes the scores, assert prepatory courses can improve students' scores by as much as 100 points.

As a result, "coaching is a growing industry," says David White, who has written two books about how to take college admissions tests.

"At the moment, I'm going through the Graduate Record Exam with a student," White said during a phone interview, "and we are getting the right answers without even reading the passages."

White says coaching courses teach students how to recognize patterns to questions, thus enhancing their chances of choosing the correct answers.

Thanks to the Truth In Testing Act, passed in 1980, ETS has to make old standardized tests available to those who request them.

"That helps coaching," notes David Owen, author of "None Of The Above," another critic of the SAT.

But Hanford disputes the coaching industry's claims.

"In the states where there has been a lot of coaching, the increases in scores have been smaller," he claims.

Hanford himself is more upset by the declining numbers of black students taking the SAT. "In 1985, 8.9 percent of our test-takers were black, compared to 9.1 percent in 1984."

"It is certainly reassuring to see that blacks are scoring higher on the SAT, but it is disheartening to realize that fewer of them appear to be considering going to college," Hanford says.

College Students Lonely

LINCOLN, NE (CPS) — College students, particularly entering freshmen, are more lonely than virtually all other social groups except single parents, alcoholics and some high school students, according to a researcher at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

"We have been very surprised to learn that college students are one of the more lonely groups of people we've surveyed over the years," says John Woodward, UNL professor of human development, who has given his loneliness test to thousands of people — including over 400 students — over the past 20 years.

After asking respondents how they feel and behave in specific social situations, Woodward rates them on what he calls his "loneliness index."

"Ironically, what we have found is that high school and college students — who you would expect to be the least lonely of all people — rate very high on the loneliness index, while the elderly — who you would expect to feel lonely — are the lowest group on the loneliness index," he reports.

The only people lonelier than entering freshmen, he says, are alcoholics, single parents, rural high school students and female, inner-city high schoolers.

"We believe that students are lonely for a good many reasons," Woodward explains. "Most of them have been uprooted from their family support systems, their life-long friends, and are searching to establish a new support system in a strange place among strange people."

In addition, he says, "college students are in a period when they have to make new decisions about all sorts of things — committing themselves to college, building a philosophy of life, setting rules for moral behavior, what classes they will take — and decision-making is a very lonely process."

"College is indeed a time of shaping and building for students," agrees Thomas Cummings, a counseling education specialist at Arizona State University.

"You can be in the middle of New York City and still be lonelier than if you were in Muncie, Indiana," he notes. "And a student in the midst of a new campus can be surrounded by people all day, and still feel lonely because of the changes and decisions they have to make."

Loneliness, says UNL's Woodward, "is a very normal human condition, but it becomes a problem when it interferes with someone's ability to function."

For instance, unusually lonely students often can't study well, isolate themselves from social activities, and become depressed and withdrawn.

"But something as simple as a phone call home, joining a club or organization, or going to church can help students establish the new relationships and gain the self confidence they need to overcome their loneliness," Woodward says.

Freeze Hairball! — U. Miami police last week arrested "Mr. Mayonnaise," a local street comedian, for eating his lunch while standing on his head in front of the student union, and then putting lighted cigarettes in his ears.

Time Capsule a Dud — Expecting to find a "sealed contribution by E. A. Selkirk, Esq., of Boulder," about 200 Colorado U administrators last week opened a time capsule buried for 100 years in a campus building cornerstone.

They found an assortment of papers and $1.10 in coins.

Student Hostages could prevent Nuclear War, according to a Chicago physician who suggested in the Journal of the American Medical Association that the two superpowers exchange 250,000 college students, selected by lottery, to serve as "hostages" against nuclear attack. The doctor says Americans have a "near-bankrupt" store of ideas for approaching the Soviets on nuclear issues.

'What we got here is failure to communicate' — State Representative Barbara Pringle introduced a bill in the Ohio legislature requiring state college and university professors to be comprehensible in English to their students when her daughter compalined foreign-born teachers at Ohio State and Kent State were hard to understand.

Gallup Poll records American Education Attitudes — The poll found 91 percent of 1,528 Americans this year considered higher education "very important" or "fairly important."

Only seven percent said a college education was "not too important." Two percent had no comment.

Around The Nation

Jean are hotter than ever with American college students this year, according to clothing retailers. Although jeans have long been the favored apparel of students, retailers say the - ''working-class look'' popularized by rock stars Bruce Springsteen and Madonna has produced a boom in denim sales.

The 21 drinking age is dead in Wisconsin. The governor, and the leaders of the Democratically controlled state assembly and senate have come out against raising the age.

Sorry dude! Sigma Phi Epsilon members claim they didn't know the stray pig in their yard belonged to neighbor Albert Warren, so they killed it and ate it.

Warren spied the dead pig hanging from a tree in the frat house yard, and complained to A and M official who said the off-campus incident was not under university control.

Meanwhile, frat members, who paid Warren $50 for the pig, say they want to improve relations with Warren and with their other rural neighbors who complain about loud, disorderly parties at the Sig Ep house.

"We didn't kill the pig for fun," explains fraternity spokesman James Saxon. "We wanted to eat it. I know this was not right, and we apologized for doing it."

Don't let your kids grow up to be Teachers — According to a recent poll by the Educational Research Service, 51 percent of teachers nationwide say they would hesitate before recommending a teaching career to a student and 22 percent say they would advise against entering the profession.

A sex study by an Ohio State U. professor has found that 50 percent of college females, and about 80 percent of college males, engage in premarital sex. Of the sexually active, over a third claim one sexual partner, 20 percent claim three or more, and 11 percent more than 5.

Brother Jed assaulted at Illinois State — Traveling campus evangelist Jed Smock, who during outdoor "sermons" regularly tries to provoke students by calling them "sinners" and "whores," was physically pushed around by an unidentified ISU habitue last week, but declined to press charges.

"Only a wimp would attack a preacher who he knows must turn the other cheek," Smock told the ISU Daily Vidette.

Stanford probes cheating in cheating expert's classes — The university's "largest single Honor Code investigation" ever is probing 23 students who allegedly cheated on an introductory psych final last spring.

The 774-student class was taught by Prof. Philip Zimbardo, who has done nationally-recognized research into why people cheat.

Students boost wreckers' business by an estimated 20-50 percent when they return to campus each fall, according to U. of Kansas area towers. The increase in service calls is mainly the result of illegally parked cars, most probably due to a lack of spaces and the fact that many students are inexperienced drivers in strange surroundings.

The Hottest Acts on campus are stand-up comedians: Soviet-born Yakov Smirnoff, former "Saturday Night Live" writer Andy Andrews, and comic-hypnotist Tom DeLuca place first, second and third as this year's most-booked acts on the college circuit. The average cost is $1,500 a show, plus expenses.

In search of a nicer vice, Syracuse U. fraternities are turning to sex to attract pledges now that the university has imposed a dry rush rule. This fall, Beta Theta Pi hired a stripper for rush entertainment. Alpha Tau Omega sponsored a night of jello wrestling and Sigma Alpha Mu held a "corn and pron" night. As one fraternity member put it: "We wanted to appeal to the only other interest on 18-22 year-old males' minds besides beer."

Contest Attracts Crowd

One of the biggest crowds ever, over one hundred strong, drank, laughed and listened to the music at the Lancer Cafe Wednesday night. More populous than a keg crowd, more entertained than by a rock band, louder applauding than even the music; these people were here to watch fellow Longwood students perform.

The occasion was the first Wednesday Night Talent Contest of the semester. Four extremely talented students performed, and the crowd loved them. Leading off was Kukrit Pantoomano, performing an original song with his own accompaniment, followed by Renee Martin singing a Diana Ross song. Darrell Janezic then played guitar and sang a number of popular songs. The final contest performance was an original comedy routine of George Carlin-Eddie Murphy flavor by Stanley Isaac. Isaac narrowly edged out Janezic in the applause based award: twenty-five dollars and a chance at the final $200 contest prize at the end of the year. After the contest, Janezic and others remained to entertain with various songs, among them an excellent rendition of "Stairway to Heaven."

The event, which will be held very Wednesday at 9 p.m. in the Lancer Cafe, was emceed by John Pastino.

course, those fun loving clowns. After hours of practice and preparation are completed the weekend is ready to begin.

This year it began at four o'clock on Friday afternoon, when students full of energy and spirit participated in the annual Red and Green color rush games. These games for the most part required very little physical aptitude, but instead a lot of cohesion and group effort. After almost total domination by the Red-n-Whites in the games, attention then turned to that messy paint battle that, for some reason, everyone loves. In this event the table quickly turned, due to extraordinary turnout of Green-n-White freshmen the more timid Sophomores were punished. Approximately two hours and fifty bars of soap later, a combination of Reds and Greens performed a skit, written by Kim Evoy, in Lancer Cafe. After this fine exhibition of talent there was a pre-mixer mixer in Lankford to help get everyone primed for the packed lower dining hall.

After very few hours of sleep most of the campus was awakended by the desention of a helicopter brought in by the Army R.O.T.C. for the occasion. Although this was far from being the first activity of the morning, because many students had already been busy decorating booths and preparing for visiting alumni, parents, and prospective students.

As the day progressed the Oktoberfest parade, which for the first time was lead by an excellent Army band. Of the entries to the parade by Longwood organizations — Delta Sigma Phi was first, the Gymnastics team second, and Phi Beta Sigma was third. Immediately after the parade the ushers danced for a rhymic crowd, we heard a few words from Giestmiester, Jim Steve and Mittersmiester Jimmy Long, and the Midway was opened. Midway, as always was full of people and interesting booths, four of which were class booths that were judged as part of Red and Green competition. The results were freshmen first, Seniors second, Sophomores third and Juniors fourth. This clearly put the Red-n-Whites on top, leaving them holding the coveted Oktoberfest Cup, which had traditionally always been held by them up until a slight lapse in spirit during Oktoberfest 1984. After a long day, the college once again gathered for the annual Iler Field Outdoor Mixer sponsored by Giest.

Oktoberfest 1985 will be one to remember, so whenever in the future may you see a picture of that old German miester with no hands may you raise a beer and say "Cheers to Oktoberfest."

Apartheid?

Apartheid, Apartheid,
It is a crime against humanity
It shames the very dignity of man.

Apartheid, Apartheid,
A racist policy that gives the white minority
The right to rule the land.

They hang, they shoot
They persecute
But the judgement day
My people say

No peace on the continent they'll be
There can be no peace
Until South Africa is free.

A Calypso Song from—
The Mighty Duke from South

By BRUCE SOUZA

The above lyrics probably express the way a great many people feel towards the institution of apartheid. Apartheid, with the exception of the upcoming summit between the U.S. and U.S.S.R. in Geneva, is an issue which has dominated the world press for the last three months. With this in mind The Rotunda gave the Longwood College student body a chance to express its views on apartheid and on the state of affairs in South Africa.

The students who participated were chosen at random going about their daily activities on campus. Using the survey method and a tape recorder to collect data, The Rotunda coaxed 225 students into participating. The first step was to identify the problem, students were simply asked whether they could explain or define apartheid. This should have been an easy question, considering we have been subjected to a media blitz concerning apartheid.

The problems in South Africa have been covered extensively by the press and by televison news in the last three months. We have seen whites killing blacks, blacks killing and burning other blacks, and now a new phenomena of blacks starting to attack whites. We have seen the Reagan administration walk the tightrope on this issue. Yet out of the 225 students that were asked to identify apartheid 65 percent could not do so. One of the standard responses with "Ap wah?" Among other things we were informed that apartheid was something to do with archaeology, needy people, insects, and that it was part of a radio, and was a treaty between the U.S. and Africa.

The remaining people who showed some semblance of knowledge concerning the situation were asked a series of follow up questions. Students were subsequently asked if they foresaw the black majority overthrowing the white ruling minority? Forty-two percent believed that an overthrow would occur; 36 percent thought that the present regime would be able to ride out the current political turmoil, and 21 percent didn't know. Those who thought that there would be a change of power from whites to blacks were asked if the transition would be by peaceful means or by a bloody revolution. Most Longwood students (53 percent) believed that a violent revolution was inevitable, while 28 percent believed that a diplomatic solution could avoid bloodshed. Nineteen percent didn't know.

While other schools are organizing protests against apartheid and are urging everything from sanctions to divesture we here at the Wood remain largely uninformed. Out of all the people surveyed only two people mentioned sanctions, one person mentioned divesture, and one remarked about Botha. Strangely enough, black students surveyed didn't seem any more informed than anybody else. The black students who were informed raised questions concerning black political unity.

One student compared the Afrikaners' apartheid policy as being analagous to the British when they ruled in India. This is an erroneous assumption since the British had a homeland to return to. The Afrikaners, on the other hand, consider themselves indigenous to South Africa. They have ruled the country since the 1650's, and consider themselves as the reason that South Africa is the wealthiest countrv ont he continent. Perhaps, if they had wiped out the blacks like we destroyed the American Indians a hundred years ago the situation today would be different.

After World War II the European powers couldn't afford their African colonies, and gradually decolonization occurred for almost all African states. Freedom was given to the African States with hopes of them emulating western political traditions.

Europe and the U.S. to this day are still trying to foster democratic traditions in societies which remain largely tribal. The Europeans divided Africa not on the natives' terms, but in their own selfish economic interests. When these countries were given freedom, instead of turning into fledgling democracies the exact opposite happened. Civil wars, tribal conflicts, despots and demogoguery were even more common than the envisioned democratic Africa. This is largely the way Africa remains today.

South Africa is in terms of nation in Africa. The U.S. needs their mineral wealth, they need their mineral wealth, they need our weapons. South Africa is the class of the sub-continent, militarily. They have, until recently, been a stable government in an unstable part of the world. The recent political turmoil has hastened western nations to step up pressure of the South African government to make political concessions to the overwhelming black majority. political equality, but for the Afrikaners to grant this would be Afrikaners to grant this would be to cut their own throats. Prime Minister Botha continually states "he encourages a dialogue with black leaders" but he will never grant them what they ultimately want. The concessions now offered are simply the trimmings; the blacks want the cake.

South Afirca is in a time warp. Their society and their doctrine of apartheid is nothing more than legalized segregation and slavery. They have remained unchanged in a changing world, which now wants to suddenly conform them. The U.S. is politically stuck in the middle of this dilemma. The U.S. is politically interested in South African stability for ideological and economic reasons. A timely insurrection or long-term civil war will destroy American assets and interrupt the South African economy.

The Reagan administration has flip-flopped on this issue trying not to anger western allies or South Africa. The lowdown is that we will still buy their gold, and still sell them weapons. amidst talk of sanctions and-or divesture. Even as the grassroots movement continues to grow against apartheid; you won't hear Reagan condemning South Africa. We'll do business with whoever gets control of South Africa; there is no doubt about that. However, if a violent overthrow does occur, it will be largely done with Soviet made weaponry, and once the blacks get in control, they will owe the Soviets at least political friendship. So, for U.S. interests a peaceful solution remains our best bet to go politically and economically unscathed concerning South Africa.

Even if it were as easy as to simply endow the black majority with all the political power, who's to say there would be peace, or even stability. One must simply look at Ethiopia, Mozambique, Angola, and Zimbabwe to know better. Certainly, some black South Africans would gain significantly, but chances are most would remain dirt poor.

Some political solutions include suggestions of a type of multi-racial government This is ridiculous! These people are fighting over the pie, not portions of it. Unfortunately, this situation will culminate in a violent revolution. Not for awhile yet, because the A.N.C. does not have the men or weaponry to challenge the South African Army. South Africa which spends three billion annually on defense is still easily in control of South Africa, and militarily superior to all surrounding Black African countries. Sit tight. It's still going to be awhile before Tutu, Tambo, Buthelezi, Mandela get to squabble over South Africa, and who gets what.

Broadsides Now In Progress

By MELANIE COVINGTON

The dates for the publication of Broadsides have been announced. They are as follows:

1) November 25th (Publication for December 9th)

2) February 20th (Publication for March 3rd)

3) April 18th (Publication for April 28th)

Broadsides is a collection of Longwood students literary work. Everyone is invited and encouraged to submit their work for Broadsides. This invitation is not for English majors alone, it is for students of all levels and all disciplines.

The staff needs short essays (500-600 words), poetry, or any other written work that you have done. Maybe there's something you wrote when you were in high school, even an essay for an exam. Broadsides is definitely not just creative writing only.

Broadsides had a very prosperous first year. Please help it to have an even better second year. If you have any questions or submissions please contract: Craig Challender, David James, or Bill Woods.

"What are you all gonna do today?"

"Play video games and study."

"Cal and I are planning on experimenting with various combinations of drugs and alcohol."

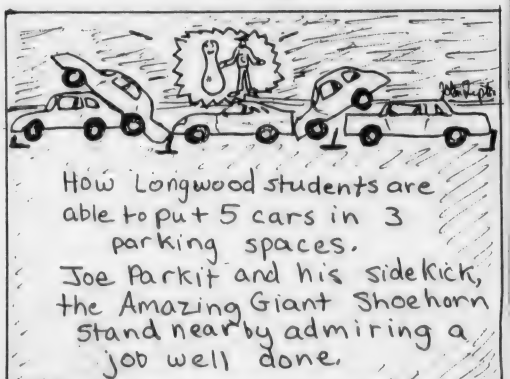
"You guys are a bunch of wheezing maggots. Why don't you do something fun for once? Benji and I are gonna bring our trash cans up to the 9th floor and hurl the contents out of the window piece by piece. Come with us and be somebody."

Sounds like a scene from a low-budget teenage sex comedy, huh? Wrong again, turkey-lip. The people who carry on similar conversations and hurl deadly projectiles from high-rise windows have filled out applications for admission (please include a recent photo) to good old Longwood. Now they are in our classrooms, across from us at meals, and high, high above our heads. Each is armed and dangerous, capable and apparently willing to take a life.

Everyday crap flies out of the windows of Curry and Frazier. Paper airplanes and saliva mostly, but without fail, some bonehead weasel will toss something that could hospitalize the target and imprison the marksman. This semester, the following items have fallen from the high rises with bone-crushing force: hundreds of bottles and cans, water balloons (one with a stone inside), pumpkins, ARA "mini-glasses", shoes, plates, books, light bulbs, watermelons, clocks, chairs, eating utensils, a bed, and yes, a television set. I mean, I get mad when the Redskins lose too, but we need to set our priorities.

I asked pledge Sean "Skip" Gorenflo to calculate the miles per hour of these things (more Sig Ep hazing, you say?) in order to discourage the parade of these bombs. Apparently height is the key and anything thrown from a height of 110 feet will hit the ground at a speed of around 63 miles per hour (wind resistence is a major factor, far too complicated to go from my ear to my pen, but suffice it to say that paper and like stuff fall safely and only make the place look like a slum). The weight of the object determines the force of impact. This explanation similarly went over my head and Gorenflo spoon-feeds us with an analogy: a small beer bottle, launched from one of the top floors would have an impact-force greater than that of a (young) Tom Seaver fast ball. I've never faced Tom Terrific but I've seen facial bones shattered in Junior Varsity high school games.

Early in the semester, a few cute young enterprisers were tossing small water balloons out of a window. The objects were hitting dry ground leaving craters and shooting mud all over cars over 10 yards away.



This weekend, a young female student was one step away from an ARA glass that had fallen from the sky. A murder charge would not be out of the question for the bullet-head who pulled that stunt. "Longwood Student faces Farmville judge for murder rap." Boy, that would keep the toilets off the Rotunda front page. I'd personally handle that interview, ya bum ya.

If you could find one of those valuable (due to rareness), unorganized, confusing student handbooks that we have all heard so much about, it would tell you that every student is responsible for whatever goes on in (or comes falling out of) their own room. Your boisterous playmate is setting you up for the big hit when he uses your room as Cape Kennedy. And hey, it's the end of October and judicial board is nearly trained and almost ready to make an example out of you for next year's freshmen bombadiers. Anyone busted for this act may well end up at some obscure community college next semester and if you think the food is bad here wait till you taste the mystery meat at one of those two-year training grounds.

The highly dangerous habit of using windows as a trash shoot is a recognized problem at Longwood College. If we do not stop ourselves, the administration will give us a not so tender hand. Paid window-watchers, permanently locked windows, and camera surveillance have been suggested. Who knows what that wild and crazy beauracracy will come up with to help us protect ourselves?

If you must throw something out that window, throw yourselves. Be sure to call the Rotunda first so we can have cameras present. Oh, and make sure nobody is under your window, 'cause you'll be falling at 63 m.p.h. and you could hurt somebody.

Letters To The Editor

Mr. Raio:

I read with sympathy your comments about the effect of apathy on your newspaper. I have been chairman of enough committees and editor of enough publications to understand that most things are done by the impassioned few who cannot bear to see left undone those things which ought to be done. However, on the issue of apathy itself, I would propose to you and to your readers a different perspective. In the sixties (my generation) apathy came to be defined as anything which fell short of fanaticism. It did not matter particularly what a person was fanatical about, as long as there was some issue which prevented peaceful slumber on a regular basis. Fortunately (I think), college students no longer consider locking the dean in his office to be a part of the advanced curriculum. It is no longer necessary to orate about social injustice to spontaneous forums of eager listeners on convenient grassy corners. And, indeed, if one expects a frenetic, impassioned approach to writing newspaper articles or changing the honor system or getting out of bed in the morning, it is true that, with this generation of young people, one will be disappointed.

However, I would like to point out (fanatically, of course) that there are other ways in which to be non-apathetic. I wish very sincerely that the students at Longwood would see the opportunities for enrichment and growth that are here on this very campus. These opportunities have nothing to do with social conscience or with cheerleader maudlinism for the good old school. They have to do with the growth and enrichment of the individual. The major is important, certainly, and all those wretched papers, and showing up in class at 8:00 on a Monday morning. But, there are other things which in the scheme of things can be just as vital to the wholeness of the person.

Last night, I went to the opening of Blithe Spirit, another of Dr. Lockwood's masterful productions. There were very few viewers for the occasion. Here was a chance to be entertained, for free in a world of expensive pleasures. Here was a chance to take a good hard look at a very attractive, well constructed set. How many of our students have any idea what goes into the making of a set? It doesn't just happen to be on stage — even Dr. Lock's magic is not that great. Here was a chance to think about the techniques of coordinating timing, even to have a gentle laugh when the stage manager jumped the cue on the music and the actress had to cover with some clever extemp. Here was a chance to sit, as every natural critic does, and decide if the effect would have been better with alternate blocking in a certain scene. The farcical entertainment also provided some opportunity for serious after thought on a wide range of topics, not the least of them relationships among women. The whole act of theatre going is an enrichment to any life; it is a cultural experience; it gives one the chance to be temporarily a part of something greater than self; it provides a lovely willing suspension of disbelief in the midst of our everyday mania. Where were the three thousand? Did every professor on campus choose this week to assign the most egregious of homework tasks? I really hate to see our students not avail themselves of the enrichments around them.

Non-apathy does not have to mean finding a cause and vigorously serving it. It can mean simply looking around and identifying opportunities to enjoy and broaden. The well rounded individual serves himself better, and, as a natural consequence, serves all humanity better. In the years to come, when the current generation is out there in the "real world," the teachers with the wider experiental backgrounds will teach better; the businessman who understands how people relate will conduct better business; any professional will do his job better when he has more to give.

Obviously the Man-of-the-Year Award is not given to someone just because he attended Dr. Lock's production of Blithe Spirit. However, recognition and success come to those who take opportunities, grow when they can, enrich themselves, and think creatively about the process of broadening. Of the many possibiliteis here, theatre attendance must be one of the most rewarding chances to grow, think, learn, and laugh. Longwood students do all four of those things naturally, as so any young people. I would recommend the first step away from vegetation be attendance of the next play. Once devegetating starts, it carries its own inertia and it will spill over into other areas — maybe even to working for the Rotunda.

Thank you.

Dear Mr. Editor,

When I enrolled at this college a year and a half ago, I was told that all that was required for a student to pre-register for courses was the payment of the tuition deposit and any delinquent fines that may occur. Yet this year I was handed some survey, of which I was told about, and told that if I did not fill it in and return it that I would not be permitted to register for classes. When I was informed of this fact, I promptly threw my survey in the trash! Now I may be wrong, Lord knows I have been before, but where in the hell does the student handbook or the college catalogue state that I have to complete some asinine student survey so that I may be eligible to register for classes. If this college wants to throw me out because I have refused to fill in a questionnaire, then to hell with them, I'll go somewhere else and take my seventeen hundred dollar tuition with me. I'd be interested in knowing Ms. Gorski's and the board of trustees' opinion on this.

Respectfully submitted,
John C. Colangelo

Editor of The Rotunda:

On the whole, the students at Longwood are a decent, fun-loving, and reasonably hard-working lot. Every now and then, however, one or more real slime-balls bubbles to the surface. A case in point concerns the recent cutting down of a large, mature slash pine tree behind Lankford. This malicious act of vandalism occurred after Oktoberfest and required planning, a saw and a very malicious intent on the part of the perpetrator(s). Not only does this act deprive all of us of the beauty and shade provided by a mature tree, but it also reflects on the values held by the entire College community. As a result of this act, the Landscape Committee has decided to post a $100 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction (on a felony charge) of the individual(s) responsible for this desecration to our campus. We hope to bring the responsible individual(s) to justice, show the good-will of the other concerned campus citizens and discourage further acts of malicious vandalism on campus. If you have any information that will bear upon this incident please contact one of the following members of the Lancscape Committee: David Briel or Donald Merkle (Department of Natural Sciences) or Homer Springer (Department of Art).

Recently, many of the students at Longwood have been called apathetic because they don't participate during class discussions, or in other activities.

Although we know that there may be some apathetic students here, it is our opinion that the fear of being embarrassed and insecurity are the major participation blockers.

When they were in elementary school, chances are that if they gave a wrong answer they were laughed at. In high school, they weren't laughed at for giving a wrong answer; but their classmates probably made comments about the answer they gave. By the time they reach college, some of the students who have been laughed at are starting to doubt themselves. If not, maybe they've seen so many other students "get by" without asking questions or participating and decide to do the same.

But we are not here to just "get by," we are here to do better. It is our obligation as students to attempt to further our education. To do this, we must ask and answer questions, prepare and study for our classes, encourage other students to do the same, and most importantly, we should not ridicule our classmates.

Dear Editor:

I write in response to "Mr." O'Connor's letter in the October 15 edition of the paper.

A person is considered an adult when he acts responsibly. Anyone who plays games with alcohol is not an adult, no matter what his chronological age is. Sadly, he will probably never become one and will continue to go around whining when laws or rules are passed which call upon him to deny himself anything or to exhibit self-discipline.

Rotunda Editor:

Sir, I would like to begin by commending you on your most recent edition. In short I am impressed. It was very well done and showed a high degree of professionalism and good quality journalism. Unfortunately my primary purpose in writing is not merely commendation, it is however, in response to a small yet powerful and inappropriate phrase contained within the story headlined, "Longwood Student Critically Injured in Accident." In this article found in your last edition, the authors make what is perceived to be a derogatory reference to the ambulance that "finally appeared ten minutes after notification of the incident." For the record, I would like you to know that the call was received by the dispatcher at 1:47 a.m. At 1:51 a.m. the rescue squad marked "en route" and the first rescue squad personnel arrived at 1:52. This is a total of five minutes after the call was received, while the full crew were in action on the scene by 1:55 a.m., a total of eight minutes after the dispatcher received the call and well within the twelve minute guideline observed by such fine departments as Chesterfield County, Norfolk City, and Fairfax County, to name a few. Granted, times can always be improved but bear in mind that after the dispatcher receives a call he-she must then awaken personnel (note 1:47 in the morning), then allow time for them to dress, and then race to the scene.

As a student at Longwood as well as a member of the Prince Edward Volunteer Rescue Squad, it bothers me to see such comments as those quoted from your fine paper.

In closing, I would like to invite, with all sincerity, anyone wishing to help improve response times, and other facets of the Rescue Squad, to come down and volunteer a little time, I would simply say, we do the best we can and if that is not good enough, go ahead, cut our salary.

A.I.D.S.— Is Anyone Safe?

By JOHN TIPTON

Today in the United States there are over 11,000 confirmed cases of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). Currently the mortality rate is estimated at 73 percent. If the trend continues the number of new cases will double every six months.

In January of 1984 there were only 3210 reported cases. It is easy to see why a recent poll revealed AIDS as one of the biggest fears of Americans today (AIDS is second, cancer is the number one fear).

The first report of AIDS in the United States was in "Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report" in 1981 when the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta discovered an unusual strain of pneumonia in five previously healthy male homosexuals. Following that report the CDC received other reports of male homosexuals who had a similar disease triad. One disease included was Kaposi's Sarcoma. This disease was very rare in the United States and had only been detected prior in transplant patients.

AIDS is not exclusively a disease for homosexuals although 73 percent of all cases are in that group.

17 percent of the cases are attributed to intravenous drug abusers. Hemophiliacs, transfusion patients, and heterosexuals each scored one percent. Seven percent have been classified as other.

The symptoms of AIDS include chills and nightsweats, chronic diarrhea, a white blood cell count of roughly 2000 below normal, and substantial weight loss (up to 50 pounds in one year).

The disease can be in the victim's body for quite some time before being detected. Patients who are suspected of contracting the disease via a blood transfusion or by "shooting up" have a latency period of about 22 months. Homosexual males have a variable latency period which is difficult to pinpoint because of the frequency and number of sexual consorts.

What was thought true about AIDS one year ago may not necessarily be true today. One thing that is known is that AIDS can be contracted by the transferring of body fluids from an AIDS carrier to another period. This can be achieved through intercourse as well as a drop of blood from an AIDS victim entering an open wound. Remember the sacred ritual of becoming blood brothers? That would not be advisable in this day and time.

Health Beat

Smoking with that drink in your hand seems like a casual leisure activity, but both smoking and drinking at the same time is a hidden killer.

For every puff you take with your drink, carcinogens in the cigarette tar are deposited in the nasal cavity. The alcohol in the drink acts like a solvent and dissolves the tar. Thus, the carcinogens in the tar are transported across membranes. Also, both drinking and smoking damages the liver, causing it to overload itself with work. While it battles alcohol, cigarette toxins are allowed to enter the body. The liver also clears fats from the bloodstream. Alcohol decreases the liver's ability to perform this function. Drinking and smoking at the same time results in another type of hard work on your system. Cigarette smoke increases the coagulating capacity of the blood. The capillaries are thus clogged by the blood cells due to this coagulating action, and then food and oxygen have to struggle to reach the body's cells. The alcohol-tobacco combination makes the transport of food and oxygen doubly difficult. Result? Hyperventalation, among other stresses on the body due to this lack of oxygen.

Both long term use of alcohol-tobacco results in cardiovascular damage and liver damage. One has to be aware to what extent his habits can do to his body. One little habit can do twice the irreparable damage.

Vote For My Guy...

November 5 . . . just another Tuesday, right? WRONG!! This November will prove to be extremely important to the states of New Jersey and our very own Virginia as Republicans and Democrats vie for the three largest state seats: Governor, Lt. Governor, and Attorney General.

Having had the honor of working with Wyatt B. Durrette, Jr. (Republican candidate for Governor) this summer, I have become familiar with several interesting facts which many people rarely consider. For example, did you know that all eyes are on VA as we head to the polls? (N.J.'s incumbent is expected to retain his title.) Did you also realize that should the Republican Candidates of Durrette, Chichester and O'Brien win, VA will be the first southern state to have all three seats filled by Republicans since Reconstruction? Another interesting fact stems from past encounters between Durrette and his opponent. This election will mark the second time these candidates will meet under election terms!!

These are just a few interesting points which I found to be worthwhile to mention. Also . . . a reminder to continue with the Reagan agenda and get out there and put the three best men into office! (You know who they are!!!)

Your questions can be answered about proper dieting and nutrition on Tuesday, October 29, at 7:30 p.m. in Coyner 205. Doris Katzenburger, program coordinator of the Nutrition and Dairy Council, will speak in the Home Economics Department. There will be four nutrition computers set up to analyze your daily food intake and what foods you need to add to your daily diet. Katzenburger will also speak on how college students can improve their eating habits with the right foods. Students who are dieting can find out the proper way to diet with nutritional foods instead of starving themselves to lose weight. All of those interested are invited, especially home economic, computer, nutrition, P.E., pre-med and nursing majors.

The ROTUNDA encourages you to VOTE on Friday or Saturday for the upcoming state elections. You can vote on absentee ballot in person at your local registrars office or court house. Call the registrar in your locality when you go home.

NEWS BRIEFS:
Food Becomes The Bottom Line

The second largest food service in the United States, ARA, has decided to culminate research and begin marketing their new revolutionary food product. Corporate executives have decided on Longwood College, a small co-educational facility in South Central Virginia to begin experimenting with what is referred to as the S.O.S. nutritional system. S.O.S. is simply an acronym used for supplemental Organic suppository. "No comment" was the standard reply when officials were questioned on how students would react to the drastic change in eating method. However, one source was quoted as saying, "Down at the Wood they don't care, they are used to getting it up the palooka anyhow."

With the popularity and recent financial success of benefit concerts such as Live Aid and Farm Aid, a proposed concert for Herpaid is underway. The tentative venues for concerts are free clinics in San Francisco, Houston, Washington, D.C. and New York. Already scheduled to apear are Paul Schaeffer from the David Lettermen Show, David Bowie, Elton John, Boy George, and Marlon Perkins. Members from the animal kingdom pledging support include Lassie, Benji, and Morris the Cat contingent on the former behaving.

Sonny was opting for Salvatore Ono Bono Jr. while Yoko wanted to name the child Haiku Bono Ono. At this time the child with possibly the world's worst singing genes remains unnamed.

Cr Wha Qusaw

Within the last year the French Croissant has emerged as the latest popular food item in many franchise fast food restaurants. Although popular, the Croissant has run into a problem with semantics and marketing. It seems 75 percent of the fast food population is unable to pronounce the French pastry correctly. Many men have said that they feel emasculated simply by asking for a croissant. The marketing magnates of Madison Avenue have luckily stepped in and saved us from our own ignorance. We now are blessed with Cresent sandwiches and the Cre-Sandwich. Whew!

Has Man's Best Friend Turned Out To Be His Worst Enemy

Recently, at an elite social function in Washington, I was introduced to the world renowned Venchly Troissant Parotis IX. The well-known crusader against sexually transmitted diseases was in an unusually glib mood as he disucssed the newest sexally transmitted disease: Herpaid.

HERPAID: A WORKING DEFINITION .

HerpAid is a combination of Herpes Simplex II and Aids found in dogs and humans. Transmitted from dog to dog through dog type sexual contact, this disease causes a dog's throat to chafe and flake. Through barking a dog transmits tiny particles of HerpAid simplex, which immediately attach themselves to the nearest human. Humans can transmit the disease back to dogs by allowing dogs to snatch crackers from their mouths. Thus, the cycle is complete.

Since You Are Probably Reading This In Class, We Provide This For Note Taking...

Dear Rotunda,

As you are aware my contacts in the Capital have informed me that the HerpAid simplex has found its way into the highest office of this nation. It seems that the White House dog, Lucky, has contracted a rare strain of the HerpAid virus. Officials in the administration believe that Lucky's romp last month with the Haitian ambassador's dog Baby Doc may have been Lucky's unlucky day. Informed sources, who refused to identify themselves believe that Baby Doc may have been involved in a dog type sexual contact maneuver with Lucky.

Insiders say that Lucky, who was given to the President by Rock Hudson, is on his way to France for experimental treatment. Lucky will reportedly undergo treatment of the Pasteur Clinic in Paris and will then be whisked to the Betty Ford rehab center in California. Officials will only say they are "concerned" when questioned on HerpAid. Lucky had no comment.

A — So they can use the handicapped parking spaces.

THE ROTUNDA QUESTIONS . . . . Venchley Troissant Parotis IX

Q: Why do you risk your life investigating the new killer disease HerpAid Simplex?

A: I feel that life is a gift, and the gift of life cannot be taken for granted, and these are the reasons that justify my never-ending quest for a cure to HerpAid Simplex.

Q: So what does HerpAid mean to the average Longwoodian? How can I avoid getting HerpAid?

A: What does it mean? What does it mean what does it mean? What do you think I am, an idiot? It means if a dog carrying the disease barks in your face, you're going to die! Also, if you see a dog have dog type sexual contact with another dog you shouldn't let it bark in your face. However, if you have HerpAid you shouldn't let a dog snatch a cracker from your mouth. What does it mean?

(Parotis shakes his head with disgust.)

Do You Know When It's Time To Clean Your Room?

By JOHNNY PASTINO
and DAVE BUCHANAN

Do you know when it's time to clean your room? We've been here for eight weeks now and just last week I started smelling a strong rotton odor under my bed. I carefully looked underneath it and found ½ a peanut butter sandwich that I dropped the second day of classes. Well, let us give you a few suggestions for when it's time to clean your room. If — you notice an unidentifiable odor coming from your trashcan. Upon further investigation, you find a beer can from the first week of school with cigarette ashes in it, and a spilled can of tomato juice.

— The pile of newspapers is as high as your loft.

— You look in your closet for something to wear and your closet is empty except for your overcoat and your Sunday suit.

— When you can't find your bed.

— Someone comes in your room and compliments you on your colorful rug and then realizes that it's just clothes.

— The bathroom walls turn a sick green color.

— Your towels smell like sour milk.

— The shower curtain suddenly develops a floral print.

— You have 13 bags from different stores all full of trash and beer cans.

— Your white bedsheets turn brown.

— You can never find the phone before they hang up.

— You turn your stereo on and dust flies out from it.

— You can write the rough draft of your English paper on your desk in the dust.

— You open the refrigerator to find six cups half-full of unidentifiable liquid.

— You pick up a piece of paper and find part of a chicken sandwich you stole from the dining hall 2 weeks ago.

If this hasn't made you realize that your room needs cleaning and don't take our advice to clean it; one day you may hear a banging sound in the hall and go outside to find Ric Wiebl nailing a Disaster Area sign on your door.

By KIM SETZER

You know it's time to clean our room when:

— your residence hall uses your room for the trash room

— when your friends make it to your bed, they put a flag in it

— you sell the fungus breeding in your refrigerator to the infirmary as penicillian

— the zoology lab uses your sock drawer to breed specimens

— your roommate has quarantined his side

— a priest has exorcised your room

— your goldfish begged to be flushed and set free

— your plants are given last rites

— you've had a visitor for an hour and you are just noticing him

— your friends comment on your new green rug . . . and you don't have one.

Robert Clater is a member of a national "top 200." In fact, he's the youngest member of that special group.

Clater, working with the managers of two 7-Eleven Stores in the Manassas area, raised $23,400 for the Muscular Dystrophy Association during summer 1985. The three are among the top 200 fund-raisers for MDA in the United States.

A junior at Longwood College, Clater works part-time for 7-Eleven. Because of his enthusiasm and aptitude, he received special permission from company management to be his store's "MDA representative."

7-Eleven Stores have been involved in MDA fund-raising for 10 years, Clater said, and have raised $42 million during that period. "Jerry Lewis asked for help from the company, and he's certainly received it. Next to customer service, raising funds for MDA is the greatest priority of 7-Eleven employees," he said.

The company sponsors a national competition among its store managers and this year is rewarding the 200 most successful MDA money raisers with a six-day trip to Hawaii in November.

Clater employed a variety of fund-raising tactics, some of which were arduous. For 32-and-a-half hours, he sat in "jail" — a small cage with metal bars set up in a parking lot. That feat brought in more than $500.

He spent 30 hours on a teeter-totter, with two other Longwood students — Mary Jane Carney and John Waters — taking turns on the other end. "I lost eight pounds and couldn't walk when I first got off," Clater said.

"We did the usual stuff, too, like bake sales and yard sales. We had little kids go door-to-door asking for donations. People will usually respond to little kids," he said.

The approach that worked best was simple and straightforward. Clater calls it "working the stoplights."

"You just get a permit, go to a stoplight, and ask for donations while people are waiting for the light to change," he said. "People will give! I couldn't believe the response." His best record was $800 in two hours.

"Occasionally someone would give a big bill — like the woman who gave $20 because her son has muscular dystrophy — but mostly we got change," he said.

After one evening of stoplighting, he rolled 147 rolls of pennies. "And you're not too popular with the people at the bank when you keep walking in with several hundred dollars in quarters."

Sometimes the response was negative. "A few people said they wouldn't give because they think Jerry Lewis is on drugs or that he gets all the money," Clater said.

His biggest disappointment was his visit to the Pentagon. "I got this bright idea to go to the main entrance at the Pentagon and ask for donations," Clater said. "It took more than a month to get the required permit, and I took in only $36!"

The cooperation of town officials, businesses, and local radio and newspaper were essential ingredients in Clater's success, he said. "Many people were just great in supporting our effort — like the Nissan-Datsun dealer who donated a new truck for the winner of our Hands-On Contest (person who stood with his-her hands on the truck without movement for the longest period of time)."

He's already planning to raise $50,000 for MDA next summer. "I think we can double what we did this year," he said. "I'm working a deal with a race track owner who has promised to donate one night's gate and concession receipts as a tax write-off. That should bring in $25,000 in one lump."

In the meantime, he'll work to keep his grades up at Longwood where he is majoring in government with a minor in business.

"7-Eleven has this career planning program to encourage young employees to stay with the company," Clater said. "If they think you have a future in the company, they will reimburse you for 80 percent of college expenses. But you have to maintain a C-or-above average.

"Also, I have to keep up-to-date in all my classes so I can take that week off next month to go to Hawaii."

Next summer, Clater's younger sister will be working for 7-Eleven and competing with him in raising funds for MDA. "She doesn't have a chance," he said. "With that race track deal I'm going to blow her out of the water!"

Newspaper Explodes; One Sig Ep Killed

In a bizarre tale of journalistic travesty and ecumenical intrigue and other worldlyism, a strategism but truism occurred last weekend.

It seems an unidentified member of Sigma Phi Epsilon (identity being withheld until family can be notified) was killed last week when an edition of The Richmond Times-Dispatch exploded in the vicinity of page A6.

In the photo we see the remains of this poor young, well-informed man.

Rumors have been flying and The Rotunda has learned that the alcohol concoction seen in the photo was placed there by a confused paperboy trying to save his job.

One man on the scene known as "The Shroomer" to admirers, said: "Like, hold on, okay, I've never seen someting so magnanimous, like I know that The Richmond Times-Dispatch is known for a few misquotes and grammatical mistakes, but this is totally, um, out of sinc with my understanding of the realm." Yes indeed, clam down, young man.

Sources say that Palestinians were seen in the area, but seemed preoccupied with finding worms to go fishing.

Pastino Photo

In a totally unrelated event, several young coeds were seen laughing hysterically about their English professor's obsession with poor taste in journalism, the poor old coot.

Also it has been suggested that you should never count your girlfriends or boyfriends.

Homos Recognized

The spread of Acquired-Immune-Deficiency-Syndrome (AIDS) has made Gay Awareness Week obsolete. In truth, AIDS has forced gay awareness year-round.

Nevertheless, in our true liberal spirit, The Rotunda will do its share to advance the gay cause. Once again, The Rotunda will give the Longwood community an opportunity to show their support for homosexuals. Only this time we'll do it right. Beginning tomorrow, Wednesday, October 30, we will begin the celebration of Gay Awareness Trimester. During this period, we will all be given the opportunity to show our support of homos by wearing blue jeans, baseball caps, weight belts, any type of undergarment and-or a swatch watch.

Wake Up!

By LEE RICHARDS

A funny thought occurred to me on the way home for Fall break as I pulled the car off the shoulder for the third time in five minutes — how in the world do people like truck drivers keep from falling asleep at the wheel on those long hauls?

Granted, I only had to travel 173 miles, but after a week of losing sleep to study for mid-terms (not to mention making a few newspaper deadlines) that three hour drive seemed to drag on forever.

So, in order to make sure that I got home safely, I started coming up with different ways to keep myself awake. Here's what I came up with:

- Play the radio very loud and sing along with it. This usually isn't too effective since you've packed your speakers in with dirty laundry, but try it if you can — people very rarely sing in their sleep (Note: knowing the words to the songs is optional).
- Drink lots of coffee or cola — if the caffeine doesn't keep you awake, having to stop to go to the bathroom will.
- Open the window or turn the air conditioner on — this will usually give you a cold, but at least you'll be alive to enjoy it.
- Play the air drums — by physically exerting yourself you generate adrenaline. If nothing else, this method amuses the hell out of the rest of us and thusly keeps us awake.
- Stab yourself in the arm with your fingernail — pain is another good way to generate adrenaline, but this method can be dangerous if you get pulled over by the police. Fingernail grooves look surprisingly like track marks (try to explain that one to your parents).
- Wait until you fall asleep so that when you hit the shoulders it'll scare you awake. (Note: My brother used this method once and scared himself awake enough to drive 300 miles straight. He was shaking when he got there — but at least he got there).
- If worse comes to worse, pull over to a rest stop and take a nap. Try to dream about ax murderers and werewolves so that the first person who knocks on the window to see if you are alright really wakes you up!
- Take the bus.
- Don't go home.

Someone also suggested getting one of those electronic beepers to put in your ears so that when you nod your head it goes off. The only problem with that is that most people can drive while asleep for hours without moving their heads an inch. If you don't have that problem, try sticking a toothpick in the collar of your shirt so that when you nod your head, you'll get a little shock. At least that way, you can save some money.

Durrette Supports Education

When it comes to mixing politics with education, Wyatt Durrette, Republican candidate for Governor, feels that he is the best man for the job. His 18-point Agenda for Excellence in Education stresses the importance of education while also explaining the importance of those who are doing the actual educating . . . the teachers of this state.

Whatt supports merit pay as a means of encouraging and rewarding excellence. By this, Wyat is saying that teachers deserve to be rewarded for their acts, just as the students are rewarded for the amount of time and work they put into their studies. As a result, the state will be able to increase the salaries of those teachers who deserve the raise, rather than go into debt by raising the salary of all teachers in this state.

The reform package which Wyatt proposes will bring about a major financial commitment to education which will show great improvements in our public school system. The Standards of Quality which Wyatt desires for public education will include merit pay as well as other reforms. It is predicted that $500 million in additional funds will be available during the next 2 year state budget period. How the funds are spent is the primary question being asked. Wyatt believes that his reforms will give public education a new meaning as well as educating children with the much needed skills which they are not receiving today.

Among the proposals which Wyatt has made in his 18-point policy plan are:

— Family Savings-for-Education Act. Allows parents to create a special savings account, similar to an Individual Retirement Account, for their children's education; state income tax deducations of up to $2,500 of the annual amount deposited; savings tax free only if used for a child's college education; otherwise, funds would be taxed at the usual rate.

— Tax incentives for businesses that become actively involved in local public schools.

— Scholarships for teachers to continue their education.

— Local-option to elect school board members.

— Curriculum and textbook reform.

— Education-in-Virginia Summit: Bring together parents, civic and business leaders, school board members, teachers, principals, students. Goal: To discuss what every child should learn in school.

— Optional Virginia Regents Exam: Help establish a voluntary benchmark of excellence for college-bound seniors.

— Master Principal-Master Administrator Career Ladder.

Academic Probation

By LISA LINDSAY

In order to alleviate the problems of last year's Academic Probation policy, the Academic Affairs office has created a new policy to go into effect immediately.

The first problem was the large number of probation categories. There were systems of regular probation for: freshmen whose cumulative quality point average is less than 1.0 at the end of the first semester, freshmen whose cumulative quality point average is less than 1.6 at the end of the academic year, sophomores whose cumulative quality point average is less than 1.8 at the end of the academic year, Juniors whose cumulative quality point average is less than 2.0. In addition there was a "fast" system for any student earning less than .5 in any semester. Having so many systems made record-keeping a cumbersome process. A second problem was the difficulty of determining two conditions for Academic Probation (GPA and number of semesters in attendance) and of keeping student histories. Since our present computer stores grades only for the most recent semester, all student histories have to be followed manually — a process complicated by those students withdrawing and reentering at different times, and those being placed on different categories of Academic Probation. A third problem was the lengthy suspension periods. The suspension periods of the old policy were one year suspension — followed by one year on Academic Probation — followed by a 5-year suspension.

It was decided something had to be done with all these problems, so a new policy was established to go into effect second semester. The new policy states: Students are expected to make reasonable academic progress and must maintain a specified grade point average on the number of hours attempted to remain in good standing. Students who fall below the minimum standards for continuance (shown in the table in the new catalog on pages 33-34) at any time will be placed on academic probation or suspended from school for one semester immediately following. Decisions about continuance at the College will be made on the basis of all grades on record at the end of each semester.

Since academic probation indicates serious academic difficulty, students on probation are encouraged to seek assistance in improving academic standing. While on probation students are not permitted to participate in intercollegiate competitive activities or to hold an office or a chairmanship of a standing committee of a student organization.

Academic suspension means required withdrawal from the College for a period of one semester immediately following a session in which there was not a sufficient grade point average. Students may appeal suspension decisions to the Faculty Petitions Committee, particularly when there have been extenuating circumstances.

The third suspension is considered permanent; however, students may request reconsideration of the Faculty Petitions Committee after a period of five years, particularly when there have been extenuating circumstances.

The new policy will help everyone involved. It will cut down on the cumbersome amount of paperwork and help organize the system. For the student, there will be early notification of one's academic status to be printed on one's grade sheet, and clear indications of the GPA needed in order to avoid academic probation and suspension.

The college faculty expects this new system to alleviate current problems of record-keeping, overlapping probation categories, and the tendency (of some students) to procrastinate in improving their grades.

While the system looks complicated at first glance, with a little practice you really should find it easy to use. If anyone has any questions on the New academic probation policy or the college transition to it, please phone Dr. Sarah Young at 804-392-9262.

Crime Solvers At L.C.

By KIM DEANER

Prince Edward County in cooperation with Longwood College, Hampden-Sydney, and the town of Farmville is in the process of organizing a Prince Edward Crime Solvers that should be in action by Nov. 1, 1985.

Crime Solvers is set up to offer a cash reward to the community for providing information for any crime. If a caller wishes to remain anonymous then a number is assigned and a cash delivery will be in the strictest of confidence. The rewards can vary from $150.00 for information leading to the conviction of a car thief or as high as $1,000.00

Crime Solvers is composed of a Board of Directors from the community. Longwood's Board member Rick Hurley, Vice President of Business Affairs, holds the office of secretary. As a Board member he will be responsible for getting contributions from Longwood College and determination of rewards based on the crime.

Apathetic Situation

By KIM SETZER

The ongoing problems still exist here at Longwood — the student's apathy and Longwood being known as a "Suitcase College." A person trying to correct these problems is Paul Striffilino, head of the Student Union. Striffilino feels that students should try and take advantage of the Student Union. He states, "to me the Student Union is a student organization which provides leadership in bringing in entertainment, recreational, social and religious programs for Longwood's campus and surrounding communities."

The problem is getting students to become more involved and to stay here on the weekends. The Student Union will give out surveys in the springs to find out what students want to see. This includes choices in particular programs, film choice, live music and lectures.

Striffilino agrees that Longwood needs to get in big bands. But decent bands cost between $15,000 and $20,000. The price of the ticket is so large that students can't afford it. Acts like Tina Turner are asking around $70,000. Striffilino is currently talking to the Dean of Students at Hampden-Sydney College about a joint venture in getting a large act. There needs to be a neutral spot so both campuses can feel equal. If it is outdoors and it rains, there will be a significant loss of money.

S-UN has brought a number of small bands and entertainers. Bringing in single entertainers and having them perform in the Lancer Cafe is more intimate and more like a club. Last year there were many "teasers" in the dining hall. A teaser is when the performer gives a taste of his act during dinner. But this causes problems because performers usually get to the school after dinner, or they need that time to set up. Striffilno states, "Students should take advantage of the activities sponsored by SUN because that is where a large part of their student activities fees go to."

Concert

The Longwood College Flute Ensemble will present a concert at 8:00 p.m. on Thursday, October 31, 1985, at the Molnar Recital Hall of Wygal Music building. The members of this group are Carole Smith, Jana Wells, Wendy Palmore, Joy Mapp, Treena Tomlinson, and Ms. Patricia Werrell, director. Presented in this concert will be pieces by Reicha, Kuhlau, Bach, and Kummer. This concert is free and open to the public.

Dos Passos Prize

The 1985 John Dos Passos Prize for Literature will be presented to novelist Russell Banks at 8:00 p.m. Tuesday, October 29 in Wygal's Molinar Recital Hall.

Mr. Banks, who spent a week at Longwood last March as a Woodrow Wilson Visiting Fellow, will receive a medal and a $1000 cash award for his literary achievements, including his latest nove. Continental Drift, which has been hailed by reviewers as both a great American novel and a masterpiece.

All are invited to attend the presentation and a reading by Mr. Banks.

The Longwood College Series of Performing Arts will present an international treat for the entire family — The Chinese Golden Dragon Acrobats and Magicians of Taipei. The show, on Wednesday, October 30, at 8 p.m. in Jarman Auditorium, is part of the Golden Dragon ensemble's first American tour.

For more than 2,000 years, Chinese variety entertainments were extremely popular with the Emperors and the mass public. Today, these beautifully costumes performers tour their ancient culture throughout the world.

The tradition of excellence in feats of balance, juggling, magic, gymnastics and acrobatics has been confined mainly to a few Chinese families. The widely-recognized Chang family has been considered the best in all of China.

Many Changs have been featured on television, as featured artists with famous celebrities, and on world-wide tours. Now, for the first time, the Chang family ensemble is touring the world with their own complete show.

General admission to the show is $5.00. Tickets will be available at the door or may be obtained in advance at the Lankford Student Union, telephone 392-9347.

Effort To Renew Higher Education Act

By BRYAN ABAS

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — The current effort to renew the landmark Higher Education Act, which sets the outlines of federal college policy through the next five years, has broadened into a spirited debate over just how involved the federal government should be in higher education.

By law, Congress must renew the act every five years.

In the past, the renewal processes has featured routine political arguments over whether to start new programs and how much money to give old ones.

This time, led by U.S. Education Secretary William Bennett, critics are promoting a series of fundamental changes in the law that, if enacted, would begin a new era of college history.

"The warning shots suggest this will be a much more basic debate than the previous five-year reauthorizations," says University of Minnesota education Prof. Jim Hearn, who has studied the impact of the original 1965 Higher Education Act on colleges.

Bennett recently announced he would unveil his proposals for ammending the Higher Education Act in January, but previous comments suggest he'll try to cut most programs.

The celebrants say the law, which effectively invented most student financial aid programs and fueled an era of unprecedented growth in American higher education, made it possible for a society to educate much of its middle and lower classes for the first time in history.

The critics say the law, in fact, made it too easy to go to college, let colleges make themselves too expensive to be useful, and lowered the quality of college educations.

It's so easy for students to get federal aid that schools "accept students who are unprepared or uninterested in rigorous academic training," contends Eileen Gardner of the Heritage Foundation, a Washington, D.C. think tank whose education policies have been adopted by the Reagan administration in the past.

The easy money "has prompted too many colleges to abandon substantive core (curricula) in favor of a hodgepodge of courses geared to the intersts of those (uninterested) students, thereby gutting the value of a college education," Gardner charges.

"A lot of colleges have satisfied their urge to grow by enrolling kids who shouldn't be in college, and grabbing the federal money these kids bring along," adds Raymond Lewin, president of Pierce College in Philadelphia.

"It's foolish," he says, "to spend $4,000 to $5,000 to send someone who doesn't know how to read to college."

Critics also contend the Higher Education Act allowed colleges to raise tuition with impunity, figuring the federal government would simply increase aid enough to help students pay the higher fare.

And because colleges could raise money so readily, they could pay fat teacher salaries, impose light teaching loads and grow large, inefficient bureaucracies.

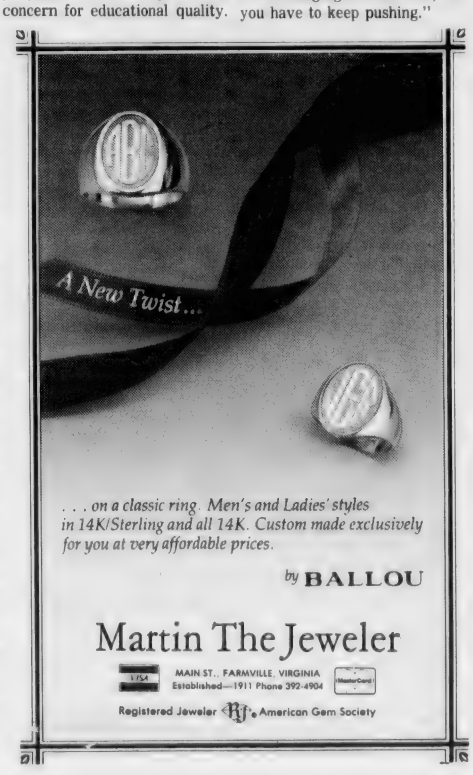
Some academicians, while acknowledging college standards have fallen, say it's wrong to balme federal programs.

"Wherever quality has slipped, it's been self-inflicted," says Robert Hardesty, president of Southwest Texas State University — site of Lyndon Johnson's signing of the Higher Education Act in 1965 — and host of the national anniversary ceremony on November 7-8.

Hardesty thinks critics of the Higher Education Act are "elitists" upset that too many people are getting degrees, "revisionists" who are wrong to say the act was never designed to send poor students to private schools, or "thinly-disguised racists" who mask their prejudices with a professed concern for educational quality.

Minnesota's Hearn says it's "naive" to attribute academic troubles to financial aid, adding he thinks any decline in educational quality results from a complex mix of factors.

Even critic Gardner stops short of saying financial aid is a primary cause of lower quality, claiming instead there is "a strong probable connection" between the two.



Still, Gardner — and probably the administration — are determined to convince Congress to use the reauthorization debate to make it harder for students and colleges to get federal money.

Some observers, for example, expect Bennett to propose that students maintain higher grades in order to get and keep federal aid.

Lewin of Pierce College, who supports the idea, estimates anywhere from 25 to 50 percent of the students who now get aid would lose their loans and grants if Congress agreed to it.

The same critics have failed to convince Congress to approve cutbacks and similar changes in the last three years, but Gardner thinks the administration could win this time if it sticks to its principles.

"There is a failure (in the administration) to walk these things through," she says. "Sure it's walking against the tide, but you have to keep pushing."

Soccer Team Ranked 19th, Beat Radford, Tie With Tech

With its hopes for postseason play still alive, Longwood's soccer team was successful last week, beating Radford 1-0 in overtime Wednesday and battling Virginia Tech to a 1-1 overtime tie Saturday. Should the 19th ranked and 10-4-2 Lancers win their three remaining games, a spot in the Virginia intercollegiate Soccer Association Playoffs is almost assured and a berth in the NCAA playoffs is a possibility.

Coming up this week is a home game with Hampden-Sydney Wednesday at 3:00 and a visit to rival Randolph-Macon Sunday at 3:00. The regular season finale is November 6 when Averett visits for a 2:30 contest. Both the Randolph-Macon and Averett games are VISA Eastern Division contests. Longwood is 1-1-1 in Eastern Division play, but can finish first or second with wins over the Yellow Jackets and Averett.

Defense has been the name of the game for Longwood over the past three weeks and the ringleaders of that defensive effort have been goal keeper Rob Liessem, and sweeper Erick Karn. Liessem had 10 saves in Wednesday's win over Radford and came back with 11 Saturday against Division I Virginia Tech.

Karn is the last line of defense in front of Liessem and has been outstanding all season. Time after time, the junior defender has stopped the opposition from getting off a clear shot at the Longwood goal. No one has scored more than two goals against the Lancers in 16 games.

A goal by Craig Reid in the second overtime gave the Lancers their win over Radford in a fiercely contested battle Wednesday. The Highlander keeper seemed to have the shot stopped, but it slipped through his hands and into the net.

Saturday, Mark Kremen scored on a set play from about 25 yards out on an assist from Longwood scoring leader John Kennen. Kennen now has eight assists and five goals for the season. Kremen's first-half goal tied the Hokies 1-1 and neither team was able to score after that.

"We came up with two real good efforts last week," said coach Posipanko. "If we play like that the rest of the year, we'll be in good shape. We cannot afford any more losses."

Longwood has gone 2-3-2 after getting off to an 8-1 start and has scored just four goals in its last seven games. Defense has kept the team in the hunt for postseason honors.

Liessem Named Player Of The Week

Liessem Leads Defense; Named Player Of The Week

Junior goalkeeper Rob Liessem had 21 saves in two games last week for the Longwood soccer team and for his performance, Liessem has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period October 20-27. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

A key factor in Longwood's 10-4-2 record in soccer, Liessem came through with 10 saves in a 1-0 overtime win over Radford Wednesday and turned away 11 Virginia Tech shots in a 1-1 overtime tie Saturday afternoon.

The junior standout has allowed just 14 goals in 14 games for a goals against average of 1.0. He has also come through with 88 saves for an average of 6.3 per game.

Coach Rich Posipanko says Liessem has the potential to have a shot at professional soccer if he continues to work and improve.

"Rob has great hands," said the coach. "He stops just about every shot that he gets his hands on. He has as much ability as some of the keepers I coached with Houston Dynamos last summer, but he needs to continue working. He has the potential to improve even more."

ROB LIESSEM

The 6-2, 195-pounder has four shutouts to his credit this season. His play has helped Longwood prevent any of its opponents from scoring more than two goals.

SPORTS FEATURE

By TIM FITZGERALD

When Ty Bordner first came to Longwood in 1982, he could barely hit a golf ball, and he had no idea where it would land says Longwood golf coach Steve Nelson.

Now Nelson says Bordner is one of the top two golfers to ever play at Longwood.

That puts him in the company of Longwood's All-American Tim White. White, who carried a 75.2 stroke average, finished 14th out of 120 golfers in the 1980 Division III National Tournament.

"I came to Longwood to play baseball, but unfortunately I did not make the team," said Bordner. "I decided to go out for the golf team, and I made the team."

With less than two years experience as a golfer, Ty still made the traveling squad his freshman year.

"I played in the sixth position which is the last man on the traveling squad. My goal was just to improve."

And improve he did. In the spring season of his sophomore year, Ty alternated between the 1,2 and three positions. His stroke average of 79 was the lowest on the team.

Knowing that more improvement would come only through practice, Ty sat out of school last year to work on his game.

"During that year my swing became more consistent," said Bordner. "I didn't learn many new things, but I became more consistent overall."

TY BORDNER

Once back at Longwood, Bordner combined his new consistency with some advice from Longwood's club professional Mac Main to produce some super results. His stroke average of 77.2 was the lowest on the team this fall.

Ty also set a new school record for 36 holes by shooting a 71-72-143 in the Old Dominion Golf Tournament. He shot a 73 to earn medalist honors in a tri-match. For these accomplishments, Ty was recognized as Longwood College Player of the Week.

"I owe a lot to Mac Main," said Bordner. "Most of the new things I learn, I learn from him. He just helps me a lot."

According to coach Nelson, Ty is playing really well right now.

"He has more confidence than in the past," says Nelson. "Because of this confidence he is playing more aggressively. It gets him in trouble sometimes, but overall I think it helps him."

Nelson points out that Ty's amazing improvement is a pay back for the amount of time and hard work that Ty puts into his game.

"Ty is one of the most conscientious, hard working athletes at Longwood. He plays golf year round, even in the snow. I have seen him, many times, hit golf balls until his hands blister. That is dedication."

Ty has some definite goals in mind when it comes to golf.

"I want to be an All-American before I leave Longwood," says Bordner. "If I continue to work hard, I think I can do it."

Ty would also like to continue to play competitively after college.

"I would love to make the PGA tour, but I will have to work so hard, practice a lot, and improve a whole lot."

Considering how hard a worker he is, and how much he has improved in just four years, Ty Bordner just might have a shot.

Longwood Gymnastics Team Slates Exhibition Tuesday

While the competitive season doesn't begin until December, Longwood's gymnastics team will put on an exhibition of its abilities Tuesday night in Lancer Hall starting at 8:00. The exhibition is open to the public at no charge.

"The exhibition will be sort of a preview of the coming year," said coach Ruth Budd. "We're going to let people know who is on the team and the kinds of things we have been working on. There will be some individual skills and also group tumbling."

Nine members of last year's team are back in action. Seniors Kelly Strayer and Lisa Zuraw, juniors Shay Woolfolk, Debbe Malin and Kerri Hruby and sophomores Leslie Jaffee, Teresa Robey, Mary Schaefer and Tammy Zeller are all veteran gymnasts.

Newcomers to the team include freshmen Kelley Paz, Kim Booth and Lynda Chenoweth.

Former Lancer gymnast Dawn Campbell is serving as a student assistant coach with this year's squad.

Triathlon

By KIM DEANER

A Longwood Triathlon sponsored by Colleen Stiles, a Longwood student, took place Sunday, October 27, 1985 at 8 a.m. Colleen Stiles organized the Triathlon for her Organization and Administration class.

The Triathlon consisted of a ½ mile swim, a 12-mile bike and a 4 mile run. There were 10 participants including Coach Coughlin and Professor Merling.

The first place contestant was Chris Lebel with a finishing time of 1 hr. 35 min., placing second was Terry Peele with a time of 1 hr. and 3 min. placing third was Rala Heinen with a time of 1 hr. and 38 min., and fourth place was Coach Loretta Coughlin with a time of 1 hr. and 39 min.

Donations for the Triathlon came from The Shape-Up-Shop, Key Office Supply, and Woody's Video Village.

Field Hockey Loses To Duke; Season Ends With 11-4 Record

Stickers Fall At Duke 2-1; Season Ends with 11-4 Record

A tough 2-1 loss ended the regular season for Longwood's field hockey team Friday afternoon, but the Lady Lancers can take pride in having compiled the best record since the 1975 squad went to 16-5-4 and finished fifth in the nation.

Coach Sue Finnie's team ended up with a fine 11-4 record, scoring 43 goals while giving up just 14 in 15 games. Only two teams scored more than one goal against the Lady Lancers.

"We played well at Duke," said Finnie. "They had 24 shots to 16 for us, but we played excellent defense. Tammy Marshall and Diane Bingler combined to hold down Duke's top threat."

Sophomore Traci Strickland tied the score at 1-1 on an assist from Sharon Bruce 27 minutes into the game. Duke got the game-winner early in the second half.

Goalkeeper Haidee Shiflet had 10 saves, while Marshall had 16 interceptions, Bingler and Claye Conkwright nine each, and Kris Meaney eight.

KRIS MEANEY

Finnie chose Strickland as offensive player of the game and Meaney and Lesley Rapoza as defensive players of the game.

For the season, seniors Sue Groff and Bruce led Longwood in scoring. Groff had 19 goals and Bruce 11. Strickland scored six goals. Groff ended her career with 47 goals, second best ever at Longwood, while Bruce totaled 26 career goals to rank fifth on the all-time list.

Lady Golfers

Lady Lancer Golfers 11th In North Carolina Tourney

Led once again by sophomore Tina Barrett, Longwood's women's golf team concluded its fall play with an 11th place finish out of 14 teams Sunday afternoon in the 10th Lady Tar Heel Tournament. The 54-hole event was played at UNC's Finley Golf Course in Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

Host UNC emerged the victor with a final round 298 to beat second place Kentucky by five strokes. Longwood, which totaled 969 to the Lady Tar Heels' 903, slipped from 10th to 11th on the final day with a 327.

Barrett tied for 22nd out of more than 70 golfers, shooting a 79-78-75-232.

Soph Tammy Lohren also had a consistent tournament with an 83-82-79-244. The rest of Longwood's team, however, had an up and down 54-holes of play. Marcia Melone shot 77-83-87-247, Gretchen Pugh 79-81-90-250 and Leigh Russell 91-89-86-266. Soph Nancy Ryan did not make the trip because of academic commitments.

Longwood's next competitive action won't come until the end of February.

Volleyball Meets Stiff Competition At LV

Longwood's women's volleyball team traveled to Lynchburg over the weekend to play in the Liberty University Classic Tournament and the Lady Lancers ran into some stiff competition.

Coach Linda Elliott's squad, which was hampered by the absence of injured Mary Friga, suffered five losses and ended up ninth in the 10-team tournament.

Longwood's tournament scores were as follows: Charles County C.C. defeated LC 15-2, 15-3, Kutztown was victorious by a 15-9, 17-15 score, Liberty beat LC 15-4, 15-3, Marshall won 15-2, 15-3 and Radford pinned a 15-1, 15-9 defeat on the Lady Lancers.

Now 3-25, Longwood plays at Bridgewater with Roanoke Thursday before wrapping up the season November 5 at Chowan with Mary Washington.

Banks Receives Dos Passos Award

Novelist Russell Banks received Longwood's 1985 John Dos Passos Prize for Literature in a ceremony October 29. At the ceremony, in which he received $1,000 and a medal, Banks read from an early collection of short stories, titled Searching for Survivors, and from a new collection of short stories.

Russell Banks has been praised by both critics and fellow writers. The poet Charles Simic calls Banks "one of our most sensitive, skillful writers;" and Frank MacShane, director of the graduate writing program at Columbia University, commends Banks for being, like Dos Passos, a writer "who deal(s) with America in the widest social sense."

Jerome Klinkowitz, an important critic of contemporary American literature, characterizes Banks and his work: "He's on the leading edge of synthesizing the great innovations in fiction during our time and fashioning them into an accessible, mainstream literary art; he is especially brilliant at finding the fictive element in history . . . Professionally, he's regarded as the most generous and helpful writer in the country."

Banks is a native of New Hampshire. After briefly attending Colgate University in the late 1950's, he dropped out of academia for five years. During that time he worked as a plumber, meeting people and acquiring experiences which eventually found their way into his fiction.

Banks returned to college in 1964, when he entered the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1967, with highest honors in English literature and creative writing.

That same year Banks, along with poet William Matthews, founded the Lillabulero magazine and press, which published Banks's first book — a collection of poetry entitled Waiting To Freeze — in 1969.

By the mid-1970s Banks's work began to find critical and popular acceptance. His short fiction appeared in The Best American Short Stories in 1971 and 1975, and 1975 also saw his publication in Prize Stories: The O. Henry Awards.

To date, Banks has published two books of poetry, three collections of short stories, and five novels, including Family Life in 1975 and Hamilton Stark in 1978.

Banks presently is a Visiting Writer at Sarah Lawrence College and a Visiting Lecturer in Writing at Princeton University. Among his other honors and awards are two Woodrow Wilson

Longwood's Art Faculty Exhibit

The eight members of Longwood College's art faculty are exhibiting their work in the college's Bedford Gallery through November 15.

The individual talents and interests of these artists are demonstrated in a fascinating mix of media, subjects, and artistic "vision."

Included in the exhibit are: a group of garments made of handpainted and dyed fabrics by Enid Adams; jewelry by Mark Baldridge; watercolor-and-mixed-media drawings by Jenny Barone; photographs and a handmade paper work by Barbara Bishop; sculptural reliefs by Eduard Betenas; ceramics by Randall Edmonson; photographs by Elisabeth Flynn; and quilts, pillows, drawings, and handmade paper bas-reliefs by Homer Springer.

Enid Adams used French watercolor dyes on silk fabric to create the soft, luminous colors of her blouses and jackets. An adjunct member of Longwood's faculty, she has a studio in The Plains (Fauquier County) where she designs and produces yardage for clothing, accessories, and interior decoration.

Mark Baldridge's jewelry pieces — a ring, two pendants, and earrings — are of 14K gold and titanium with zircon, pearl, and diamond settings.

Jenny Barone is showing seven drawings done with gouache (opaque watercolros), ink and pencil. Ms. Barone, of Keysville, is teaching basic photography and drawing at Longwood this semester. She has taught previously at a community college and an arts center in New Jersey, directed a children's developmental program at Temple University in Pennsylvania, and has done illustrations for several textbooks.

The five "tabletop" sculptural works by Eduard Betenas are sandblasted soapstone reliefs of flower and plant motifs. They have intriguing titles — Voluntary Dependence, Celebration of Return, Flowers of Liberty, Melodical Keynotes, and Sequential Breakthrough.

Three of Barbara Bishop's selenium-toned photographs are studies of the exterior of Briery Church that capture the geometric interplay of light and shadow on the vertical siding. The fourth photograph shows several cats sunning themselves in front of a rundown country store-gas station.

Ms. Bishop's handmade paper work is titled "Earth Shelter,

From Russia With Hate

By JOHN BARRON
C 1985 The Reader's Digest Assn. Inc.

On an Afghanistan hillside one summer morning in 1984, ten-year-old Narainjan was tending his sheep. The pure highland air was balmy, the meadows were tranquil, and the war seemed far away.

Pursuing an errant lamb, Narainjan spotted something very pretty lying in the grass. White and glistening in the sunlight, it looked like a jewelry box. But the instant he picked it up, the box exploded.

Another shepherd found Narainjan unconscious two hours later. His left hand was a mangled mass, and only the little finger and half an index finger remained on his right. Three days passed before the mojahedin (freedom fighters) managed to smuggle him into a hospital in Kabul, the Afghan capital, where a surgeon amputated his left hand.

Unable to hold a stick or toss a stone, Narainjan never can be a shepherd again. He cannot dress himself. With difficulty, he can hold a spoon in what is left of his right hand. Now a refugee in Pakistan, he hopes someday, some way, to go to school. "I think I might learn to hold a pencil," he told me.

Doctors at the Afghan Surgical Hospital in Peshawar, Pakistan, near the Afghan border, and from the International Medical Corps recount similar case histories: a seven-year-old maimed by a blast from a seemingly harmless canteen; a 12-year-old shorn of three fingers by an explosive charge concealed in a pen; a toddler mutilated by a bomb disguised as a doll, perhaps the most diabolical form yet seen of these Soviet weapons specifically targeted at children.

Occasionally, the blast from such a "plaything" kills a very small child. But the real purpose of the toylike bombs (some concealed in brightly colored miniature trucks, planes or balls) is to maim. The Soviets load them with just enough explosive to remove or mutilate feet and hands. Children thus crippled become living symbols of terror.

No one knows how many children these "toys" have dismembered. But testimony from the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and from numerous foreign and Afghan physicians indicate that the number of young victims, such as the five-year-old above, may run into the thousands.

The Ibn-i-Sinna Hospital in Peshawar is small and difficult for Afghans to reach. Yet, during interviews there, I learned that in the first three months of 1985, relatives brought in 15 Afghan children whose hands or feet had been blown up by disguised explosives.

The military hospital in Kabul, the Soviet-occupied capital, has regularly treated victims of toy bombs. Dr. Abdul Satar,

On Orientation

Longwood's Freshman Orientation is a great concept. The acne-prone kiddies get to come to college four days early to get acclimated into the new environment that is the Longwood Country Club.

They get to know one another and the school, tour the library, sign the honor pledge, fix up their rooms and introduce ARA to their untested innards. These challenging tasks are scheduled all day long. But when the sun goes down, it's Miller Time!

These kids thought that they had partied after graduation and during the summer, but they've never seen the quantity and consistency of the Freshman Orientation alcohol binge. Many upperclassmen are back early to lend an I.D.; an R.A. or orientation leader may also be willing to buy a case or two. Of course the transfer students are the ones to take the leadership role in collecting for a bulk purchase. Does anyone know why transfer students are invited to orientation? Transfers never attend any of the meetings. When I transferred, my Orientation leaders told me that I didn't have to attend any meeting except the signing of the honor pledge. I didn't even make that bash on account of being passed out.

The trouble with Orientation is that there is nothing to do at night except drink (or is that the problem with Longwood?). This year there was not one Orientation event scheduled for nightime. So the newcomers are left with walking around, visiting Lankford (also known as grandma's living room - "don't touch the furniture"), Student Union, or shot-gunning a six-pack.

I spoke with a few Orientation leaders this week, all of whom basically agreed with my theory here. All of these upperclassmen felt that overall, orientation was a success. Orientation Chairperson Barney Smith should be congratulated. Attendance was good and things ran smoothly.

Complaints included: some of the programs were boring and unnecessary, the first day was too eventful and rushed and apparently didn't anticipate mom and dad sticking around after delivery of the shy pre-pubescents. Everyone added: "There was nothing to do at night." Was there drinking? "Huge amounts." See? I told ya. And whatever happened to the S-UN passes for all the good freshmen who went to all the programs?

A student's first days at Longwood are very important to student development. That is why thousands of dollars are spent to bring the whole crew in early for some sort of orientation. Something isn't right though. I think the pace that is being set during orientation is for many, one of vacation wonderland. For some students, this party attitude continues throughout the semester, and may even lead to flunkouts, drop outs or pull outs who end up as sanitation workers or small-time newspaper editors.

My kid brother's suitemate in Curry went home for good after a couple days of "dis-"orientation. The poor guy probably went home because he was a bed-wetting wuss, not ready for the out-of-doors, but maybe he went because he did not think he could handle the non-stop party if a real semester was anything like orientation.

I know at least one administrator is reading this and trying to invent a rule to fix it (ban alcohol, ban Par-Bils, or put a fat lady on each hall to smell breath and smack the fannies of all drinkers). Rules are not the answer. Afterall, college must teach us to be proper drinkers as well as how to be good swimmers (Have I yelled about that mandatory swim test yet?).

Orientation needs to be reevaluated. Make it shorter or don't make it mandatory, so people who don't care, don't come. Or kill orientation all together and let the little water heads bump into things for a week.

Letters To The Editor

A Non-Response To A Letter...

Dear Editor:

I was concerned by the misinformation and tone expressed in John Colangelo's letter to the editor (Rotunda, 10-29-85) and feel a responsibility to clarify the issues discussed. I am not quite sure how to interpret your pithy response, "Get off Johnny C.!", but if by that you mean to express support for Mr. Colangelo's tirade, I think you deserve an explanation as well.

I sympathize somewhat with Mr. Colangelo's anger. The project in which he was asked to participate has been handled in part by our Resident Assistants, most of whom have done excellent jobs. However, knowing Mr. Colangelo's RA, I can understand how John would have difficulty understanding what was going on. In any case, the "asinine student survey" Mr. Colangelo threw in the trash is a small part of what we are calling the Longwood Involvement Project, begun this semester with all third-semester students (sophomores, more or less). We have several goals for the project, but the primary one is to get students thinking about how they are spending their time in college and how they might be able to get the most they can out of their investment of at least four years and a great deal of someone's money in a college education. It's not enough just to collect your credits and degree (if you want testimonials to that effect, I can refer you to several recent graduates); there's a lot more to getting a quality education than that, and students are misleading themselves if they think otherwise. Furthermore, we believe that involvement in college can be quite productive both for the individuals concerned and the college as a whole, and since you yourself have raged in these pages recently about apathetic students, I would think you would be supportive of efforts to counteract this apathy.

So the purpose of the survey and the discussions we are having in the next few weeks with groups of sophomores is to convey those messages and talk briefly with them about how they can get the most out of their time in college. Colleges are, and should be held, accountable for a number of things, including providing a range of quality opportunities for learning, both in and out of the classroom. Colleges are not accountable for holding students' hands and making sure that they take advantage of those opportunities — and few, if any, colleges, make any effort of that kind. At Longwood, we do believe it is our responsibility as educators to make students aware of these issues and these opportunities, and the Involvement Project is our attempt to do so.

I am genuinely sorry that Mr. Colangelo seems so negative about that whole process, and can only hope that my letter will help clarify his concerns and mollify his anger. If not, I can only say that he is perfectly entitled to take his "seventeen hundred dollar tuition . . . somewhere else" where they really don't care what he gets for his investment of time and money.

By the way, while it seems to be popular among Longwood students to "blame" Barb Gorski for just about everything they dislike these days, she is not solely responsible for the Involvement Project. She is a part of a team of people who have been working on the project for almost three years now; if Mr. Colangelo wants to complain directly to someone, let him complain to me, not Ms. Gorski.

Sincerely,
Bill Moore
Student Development Educator

Editor's reply: I don't see how any "misinformation" was cleared up. Mr. Moore has done a wonderful job in summarizing the Involvement Project (something I wish a reporter could have done), but John Colangelo's letter (reprinted at right) is completely ignored. The Involvement Project is a great idea; by helping interested students direct their energy into clubs and organizations, the Involvement Project could be a large step towards easing Longwood's non-involvement. When The Rotunda was asked to take a small part in the Involvement Project, we responded immediately, ready to help in anyway. Perhaps Mr. Colangelo feels that the Involvement Project is a great idea, we really cannot tell since he does not discuss the project at all. Mr. Colangelo is upset with the fact that he has to fill out "some asinine survey" before he is allowed to join the elite ranks of those allowed to pre-register. Forced participation is an item not-so-slickly avoided by Mr. Moore in his non-response. I guess we can take this non-response as meaning: "Yes, we force participation, but only because this project is so magical and potentially beneficial to Longwood."

Gee Whiz, what is the point of blackmailing people to participate in an involvement project? I don't want unmotivated people forced onto the Rotunda staff. Hell, why don't we go all out and tell students they can't eat dinner unless they join an organization? Maybe we can even choose the organization they join. Maybe we can create a new organization and ban all others!

If it sounds communist, that's because it is. But that is not why Colangelo mentions Barb Gorski; Gorski is brought into it because her name appears alone at the bottom of every Involvement Project information sheet ever typed.

Dear Mr. Editor,

When I enrolled at this college a year and a half ago, I was told that all that was required for a student to pre-register for courses was the payment of the tuition deposit and any delinquent fines that may occur. Yet this year I was handed some survey, of which I know nothing about, and told that if I did not fill it in and return it that I would not be permitted to register for classes. When I was informed of this fact, I promptly threw my survey in the trash! Now I may be wrong, Lord knows I have been before, but where in the hell does the student handbook or the college catalogue state that I have to complete some asinine student survey so that I may be eligible to register for classes. If this college wants to throw me out because I have refused to fill in a questionnaire, then to hell with them, I'll go somewhere else and take my seventeen hundred dollar tuition with me. I'd be interested in knowing Ms. Gorski's and the board of trustees' opinion on this.

Respectfully submitted,
John C. Colangelo

Drinking Age

By KAREN WALLACE

How many of you were born on July 3, 1966 or a few months after? As you already know, this is the date that determines if you are of legal drinking age. Do you under age students feel that you were handed a bad deal? Many of the so called "Minors" think so. One Longwood Freshman said "it is not as important that I cannot drink, but would at least like to join my friends at D.T.'s on Thursday and Friday nights." This unfortunate group of people will not even be able to enter into a bar until their junior or senior year of college, and then just one or two years later, are expected to enter into their chosen profession and-or take on the responsibilities of a family.

The law may have changed, but does Longwood have the right to exclude those who are under age from participating in campus functions. There are several events here on campus, such as the Pre-Mixer mixer, which took place Friday, Oktoberfest Weekend, where no one under 19 was permitted. If there is an eventon campus for Longwood students, all Longwood students should be allowed to attend. We are all college students, taking on college level responsibilities. Why should half of us attend parties, kegs or no kegs, while other fellow classmates are excluded on the basis of what year they were born? Is this really fair? Several upper classmen as well as freshmen feel that it is not.

Thank You...

To The Editor:

A word on "My Page" in the Tuesday, October 29, 1985 issue of the Rotunda: Bravo!

Even though I am just a freshman at Longwood, I have a lot of school loyalty and pride. I hate to think that a passer-by will see Longwood as a trashbox because the entire front lawn is covered with beer bottles, cans, and paper airplanes. I was so disgusted at seeing all that trash that I picked up a Safeway paper bag and went out and cleaned it myself.

Not only do things get thrown out on the front lawn, but, as you pointed out, they get hurled out of the front windows, too. I have had dial soap thrown at me, a water ballon smashed at my feet, and a bee-bee shot at my Curry 7th floor window while I was in front of it. Needless to say, if the window had been open it would have hit me.

I don't see what is so difficult about tossing something in the trash. It seems to me to be easier than walking over to your window, opening it, throwing out the item at hand, closing the window, and then going on with what you had been doing before.

I'm really getting tired of looking up to see what might be coming down when I walk out of Curry. If people are going to be so immature as to throw things out of the windows they might as well go home.

Thanks,
Robin Martin

Darconville's Cat Reviewed

By VIRGINIA ARMIGER GRANT

Are you ready for a good ride? Warning: the horse is huge, hard mouthed, and rushes his jumps. He pins back his ears and rolls his eyes horribly if you try to tighten the girth. He is independent minded, reaches with a long lead, and has a pounding gallop. But he gives a magnificent ride to the experienced rider; the timid need not try.

When I finished reading Darconville's Cat by Alexander Theroux, I felt as if I had ridden that horse.

As we were privileged to hear Dr. Theroux give a reading from his works on November 4, it might be interesting to learn something of who and what he is. He taught here in the Longwood English Department in the early seventies and his small-southern-girls'-school experience gave him ample material for a novel, about 600 pages worth!

The plot of the novel is simple: a young professor falls in love with a blonde student; she betrays him; he goes mad and dies, lonely and ill, in a Venetian villa.

A one sentence plot summary is the only simple thing there will ever be about the book. Dr. Theroux's style has been called bombastic, fantastic, and iconoclastic. It is all three. He has been compared, to his personal delight I am sure, to James Joyce, one of his favorite writers. While literary history very well may regard him as the American James Joyce, I believe there is also the possibility that, in the long run of literary criticism, Joyce may be regarded as a pre-Theroux figure. (Once a reader has made the introduction to Theroux's writing, neutrality is impossible — the reader finds pleasure of pain, but not apathy).

His first novel, Three Wogs, was published while he was teaching at Longwood and the writing of it is one important theme running through Darconville's Cat. Darconville is not only a novel in its own right, but, for us here in Prince Edward County-Farmville-Longwood, it is a very personal commentary. Theroux is kind to no one nor anything. However, when he satirizes recognizeable personalities on our campus, he is honestly not doing so for the sake of revenge or personal affront. (He was well liked here). He is assimilating his experience, certainly; but, primarily, he is writing. Dr. Theroux lives for the purpose of writing. It is his call, his profession, and his passion. And he has the gift of recognizing the gift in himself. He is a large man, both physically and artistically, a man truly blessed with an absolute belief in himself.

Even if the current college reader is not interested in a psychoanalysis of what makes Theroux tick, the novel itself gives two interesting rewards. First, there is a satisfaction which comes from just having got through the massive thing. (Theroux's style is not easy reading). Second is the delight of walking in the middle of a novel. Quinsyburg is real. Quinsyburg College, complete with Rotunda and chiming clock, is real. Many of the personalities are still here. Dr. Theroux (Darconville) really did wear a black cape, write with a black pen, live in a bare apartment, drive a Bentley, and fall in love with "Isabel." Even if the students of the 80's do not connect into the remembered facts, they can picture the situation quite clearly in a physical setting which is unchanged.

Copies of Darconville's Cat are available (at a thoroughly decent price) in the Longwood Bookstore. The library may (one hopes) contain other of his works. The Bookstore will be happy to order copies of any of Theroux's works.

Fellowships (1967-69 and 1983-84, respectively), a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1976, two NEA Creative Writing Fellowships (1977, 1983), and the Before Columbus Foundation american Book Award for Fiction in 1982.

The John Dos Passos Prize was established in 1980 at Longwood. It commemorates an important 20th century American author by honoring other writers in his name.

The winner is chosen by an independent jury appointed by the college each year. This year's jury included previously Dos Passos Prize winners Gilbert Sorrentino and Tom Wolfe, and William C. Woods, a member of Longwood's English faculty and administrator of the prize.

Three." The artist has stated that she works with handmade paper because "it collaborates in the development of pieces that express my feelings and philosophies about natural forms and phenomena and . . . my symbolic interpretations of the man-used environment."

Randall Edmonson is showing four stoneware pieces that illustrate the sharp contrasts that are possible in the ceramic arts. Two of the pieces are raku-fired "vessels," unadorned and rustic. The other two are sophisticated serving pieces, with satiny black glaze and varicolored slips.

Elisabeth Flynn's color photographs capture the "rhythm" of a staircase, the kaleidoscope of an iron and stained glass dome, and the symmetry of arches and columns built centuries ago. She also has photographed some of the great sculptures to be found in Italy.

Dr. Flynn conducts summer art study tours in Western Europe and takes hundreds of photographs for use in the art history courses she teaches at Longwood.

For his quilts and quilted pillows, Homer Springer has used mostly cotton fabrics, some with "store bought" prints and some on which he has airbrushed original color and design.

"Nest Builder" is a handmade paper bas-relief. At first glance, the viewer sees a brown bird perched on its nest; then the eye is drawn to a small "aged" photograph of a little girl rocking her teddy bear. "Longwoodland" is a xerography, airbrush, and ink work that is based on faces from old college yearbooks.

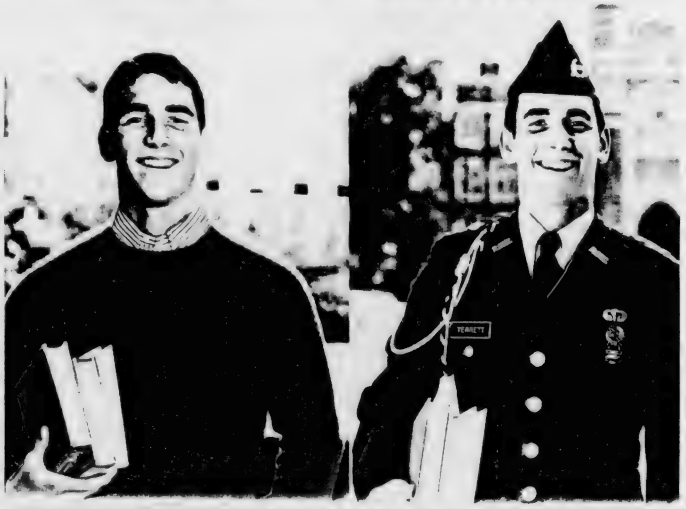
The exhibit is open to the public during regular Bedford Gallery hours: Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to noon and 2 to 5 p.m., and Sunday, 2 to 5 p.m.

GET TWO EDUCATIONS FROM ONE COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIP.

An education in your chosen major. And an education in becoming an Army officer. You get both with an Army ROTC scholarship.

Army ROTC is the college program that trains you to become an officer, a leader and a manager.

You take ROTC along with your other studies, and graduate with both a degree and a second lieutenant's commission.



Best of all, you can put both of your educations to work right away. In today's modern high-tech Army, we need engineers, communications experts, computer specialists, and other professionals.

Our scholarships cover full tuition and required fees. They also provide an amount for books, supplies and equipment, as well as an allowance of up to $1,000 each school year they're in effect.

So if you think all scholarships just provide you with a college degree, look into an Army ROTC scholarship. You'll be in for quite an education.

Ambassador's Telethon

By KIM SETZER

Last week, October 28-31, the ambassadors called parents of new students and transfers for pledges. This was needed because only 42 percent of the College's total operating budget comes in the form of state tax dollars. The rest must come from fees, auxiliary enterprises, and most importantly private gifts from our alumni and parents. Private gift support to the Parents' annual fund provides special departmental programs and activities, student financial aid, and career planning and placement programs.

The goal this year was estimated at $7500 from 300 donors. The goal was exceeded. $16,318 was received from 557 donors. The top three engrossing ambassadors were Denna Moors - $1181, Laurie Ziegler - $1180, Mable Hamlette - $1125. Ten ambassadors called each night. Amy Ethridge was the Telefund Chairperson.

Stephen R. Meyers is the chairperson of the Project ASSET steering committee. He graduated in 1983 with a baccalaureate degree in chemistry. He is employed as a Polymer chemist from 1983 to present with Allied Colloids, Inc. in Suffolk, Va. — a British Chemical Corporation specializing in the manufacturing of water-soluble polymers. From spring 1985 to present: member-at-large and executive committee member of the Longwood College Alumni Council. He has written a letter for print in the ROTUNDA concerning Project ASSET:

Letter to Longwood College Student Body

This past spring the Alumni Association's governing body — the Alumni Council — established a steering committee to develop and implement an alumni sponsored student externship program entitled Project ASSET.

The Alumni Council, in cooperation with the Office of Alumni Relations and the Office of Career Planning and Placement, has developed this externship program to allow students the opportunity to obtain a first-hand view of a specific career parallel to his or her chosen field of study. The externship pairs a student with an alumnus of Longwood whose profession is of particular interest to the student. Through this unique arrangement students are provided with a brief but realistic scenario of "real world" situations while at the same time gaining valuable and sellable work-related experience.

Alumni with careers in the arts and sciences, business, and education have responded eagerly to our alumni sponsor campaign: now it is time for the students — you — to begin the registration process to enroll in Project ASSET. Additional information and-or application forms may be obtained from either the Office of Alumni Relations or the Office of Career Planning and Placement.

This program has been developed to be of benefit to you by providing you with a head start in today's fiercely competitive marketplace. I strongly encourage you to take advantage of the externship program and its numerous tangible benefits and to turn your externship into an asset.

From Russia With Hate

formerly a senior surgeon there, explained that the Soviets plant the devices around their garrisons to discourage children from trading with Russian soldiers. Many of the soldiers eagerly sell weapons for hashish.

The toy bombs are part of a Soviet strategy that deliberately targets civilians. Since invading Afghanistan in December 1979, the Soviet army has failed to subjugate the Afghan people. Therefore, the Soviets have resolved to depopulate the Afghan countryside by exterminating or driving out civilians.

Typically, in the early morning villagers hear the scream of jets, then shattering blasts of bombs bursting in their midst. Simultaneously, the jets may scourge surrounding fields and all those tilling them — with napalm or "sheets of fire," as the Afghans call it. Then MI-24 helicopter gunships, hovering at close range, devastate the village with rockets and machine guns. After these air strikes, the Soviets rain down surface-to-surface rockets or artillery shells on the remnants. Finally, Soviet troops enter the village and shoot any man, woman, child, or animal that moves.

Because Soviet tactics have become so familiar, villagers flee to caves or mountainsides at the onset of a bombardment. When the assault stops, the villagers round up what animals they can find and trek off toward the unknown.

Those caravans of misery can be seen increasingly in the mountain passes. French nurse Chantel Bruno-Lannot joined one lst year. "Many of the children had their feet wrapped with shreds of fabric," she recalls. "It was a terrible sight, this endless line of humans and animals dragging themselves through the snow in the bitter-cold night."

To date the Soviets have driven more than four million Afgans from their homeland, roughly a fourth of the population. About three million have reached border camps in Pakistan. Most of the rest have fled to an uncertain future in Iran.

Basul was 12 when the Soviets killed his parents. The first bombs fell while the family was drinking breakfast tea, and the explosion killed his mother instantly. After the bombardment, Soviet troops entered the village, and Basul watched as they led his father and two other men to a clump of trees. There, they stabbed all three, then shot them to death. In all, the Soviet soldiers killed approximately 40 men, women and children before leaving the village in mid-afternoon.

Carrying his three-year-old brother on his shoulder, Basul led his sisters, ages four, five and six, and his seven year old brother toward Pakistan. It took them almost two weeks to hike the 40 miles, begging for food along the way. Basul, now 13, hopes to return to Afghanistan to fight with the mojahedin.

Last spring a Soviet force of airborne troops, armor, artillery and aircraft attacked villages in the Qarghai district of Laghman Providence. Amir Khan, a mullah (priest), and Ghulam Sakhi, a 70-year-old farmer, helped to bury the dead. Some women and children had been bayoneted to death. Others had been burned alive with gasoline.

I interviewed Amir and Ghulam only two weeks after the massacre. Ghulam wept uncontrollably as he recounted how villagers discovered the dead body of his infant niece.

The Soviets are exterminating Afghan children by still other means: eradicating medical care in regions dominated by the mojahedin. "Almost all doctors and health personnel have been either killed, imprisoned or driven away," states Dr. Abdullah Osman, president of the Union of Afghan Mojahed Doctors. "The health facilities in these territories have been burned or bombed to the ground, or emptied of supplies and closed." Nowadays, foreign doctors hide their clinics in caves or beneath mountain overhangs, but the Soviets continue to seek out and obliterate them.

The absence of medical care has caused a resurgence of diseases that had been controlled. Today, roughly 30 percent of all Afghan children die in infancy, victims of measles, diphtheria, pneumonia, malaria or gastrointestinal disorders. Tuberculosis afflicts at least 13 percent of the entire population.

Yet the Afghans' will and courage are unbroken. Nurtured and supported by people who forage for food and till the fields under cover of darkness, the mojahedin fight on. Armed with obsolete weapons and short of basic supplies, they still control more than 80 percent of the territory. Even in the cities, the Soviets dare not venture out except in large, well-armed groups.

Project Asset

By KIM SETZER

Wouldn't it be neat to be able to work one week with an alumnus who is in the same field that you are interested in? Project ASSET enables students to do this. Project ASSET is the Alumni Sponsored Student Externship Tandem, it is a framework for a special partnership — a partnership that will give Longwood students a real headstart toward achieving career goals.

Project Asset will give second, third, and fourth year students an opportunity to test the water in their chosen careers, to see how the reality compares with their expectations. The externship can also remove many of the student's fears about entering the real world of work, can give them practical and functional knowledge in their fields, and can provide a sense of confidence to bolster them in the search for employment.

Perhaps the most valuable part of the ASSET experience for the student extern will be the personal contact with a Longwood alumnus. The expertise and guidance of a successful person with a "special connection" can be invaluable in helping students make decisions they can live with.

Project Asset will be directed by a Steering Committee composed of representatives from the Alumni Council, the Director of Alumni Relations, the Director of Career Planning and Placement, a representative from the Organization of Teaching Faculty, a representative from the Academic Affairs Office, and a representative from the Student Government Association.

From this program, students will find out if they enjoy the field, if their academic background will enable them to perform it, and if they have the skills and needs to perform this job. The three main areas are Richmond, the Tidewater Area, and Northern Virginia. The time pushed for to carry out this program is January 5-9, 1986. There is no paperwork and there is a lot of on the job experience to be gained. This program is directed to sophomores, juniors and seniors, but freshmen who are positive about their fields may be accepted in Project ASSET. Niki Fallis, Director of Career Planning and Placement states of Project ASSET, "I support and encourage this because for one week the students can accept responsibility and can see how the world of work operates in a particular field. This participation could possibly result in helping the students make decisions about his or her choice early on."

Cadets Conducts Field Leadership Exercise

By Cadet Capt. Chris Wright

The ROTC Cadet Batallion conducted their 1985 fall FLX this past weekend at Foret A.P. Hill. The FLX is a field leadership exercise conducted twice a year, in the fall and the spring.

The senior cadets, MSIV's, conducted all of the training, while the Junior cadets, MSIII's, received the training. The MSIII's were given the opportunity to familiarize themselves with the M-16 A1 rifle on Saturday. They fired numerous rounds on the familiarization range which gave them some valuable experience using the weapon. The cadets were also taken through various tactical situations, and were given classes on various aspects of military skills and training. On Sunday, the cadets were put through a land navigation course (in which) they moved through the woods with a compass and found various points throughout the course. All of the cadets were then bused back to Longwood on Sunday afternoon. Cadet Major Tony Costanzo, who performed the duty of Batallion Commander, stated that despite the bad weather, he felt that the training was excellent, and that he was glad that the MSIII's were able to learn something. Cadet Captain Steve Kidwell also added, "It was definitely a fun weekend. I feel both the MSIII's and MSIV's got a good look at how dedicated one must be to be a good leader."

Last summer the daring mojahedin blunted a major Soviet offensive in the strategic Panjshir Valley. Other forces, under the command of Gen. Rahim Wardak, initaited one of the boldest offensives of the war by surrounding and besieging the communist-held city of Khost. Mojahedin saboteurs destroyed some 20 jets on the ground, and urban guerrillas in Kabul blew up Soviet offices and their occupants.

Given their valor, there is still hope for the Afghans and their children. But that hope depends primarily on the rest of the world. The Afghans need almost everything — food, medicine, clothes, boots, mine detectors, ammunition, modern rifles, long-range rockets and surface-to-air missiles.

Equally important, they need the unequivocal moral and political support of the outside world.

Religious Activities Calendar

By ROB WILKERSON

(The following begins a weekly column meant to keep "Rotunda" readers aware of religious activities related to the Longwood campus. Hopefully, for the remainder of the semester, info. from other organizations will be received. RW)

On two days, Nov. 6 and Nov. 13, a new Bible study group will be held at the Wesley Foundation Center. The study will be made up of a two part series on the Advent and the birth of Jesus. The Rev. Kim Hull, minister of the Keysville United Methodist Church and Asst. soccer coach for Longwood will be leading study group.

Dr. Janet Greenwood will be the guest speaker at the Foundation on Nov. 20 for an informal Question and Answer meeting.

And, each Friday night and on specified Saturday afternoons videos are shown at the Foundation. Show time at night is 7 p.m. and on Saturday afternoons at 2 p.m.

WUTA Airs

By KAREN WALLACE

WUTA went on the air Wednesday, October 9. For those of you that have not yet tuned in, the first few days, according to Bruce Souza, Program Director, "went pretty good."

The 85-86 radio station is enthused about their fifteen new D.J.'s. There are also fifteen veteran D.J.'s returning from last year. Sunny Merchant was elected unanimously for the second year in a row as the General Manager. He is responsible for getting the station back together. The rest of the officers include, Rob Robertson - Station Manager, Bruce Souza - Program Director, Randy Hart - Chief Engineer, Natasha Mahmood - Public Relations, and News and Sports Directors Beth Peat and Melanie Bert.

WUTA will be playing a variety of music like new wave, country-western, oldies, and rock. On Saturdays and Sundays, in the morning, they will be playing Jazz and classical music. The station is making plans for some special shows, which will be announced in a weekly schedule printed in the ROTUNDA.

WUTA is operating at 90.1 FM. They are broadcasting in mono, and transmit ten watts. Listening is within a five to ten mile radius.

The Radio Club meetings will be held every Wednesday night at seven o'clock in Grainger room 19 for all interested in participating.

Blind Date Quiz...

Being the popular guy on campus that you are, five girls who you've never met have asked your roommate to set one of them up with you for a date. With your best interests at heart, your roommate sets you up with one — Tammy, Beth, Shelly, Lori, or Michele. He won't tell you which one, and it would be embarrassing to meet her and not know her name. Being kind and considerate though, he gives you these hints:

1 — Two girls major in chemistry, two in English.
2 — Two girls have blonde hair, one has red hair.
3 — Three girls are in sororities.
4— The only business major is not in a sorority.
5 — Both brunettes are in sororities.
6 — The English major not in a sorority has red hair.
7 — Neither Tammy nor Shelly is a chemistry major.
8 — The two AST girls do not have the same major or hair color.
9 — Michele is an English major.
10 — Tammy is in a sorority.
11 — Lori is not a brunette.
12 — Your date is the only ASA.

Who is your date, what color hair does she have, and what is her major?

Send correct answers to The Rotunda, Box 1133. Random drawing of correct entries will win a large pizza.

Stukes Wins Crown

Sophomore John Stukes, a transfer from Virginia State, made his debut as a Longwood wrestler a success Sunday afternoon as he won the 134-pound title in the James Madison University Takedown Tournament.

Competing against grapplers from several Division I schools, Stukes took four bouts by scores of 14-0, 10-0, 8-2 and 8-4. The sophomore, who qualified for the NCAA Division II Tournament last season at VSU, accomplished all this while not feeling up to par physically.

PETE WHITMAN

Also performing well for the Lancers in the tournament were defending champ Billy Howard, who finished second in the 167-pound class, and Pete Whitman, who was fourth in the 142 pound class. Howard had a record of 2-1 with wins by 10-0 and 3-2 margins. Whitman was 4-2 for the day. David Taylor had a 2-2 mark in the 190-pound class.

"Stukes and Howard both wrestled well and Whitman did a pretty good job," said coach Steve Nelson. "We're not in real good shape and that hurt us in several matches. We started out ahead, but then ran out of gas."

The Lancers will take part in the Campbell University Tournament this weekend in Buies Creek, North Carolina. Their first home match is November 19 when William & Mary visits.

Rugby

The Longwood College Men's Rugby Club played in the Ed Lee State Tournament on Saturday, Nov. 2. Longwood lost to VPI, in a hard fought contest, 16-15. Scoring for Longwood were Philipe Casenaue, Tim Seymour and George Martin.

Longwood plays its last home match against George Mason University on Saturday, Nov. 9, at the Presidents Field. All are welcome.

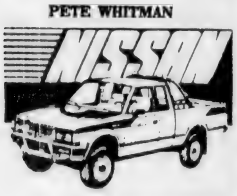
WOODSY OWL

Karn Spearheads Defense; Named Player Of The Week

ERICK KARN

Junior Erick Karn played a key role in Longwood's 3-1 soccer win over Hampden-Sydney last Wednesday and for his efforts, the 5-8, 160-pound sweeper has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period October 27 through November 3. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

"Erick did another outstanding job in our win over Hampden-Sydney," said Coach Posipanko. "He has been there for us in the clutch time after time all season."



Posipanko doesn't keep defensive saves for anyone other than the goalkeeper, but if he did, the unquestioned leader for the Lancers would be Karn.

A vocal leader who exhorts his teammates, Karn is the last line of defense before the opposition gets off a shot at the Lancer goalkeeper. More often than not he'll make a flying tackle to knock the ball away or simply kick it out of danger.

His play has been a key factor in Longwood allowing just 17 goals in 17 games and earning 19th place in the Division II national rankings with an 11-4-2 record.

This season he has played in 16 of Longwood's 17 games, but has taken just one shot. Karn seldom gets involved in the offense, but he spends a lot of time blunting the opposition's attack.

SCHEDULE OF EXAMINATIONS
FALL 1985

Examinations for the Fall Semester 1985 are scheduled at times determined by the regular class meeting time. For example, the examination for the classes normally meeting at 2 p.m. Tuesday and/or Thursday will be held 9-12 Thursday, December 17 in the regular class meeting location.

This schedule provides makeup periods on Thursday, December 12, Monday, December 16, and Tuesday, December 17. Makeup periods have been established so that students with valid reasons may arrange with the instructor to make up a missed exam.

Night classes will take their examination from 7-10 on the regularly scheduled night during examination week. The Wednesday night courses will take their examination from 7-10 on Reading Day.

Students having three examinations on one day may take one of the examinations during the conflict period or during a scheduled makeup period. The arrangements are to be worked out between the student and the instructor.

Involvement Project; Faculty VS. Administration

Sophomores Caught In Middle

Faculty View

By BRUCE SOUZA

On Monday Nov. 4 the Longwood College faculty and administration clashed in what some faculty members termed "a fiasco" and a "crisis situation." The situation arose as sophomore students began the pre-registration advising and counseling process on the above Monday. Since sophomore students were the only ones affected in this scenario a quick sketch of the events leading up to Monday Nov. 4 may be needed.

On Tuesday, Oct. 29, The Rotunda published a letter by John Colangelo; Colangelo, a sophomore, asserted his right not to fill out an informational survey associated with the Involvement Project sponsored by Student Development. The survey asked students 140 questions, and specified that compliance was compulsory to receive the paperwork necessary for pre-registration advising. As Nov. 4 rolled around, the full implication of Mr. Colangelo's complaint was realized by a seemingly unaware faculty. Many other students feeling as Mr. Colangelo did had also not filled out and turned in the surveys for similar and-or different reasons. By early Monday afternoon, many faculty advisors began to realize that Colangelo was not simply blowing off steam, but had in essence sent out an early warning that faculty and administration were dilatory in interpreting.

As more and more sophomore students began to turn up for advising without their pre-advising sheets and harboring complaints, the faculty began to act. For the faculty, one of the main concerns was simply the logistical problems which were becoming evident. Faculty members of the Business Department who are burdened with a high number of advisees saw havoc wreaked upon their scheduling process. The hold-ups and detailed obstinance of student Development administrators continued the delay in students receiving their forms. At this point, faculty members began pooling their complaints through their channels of communications and decided on collective action.

Faculty members The Rotunda talked to stressed their indignation over the perceived interference in a process which had been traditionally a faculty function. Student Affairs in the words of one faculty member "had no right to tie up the academic process." Another faculty member echoed faculty opinion by stating that it was "inappropriate to have a condition on registration. . . it belongs to faculty and not Student Affairs."

On Wednesday, Nov. 6, a meeting between faculty spokesmen and the president took place to resolve the problem. It was decided at this juncture that filling out the survey would not be mandatory and would not be tied to pre-registration. To the credit of all people involved, and by all accounts, the problem was resolved peacefully. Most faculty

Administration's View

By FRANK RAIO

It is important for the Longwood community to understand the other side of the Involvement Project story; the administrators taking part in the program feel that: 1) The survey was a success, 2) The Involvement Project is a valuable part of a Longwood education, 3) Proper procedure was observed when completion of the survey by sophomores was linked to pre-registration.

Student Development Educators Kathe Taylor and Bill Moore, who along with Barb Gorski and Meredith Strom make up the Involvement Project Group, told the Rotunda that although disappointed and surprised by the sudden opposition, the Sophomore survey phase of the Involvement Project appears to be an overall success.

The Involvement Project has been in the works for several years; directly related to the "Fourteen Goals," the project is an innovation in higher education's never-ending effort to allow students to "get more out of their tuition dollar." In fact, Bill Moore had been away all last week at a conference where he made an Involvement Project presentation to "impressed" collegues who are similarly charged with the responsibility of getting students to "try to think about how their time is spent and get the most out of their investment."

The Sophomore survey is only a small part of the Student Development Educators' effort to "make the fourteen goals more meaningful than just words," Taylor said.

The survey is a series of questions which, in Taylor's words, "make a snapshot picture of the student's past year." Students filled out the questionnaire and turned them in to the Student Development office. The surveys were returned to the students in small group discussions scheduled throughout the past week. Within these groups, administrators guide the third semester students through a review of the responses. This one-hour meeting provides "assessment and feedback" according to Moore, allowing students to take a look back at their freshmen year and perhaps encouraging them to get more out of their remaining years at Longwood. Taylor explains that sophomores were chosen as the target group because freshmen had demonstrated in a "pilot survey" last spring, that first-year students were "too academic-oriented" to think about getting more out of college; making grades and getting acclaimated to college life was enough of a burden.

The mere title, "Involvement Project," demonstrates the desirability of having participation mandatory; if students voluntarily took part in such programs, the Involvement Project itself would be unnecessary.

The Heat Source Of Longwood College

By JOHNNY C. PASTINO

The Longwood Boiler Room is located beneath the large 140 foot smoke-stack. In 1971, two of the four coal-fired boilers were converted to burn fuel oil. The other two boilers were put on standby for emergency use only. Some time later the idea of using wood chips was introduced. The use of wood chips involved some modifications to the two coal-fired boilers. This change from oil to wood chips has reduced fuel cost dramatically, consequently contributing to the overall Commonwealth's economy.

The location of Longwood College is in the heartland of Virginia where there is an abundance of forest products. Therefore, it was, and is, logical to make use of the wood chips and sawdust for our source of fuel.

Currently, wood chips and sawdust are furnished at a cost of $15.50-ton from a main supplier to about $21.00-ton from incidental suppliers. The wood chips and sawdust is obtained from several (up to 6) suppliers because no single supplier has the source and-or transportation facilities to meet our requirements during the winter season. The fuel utilization varies from about 300 tons in May to over 1,500 tons in December.

The amount of savings during

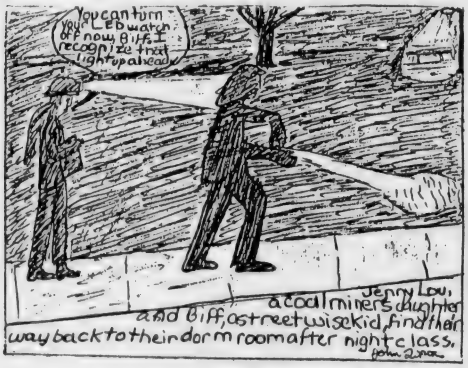
Letters To The Editor

Involvement Project

Dear Editor:



I am writing this letter as a response to the non-response letter of Bill Moore and in support of John C. Colangelo who seems to be just as serious as I am about our communist-minded administrators. I, too, received one of those asinine involvement surveys from my R.A. After questioning my R.A. its purpose, I was just as clueless as before. Her only advice to me was to complete it. Briefly examining the survey of 140 questions, I felt it to be a waste of my time, and therefore decided to work on some homework instead. Apparently in the eyes of the student development educators, my priorities are out of place because I chose academics over outside activities. Anyway, I trashed the survey, not giving it a second thought until I found another one shoved under my door with a note attached: "Pre-registration for spring classes will be cancelled if this survey is not completed." Well, I immediately took action. On the bottom of the survey were the names of the dictators Gorski, Moore, Strohm, and Taylor. I phoned Gorski and Taylor, both of whom were too busy to give any of their precious time to adhere to the concerns of a measley student like myself. However, Bill Moore was available for discussion.

I spoke with Mr. Moore over the telephone for approximately 35 minutes. I informed him that I was in favor of the survey for those who would benefit from it. However, I considered myself to be quite involved with the opportunities offered to Longwood College students, and therefore making this program irrevelant in my eyes. I am an active member of the Judicial Board, secretary of Phi Beta Lambda, and a work-study student, working 15 hours weekly. I have an adopted grandmother at a nearby nursing home. I also maintain a 3. g.p.a., currently tackling an 18-credit hour load. If that isn't involved, you tell me what is! Bill Moore responded that in place of participating in the survey that I could be given a special project to help fellow students." BULLSHIT!! Mr. Moore also took my phone number and said he would get in touch with me concerning this matter within three working days. It has now been three weeks later. I have not heard a word from him. He stated in his letter to complain to him and not to Ms. Gorski. He must have been joking. Don't even try to discuss the situation with him, it will do you no good.

Maybe the student development educators feel that it is their responsibility to make students get involved in college activities. However, as a college student and an adult, I feel that it is a person's own free will to do so, and preventing registration as a threat is totally ridiculous. If students want to become involved, they will. Forcing them is not the way.

I am sure this letter will have no effect on the manner in which those dictators overlook the concern of the students. The general opinion I hear from fellow students including myself towards these people is to stay the hell out of our lives! We don't want their concern or their stupid survey! As of now, I have no intentions of completing the survey. If I should decide to change my mind (I doubt that seriously) and complete the survey and attend a seminar, I will be doing so against my own free will!?! Do the students of Longwood College have any student rights?

More

Longwood College continuously astounds me with their new and exciting methods to screw over the students. I would like to submit another way of how to be screwed by the administration. When I received my Involvement Survey I was told the same thing as was Mr. Colangelo: Fill it out or you cannot register for classes. I felt that this requirement of personal information was none of their business; however, I went ahead and filled out the survey. Let it also be known that I did not pay much attention to what I was marking and therefore filled out the entire survey in less than five minutes.

When signing up for an appointment with my adviser I was informed that I would have to locate a Mr. Moore before advising to get some special registration form.

So, I went to Mr. Moore's office and asked for my form. It was only then that I learned of some special meeting that I had not attended which I would have to attend, in order to get my form. The reason I did not attend the meeting is simple; between the time of the survey and the time of the meeting I moved. My old R.A. did not contact me and my new R.A., whom I've never met, was not aware of the situation. Therefore, I had to cancel most of my nightime plans to attend the meeting. Had I not gone immediately to Mr. Moore's office to find out that I had to attend the meeting I would have been really screwed when it came time to be advised.

I attended the meeting and found it to be pretty much as I expected. The scores on the survey told our group that we were not highly involved in Longwood activities. Near the end of the session we were handed more survey sheets so we could sign up to get information on some of Longwood's activities. To appease the instructors, I marked a couple of things but it did no good. I still don't have enough time to be involved with an activity and to do Professor Fawcett's physics problems.

Although the survey and meeting were of no use to me, I feel that the survey does have potential. I feel that the survey would be better used for the freshman class in the middle of their first semester. I also feel that the survey should not be a case of do it or get screwed but rather a "HI, I'M your friendly R.A. This is a survey to increase student unvolvement and I'd like you to fill it out and return it." Sure, some of the students will throw it away but they would rather party than participate in an activity anyway. The people who are interested and don't believe that the survey is generally worthless will return it. As a freshman, I wanted to get involved but didn't know how or where. I would still like to get involved but a heavy course load kept me from attempting anything. Maybe if I find an easy semester or two I'll help out but until then I'll be doing physics!

Shower Blues

To the Editor,

Have you ever woke up in the morning and found yourself thinking about standing underneath a hot shower to wake you up, but then realize that you won't be able to because the shower head only reaches your chest? If you live in either Curry or Frazer dormitory your answer to this question is probably yes. It upsets me to think that the architect who designed the high rises had no sense of proportion. Whoever put the plumbing in these buildings must have been five feet tall. That's fine for the short people, but it presents a problem for all of us who are closer to six feet tall. It's not too comfortable to squat while taking a shower.

I expect a hot shower to do two things for me: wake me up in the morning; and get the creaks out of my back from sleeping in a bed too short for me. Of course, getting clean is a top priority too. Instead of easing the pain, I end up increasing it because of the position I have to stand in. The pain of the shower head-Home Proctologist is sure to wake me up, but it won't do any wonders for the creaks in my back.

After one exceptionally uncomfortable night's sleep, which gave me some colossal kinks in my back, I finally asked someone what the reason was for such short showers. The answer I got back was that if the shower heads were any higher you would be able to hang yourself on them. My reply to this was that if I wanted to commit suicide, a fall from the eighth floor would probably do a better job of it. I don't see any bars on the windows, so why worry about how high the showerhead is. I'm not saying there should be bars, or that I want them, but I would like to be able to stand under the shower without having to crouch or kneel to take a shower. .

John Paine

To the Editor,

Let me be the first to formally thank Virginia Armiger Grant, Graduate Ass't for mentioning the Longwood Players. Blithe Spirit was a production that a lot of students worked very hard to produce, whether on stage or not. Our next production will be The Diviners. It will be presented on the 20th through the 23rd of this month. Rehearsal for this show started two weeks before the opening night of Blithe Spirit.

To be in a play here, of course, requires an enormous amount of time. Basically, the only nights that participants have off are Fridays and Saturdays. Speaking for the veterans, we all think that it's well worth the sacrifice!

There is one point I would like to mention and commend concerning this letter to the editor! Much of the blame was put on students for not attending these shows. It's true, we don't have an ample following of students. The one factor that is even more disappointing is the lack of participation on the part of the faculty and administration. These few key people could fill Jarman to its capacity. It would be nice to get praise from our peers or faculty, for once!

A Longwood Players' season never ends. It's very discouraging to work so hard and not ever get public support.

BLIND DATE QUIZ...

THE ROTUNDA received over 50 responses to our Blind Date Quiz. Can you believe it? Me too, either. Maybe we should give away Pizza's for letters to the editor or news stories. Great idea! From now on, at the end of every month, we will give away a Pizza to the author of the best letter to the Editor.

Beth, a chemistry major with brown hair. Lots of people figured it out, but only Laura Clark's name was pulled from the hat.

Laura Clark lives in North Cunningham and will soon be munching on a delicious large ITZA PIZZA Courtesy of THE LANCER CAFE.

To the Editor,

I think something should be done about the littering and destruction that occurs during the week and especially on the weekends. The elevators in Frazer are a total disaster area on the weekends.

Parties are given, people get drunk and trash the elevators, not to mention the halls and the lawn. Broken bottles of every imaginable kind can be found on the lawns, in the halls, on the stairs, or almost anyshere on campus.

I am almost ashamed to bring my friends to Longwood on the weekends. Everything is so trashy. The lights might be out on the elevator or the halls and the elevator will definitely be trashy.

Why do the people here have to live like total pigs? Don't we have enough pride in our school to keep the campus clean? Evidently not!

Does it take that much effort to walk a few feet to a trash can and drop trash into it? It would save all of us tuition money that Longwood College spends to pay people to pick up after us.

The students here claim that they are responsible enough to be on their own but they are not even responsible enough to clean up after themselves. Are we adults or what?

THE DIRT FACTS

To The Editor,

Please note that there are some students who care for the landscaping of Longwood College. On Saturday the 10th from 1-3 p.m., the Alpha Phi Omega Service Fraternity and Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity worked together to clean and relandscape the back of Frazer and Curry. Thanks to the Physical Plant, 4 truck loads of mulch were provided to help the bushes before winter sets in. Other projects that have been done include; halloween trick-or-treating for MDA and putting down gravel by Lancer-tennis courts. The fraternities are working together with the college to help show that not all students are apathetic and to motivate those who are.

A party to raise money for the cut tree and the December Bloodmobile are still on their lists of projects. To any students who are interested in helping and are tired of apathy or have any ideas for other projects, please contact Kathy Schieb, Box 1154, or Tim Grahman, Box 430.

Senseless Vandalism

By KIM DEANER

Frazer dorm, as well as Longwood campus as a whole, has had an excessive amount of vandalism taking place this school year. This senseless vandalism has been brought to the attention of the administration and is not going to be tolerated especially concerning the problem of students throwing items from the windows.

In the Spring of 1985, $2,413 was spent on Frazer for replacement, repair, and cleaning. Much of this total was for replacement of such things as exit sign plate (5.00), ceiling tile ($3.00), elevator buttons and cover ($150.00), window screen ($15.00), window ($40.00), and inside stairwell door ($275.00).

This year in Frazer there has been such incidents as a toilet removed and demolished (not to be confused with the famous Spruce and Redford toilet; this toilet has an identity of its own), a fire alarm disassembled ($251.50), a bed thrown from a window ($145.00), a window shot with a beebee gun, stair-case railing broken, spray paint damage, fire extinguisher sprayed, exit sign stolen, phone disassembled, and furniture stolen from the lobby.

The problem of things being thrown from the roof and windows of Frazer is more serious to the degree that someone may be severely hurt. To prevent items from being thrown, the roof door was locked. Someone gained access to the roof by breaking the roof window and then threw a pumpkin on a car and caused $1,000 damage. The pumpkin dented the roof and broke the windshield.

If students continue to throw things from the windows a solution may be that all screens will be pinned shut.

The administration is dealing with the excessive trash in the halls after parties; two Fraternities have had restrictions placed on their chapter room parties because of trash problems on Oktoberfest weekend. The Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity can have only two parties until Thanksgiving and the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity can have no parties because they also broke a fire code by having too many people in their chapter room.

The problem of false fire alarms is being delt with by applying more strict sanctions. The administration is now recommending suspension of any student caught pulling a false alarm; first offense with no prior disiplinary record. In Frazer

Dorm Prowler

By SHERI WILKINSON

The description of this man is a five foot seven, black male of average build. He has entered many rooms in the colonades this semester while occupants were asleep or in the shower. So far he has been easy to scare away by just screaming or yelling at him.

So if you see a strange black male roaming the halls late at night or if he enters your room to scare you, call campus police. Keep the campus police phone number near your phone so you can contact them quickly and prevent it from happening again.

How would you feel if you were lying in bed half asleep when someone enters into your room and cuts off a small light across the room and walks toward you in your bed. This happened Saturday morning around 6:30 to a girl who lives in French dormitory. She scared him when she yelled to him "get out of here," so he ran out of the room.

The rumor around campus was that this man had been caught. The man has obviously not been caught so everyone needs to be aware of this so they can take the proper safety precautions.

N.Y.C. Weekend

The jazz, folk and rock class went on a field trip this past weekend to New York City. The members of the class who chose to go had a great time. Some students that went with the class before, went again for the second or third time. Couples from Farmville participated in the field trip also, they usually go every year.

The trip was reasonably priced that included a bus ride there and back and staying in South Gate Hotel for two nights.

The students went to see the famous New York City Broadway plays. Some of the musicals they went to see were: "The Odd Couple," "Forty-second Street," "Singing in the Rain." "Oh, Calcutta" and "La Cage Aux Folles." Viewing the plays in New York was great compared to seeing them on television or listening to them on tapes.

The students liked being on their own once they got there so they could see all the other attractions of New York City. Some of the things they did were:

— shopping at Bloomingdale's, Macy's Lord-n-Taylors, and Sax Fifth Avenue

— viewing New York City from the Empire State Building

— visiting the World Trade Center

— eating in New York's famous restaurants like Mamma Leonies

— visiting China Town

— going through Time Square and Central Park

— traveling around New York City by horse and buggy, by subway, by taxi

— bargaining with the vendors on the street

The night was as much fun as the day with the night life of New York. The students bars like the Hard Rock Cafe, or to see the Chippendales, or to Broadway musicals.

The opportunity to go to New York was a great experience for the students. Some say they can't wait to go next year.

ISL: WHAT IS IT?

By THERESA PFLUGER

"What in the heck is ISL?" If you've never heard of this newly formed organization, then I'm sure this same question has come to mind.

ISL is short for International Studies at Longwood. It is a new program this year that offers Longwood students a chance to broaden their knowledge about other countries, to become more aware of political events and foreign affairs, and to be exposed culturally in art and music.

Those students who are already involved in the program were offered a trip to U.Va. earlier in October to hear a lecture on Soviet politics. Also, an upcoming trip on November ninth to Washington, D.C., is scheduled. Other general events that have taken place, relating to the ISL Program, were the 18th Century Viennese Fortepiano Concert and Lecture given by Dr. Malcolm Bilson and the lecture and demonstration on the History of French Music by Professor Jim Kidd of Hampden-Sydney. On the lighter side of events held was that of the Chinese Golden Acrobats and Magicians.

This Program is special in that getting involved in itself is rewarding, not so much of a hassle as one might think.

Our committee, International Newscolumn will be reporting such topics concerning current events, editorials, special television programs to watch out for and radio broadcasting on International News as well will be presented.

So, in short, I'll just say I hope that this clarifies what ISL is and I hope that our upcoming articles will be well received.

Nutritional Survey

By JUDITH BURKS

When a student does not eat properly it can affect the way he feels physically and mentally. A student can study much better wehn he has eaten well balanced meals including the eight leading nutrients. If a student finds himself fighting to stay awake in a semi-interesting, morning class it could be because he is skipping breakfast. Breakfast is always the most enjoyable meal in Blackwell Dining Hall because there are never people waiting in line. On the way to class students are seen stuffing their mouths with M&M's and potato chips. To find out how students rank in their eating habits the Student Member Section of Virginia Home Economics is conducting a campus food habit survey. The questionnaire survey will be given randomly selected classes. There will be questions pertaining to how often a student snacks and what snacks are most often eaten. Also there will be questions on the type of meals students eat and how many meals are eaten per day. The survey serves as a way to find which foods the student eats has which of the eight leading nutrients and the caloric content. Results will be collected November 19. Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

Kier Review

by Connie Byerly

Last Friday night, the Lancer Cafe was the place to be when the Student Union presented Kier, an outstanding young performer. His repertoire included selections from the Beatles, David Bowie, Elton John, Billy Joel, and others. This excellent Coffeehouse performance attracted many more students than had originally been anticipated.

Interested in helping to put on performances like this one? The Student Union meets every Tuesday at 6:15 p.m. in the Conference room at Lankford. All are welcome!

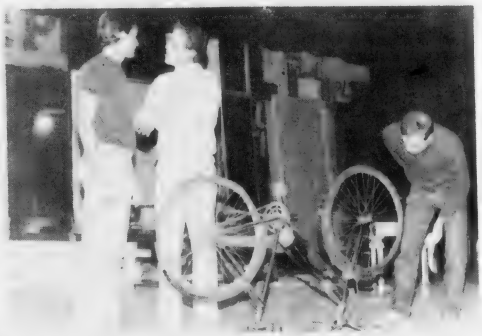
handfull of jobs. These employees were added to the production of heat, due to the necessary off-loading and transportation needed for the wood products. Louis Leonard, one of the employees at the boiler room says the work is "Very simple." When asked how he likes working there he replied that he "Likes it a lot."

The only increase in money was the consumption of energy. That increased from $397,358.08 in 1981 to $451,049.76 in 1984. This can be reduced by trying to reduce lighting levels in hallways, keeping doors and windows shut, and the effective use of blinds-shades in the dormitories.

the past five years has been over $200,000. In 1981 the total cost for fuel was $553,596.64 and in 1984 it was $357,287.03, which is a savings in spending by 65 percent. This savings in money by the school is given back to the Commonwealth of Virginia, because we are a state school and the money can be used better in other places.



Longwood College is currently petitioning the Commonwealth for $350,000 to finance new fuel loading system. The current system is a 47-year old bucket conveyor belt which the fuel is dropped onto and then carried to the boilers where it is burned and converted into heat. The new system will be more energy efficieant and productive.

The change from oil to wood chips and sawdust created only a

THE DIVINERS

Second Production Of Longwood Players

Toby Emert

Lights come up on a melancholy, rustic set — raked stage and random platforms — nearly barren with the exception of two characters, Basil and Dewey, who appear to be eulogizing (or at least lamenting) the death of a boy — an unusual boy — an idiot boy, Buddy Layman.

The set can be found in Jarman Auditorium as can Dewey, Basil, Buddy, and a host of other characters that comprise the cast of the Longwood Players' second production of the season. Jim Leonard, Jr.'s THE DIVINERS is an amusing, yet tragic, backwoodsy story of an idiot boy, a backslidden preacher, farmers, pretty girls, and the townspeople in a religiously superstitious rural community. The story centers around Buddy, who is a retarded boy of seventeen, and a would-be preacher, C. C. Showers, who comes to town looking for work after he decides that preaching is not his life's calling. The special relationship that these two develop is every bit as touching as the outcome of this relationship is tragic. And Mr. Leonard's script leads his audience through some very human scenes to an unforgettable conclusion.

This production is under the direction of Dr. Douglas Young, and it features Scott Koenigsberg as Buddy and Jett Driver as C.C. Both of these students are newcomers to the Longwood stage. Scott is a freshman, but he is not new to the theatre in general; in high school he performed in Annie Get Your Gun and in Two Gentleman of Verona. Jeff has done some student-directed work here at Longwood, but this marks his first major role as an actor. Others of the cast who are new to the Longwood stage as well include Darcie Brackett, who has worked behind the scenes in several productions, but appears onstage for the first time in this show, as Luella; Paige Anderson a freshman who recently worked publicity for BLITHE SPIRIT, as Darlene; and Anita Washington, a freshman from Richmond who has appeared in such shows as THE CRUCIBLE and PIPPIN, as Jennie Mae — Buddy's older sister.

Rounding out the cast are Longwood Player veterans Jeff Fleming as Basil; Curt Walker as Ferris, Buddy's father, Glenn Gilmer as Melvin; Mike Hart as Dewey; Laura Goodfellow as Norma; and Cassie Wallace as Goldie.

The show begins its run on November 20th and continues through November 24th with a special matinee performance for high school students scheduled for November 22nd. This play promises to be one of the best of this season's productions; be sure to see it. You won't forget it.

Next Week:

Longwood Scholars

Two freshmen, Tamara Brown and Amy Salvato, are Longwood Scholars, the designation for those involved in a prestigious scholarship program.

Miss Brown, of Wilsons, and Miss Salvato, of Springfield, are receiving scholarships of $1,000 annually. The scholarship is automatically renewable as long as each maintains a cumulative grade-point average of 3.35.

The scholarships, which are awarded on academic merit, are intended for students "who will bring distinction to Longwood during their student years and after graduation." Recipients are formally recognized at commencement and convocation.

Miss Brown, 18, has not declared a major, but she is considering a career in journalism.

Miss Salvato, 17, is majoring in English education and Spanish. She wants to teach English, or both. "I'd like to teach English in a Spanish-speaking country or as a second language in this country," she said.

Upon reading the summary printed last time in the Rotunda, several people questioned why individuals were found not responsible or no action was taken, particularly when the violations appeared to be so severe. It is important to remember that the hearing body has the responsibility to prove that the accused is responsible. Therefore, if enough information is not available it may be that the Board or Hearing Officer determined to take no further action in the case. It may also be clear, based upon the information presented, that the accused is not responsible. It is also important to remember that each case must be determined individually. A particular sanction may be imposed because the individual has already received in a previous hearing the lesser sanction typically utilized for that violation. It is also the responsibility of the hearing body to determine which sanction is necessary to ensure that this behavior will not occur again, therefore, a sanction may be imposed which others might believe to be severe.

Much information cannot be shared with anyone except the accused and the hearing body. All of us are protected by the Freedom of Information Act which states that such information does remain private. Therefore, readers are encouraged to utilize the above information to better understand the general standards of conduct but to refrain from establishing specific judgements based upon this information.

A Student Advocate's Group is forming. This group would be trained in the disciplinary system and would be available to assist students who are going before the Boards or a Hearing Officer. These trained students would not be able to act on behalf of the accused, but would be able to support the accused during the hearing. If you are interested, please contact Barbara Gorski, Director of Student Services. Her office is on first floor Tabb.

Note that any cases which are currently in appeal are not represented in the statistics above.

A SURVEY ON RAPE at the U. of Northern Iowa found that 36 percent of women students say they've been forced to have sexual intercourse, and 20 precent say they were victimized at least six times.

A NEW ABUSE OF DRUGS by teens and young adults involves intravenous injections of the drugs in nasal inhalants as a substitute for amphetamines, according to medical authorities. Accurate figures on the number of abusers are not available, but authorities warn the abuse is spreading.

HOME FOOTBALL GAMES at the U. of Kansas bring about $500,000 in business, per game, to local merchants, according to the Lawrence, Kan., chamber of commerce.

BODY PASSING is considered fourth-degree sexual assault by campus police at the U. of Wisconsin-Madison. Female students are frequently lifted and passed overhead to the top of the stadium. UW police have been combating the problem for five years, but have had little luck in stopping it.

A NEW DATING SERVICE, catering to Midwestern colleges, says it expected mostly freshmen, but the bulk of their business has been from seniors and graduate students. The service will give students names of potential dates chosen according to the students' answers on a 34-question survey. The questions range from smoking, to abortion, to the meaning of love and life.

BREAD NOT BOMBS is a slogan taken seriously by students at Brown U. The students are organizing a bake sale to raise money for a physics professor, so he would not have to accept funding from the Reagan administration's Star Wars program.

CITIZENSHIP SKILLS are not being taught by American schools, according to Ralph Nader. Nader has been speaking on campuses around the country, charging that "students are taught how to believe and not how to think. The learning process today is memorization, regurgitation and vegetation."

SEXUAL HARASSMENT IS COMMONPLACE in higher education, according to a study by the Indiana U. Office of Women's Affairs. The study found that, every year, about 25 percent of the women enrolled in college are sexually harassed.

DRUG TESTING isn't just for athletes anymore. Arizona State U. is testing athletes and cheerleaders for drug abuse this fall.

TRIVIA IS OUT: SCRUPLES ARE IN. According to merchants serving the U. of Nebraska area, sales of the game Trivial Pursuit have fallen and some stores are reducing prices to "get rid of them." The most recent fad is Scruples, a game in which players answer questions about morality and personal opinions.

MAINTAINING A "C" AVERAGE may be required of students receiving federal financial aid in the future. Because Congress is searching for ways to cut the federal budget, and there has been much said recently about poor students getting financial aid, the proposed change is expected to pass.

JUDGE SAYS U. VIRGINIA NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR FRATERNITY ACCIDENT. A state court ruled last week Sigma Chi officers were not acting as university agents when they planned a fraternity outing that ended when a truck filled with students and two kegs of beer overturned in 1982, killing two and permanently disabling Thomas Stumm, who now is suing for damages. In August, another court held the U. of Denver liable for a fraternity accident in which a student was injured.

Dining Service Advisory Committee Make Headway

The Dining Service Advisory Committee is seeing new faces at the meetings. These meetings are open to all students and are held in the upper dining hall every Tuesday at 6:15 p.m. If you cannot make it you can send questions to Mary Schraf, Box 1191. I will be posting questions and answers on the bulletin board outside of the dining hall.

New News

— We will be having juice at Saturday Brunch. Also, those who requested apple juice may find it on the side closest to the exit doors.

— Bagels will be served four times a week now. They will be out on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

— Questions about portion control? Due to waste of food only one portion will be given at a time. Downstairs will soon be making reasonable "custom cuts" on subs but only on request, otherwise you will receive the pre-cut portion.

— Good news for brunch. You can get whatever you want as long as you only get ONE meat at a time (meats include: roast beef, London broil, bacon, sausage, ham etc.) eggs are not meat!!!

— There will be a hot water dispenser out for tea in the mornings so don't get confused and think there are two coffee pots.

— The minutes of the Dining Service Committee will be posted on the bulletin board. We cover a lot at the meetings — you might want to glance at them while you wait to get into the dining hall.

YALE MARCHING BAND MEMBERS MAY GET MARCHING ORDERS. Several musicians mooned the fans at the Oct. 12 Yale-Holy Cross game, and band Director Thomas Duffy says that, after viewing videotapes of the incident, he may kick the mooners out of the band. 28. Think of a plan to abolish terrorism and free the American Hostages in Lebanon.

Alexander Theroux Reading

By DEIRDRE McKENDRY

Writer Alexander Theroux presented a reading from his new novel, "An Adultery" at Wygal Auditorium November 4.

Theroux is the author of poems, children's books, essays, and novels, and is currently writer-in-residence at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He is recognized for his linguistic precision and for providing a perspective of American society.

"An Adultery" is about personal relationships. The selection from the reading dealt with the relationship of the protagonist of the story to a girl named Angela. There is a close-up view of her family and where she lives. The relationship of Christian to Angela's mother is not a good one-due to her uneven temperament. She is described, at length within the novel, as a hypochondriac who "spent a lot of money trying to cheer herself up." Theroux hilariously, yet realistically, depicts this housewife.

The mother's temperamental personality leaves its toll on Angela, continually robbing her of her confidence. Angela seems like a quiet and withdrawn girl, and thus, Christian comes to the realization that she has led a 'lost and tragic life" when he spends the Christmas holidays at her home, watching her mother's sudden brutality during a quiet evening, criticizing Angela. He eventually ends up leaving her. Angela is a tragic figure because she isn't given the chance to grow as an individual. As Christian points out about their relationship, "We had nothing in common except our love." He ends up leaving this situation.

"An Adultery" is a delightful look at personalities and relationships, written with keen humor and insight into each character. The novel is to be published in the spring.

Dr. Alexander Theroux, a writer and former Longwood English professor, returned to campus recently to give a reading. Theroux, now a writer-in-residence at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, read Nov. 4 from a new novel that has not yet been published. An earlier novel, "Darconville's Cat," is based on his experiences at Longwood, where he taught from 1969 to 1973. His first novel, "Three Wogs," was published while he was at Longwood. He also has taught at Harvard and the University of Virginia and has written, in addition to novels, short stories, poetry, plays, essays and children's stories. He is a native of Massachusetts and lives at Cape Cod.

Leave a clean trail.

THE CAMPUS REACTION IS MIXED to the girls who posed for Playboy's October "Girls of the PAC-10" issue. A Washington State U. student who posed topless found herself unwelcome at her sorority house when she returned to school this fall, but an Arizona State U., student who posed wearing only cowboy boots says "people have been really great" and that she's enjoying the attention.

A HOMEMADE PIPE BOMB seriously injured a U. of Massachusetts student and blew out a residence hall window. The student and two others were using the device, made from a bicycle pump and explosive powder, to blow toilet paper out of their dorm window, when it misfired.

SOUTHERN CAL'S THETA XI fraternity nixed its "Kammana Wanna Lei-U" party theme in favor of an Octoberfest party after other USC Greeks complained the sexual overtone was offensive.

STOLEN MILK CRATES, used by students as bookcases, storage crates and makeshift entertainment centers, cost dairies big bucks. A dairy near the U. of Nebraska loses more than $100,000 a year.

Vandalism

there has been only one organized fire drill; all others (as many as five) have been false alarms.

The only way to decrease the amount of vandalism taking place is to have more participation by the students to report those individuals doing the vandalism. This problem is not focused just in Frazer it has become a campus wide concern of both students and administration.

God Fires
A Novel by William Hoffman
1985, VIKING PRESS

I have always wanted to write a book review column but I have always had a hard time finishing a book without starting two or three other ones at the same time. Well, I finally found a book that could hold my attention long enough to finish by itself.

William Hoffman's novel is a must for anyone who has lived in this area long enough to poke fun at its inhabitants. The novel itself takes place in a small town near Farmville. Mr. Hoffman has resided in Charlotte County, Virginia, for quite some time, himself.

The novel starts with the bizarre death of a somewhat permiscuous yet prominent businessman. The local prosecutor, who has not won a case as long as anyone could remember, decides to redeem himself by cracking this mysterious case. The prosecutor and the reader soon find out this is not your typical murder.

If you enjoy a good murder mystery with plenty of sex and action then check out this new novel. Even if you hate murder mysteries and deplore sex and action I still have a feeling you will find this novel quite enjoyable. See you next time when I review The New College Latin-English Dictionary.

Involement Project

Faculty

members and administration officials the Rotunda spoke to contended the matter was put to rest with the full cooperation of the administrators in charge of the Involvement Project. When asked who was responsible for creating the problem, the faculty responses were more diversified. Many faculty were content on stressing the peaceful solution of "an honest mistake" rather than assessing blame. Other faculty members believed the blame rested on the Student Development group, and that "Bill Moore shaped up as the turkey in this situation."

. . .And not for something completely different. Aside from problems presented by the Involvement Survey and pre-registration, questions concerning the actual content of the survey began to surface. Faculty members mirrored students objections to some of the questions that students had to answer. Questions on sexual values raised eyebrows of faculty and students alike. Some faculty members believe the methodology of the survey was suspect, and did not conform to normal ethical standards. There were even questions raised concerning the legality of requiring students to sign and be forced to particpate in any type of survey. Many faculty members put themselves in the students' place and emphatically stated they would have not filled out the surveys (either). Although the faculty members seem to support the Involvement Project in theory, it can be said that in this case the means did not justify the ends.

Administration

While some institutions have required "get involved" courses (Virginia Wesleyan College stipulates that first year students must enroll in a one-credit "Freshman Seminar" course, which along with introducing students to the fine arts, teaches them how to get the most out of school), a retired Longwood administrator first suggested that the Project be linked with registration." I think (ex-Vice-President for Academic Affairs) Dr. Vail first came up with the idea," Taylor said.

Current Vice-President for Academic Affairs, Dr. Adams, also knew about the plan to include registration, along with Longwood President Janet Greenwood. Greenwood had approved of the registration linkage and ultimately decided to reverse the decision. Despite repeated attempts for an interview on Friday, Greenwood was "too busy" to comment on the issue.

"We expected some flack (from the students and faculty about forced participation) as we would with anything new," Moore said. Because of this, efforts were made to inform the faculty advisors of the situation. Moore continued, "We put together a computer printout of all the third-semester students who would participate (around 830 in number) and invited all of their advisors to a series of luncheon meetings." "Four or five" meetings were scheduled to insure against conflicting schedule problems. According to Moore, only about 35 percent of the advisors showed up at any of the meetings. At these luncheons, faculty members were informed of the purpose of the project, the mandatory participation, and were asked to comment and make suggestions. "We received good feed back from the faculty," Moore said.

To further prepare the faculty advisors, a memo was sent to every Department Advising Coordinator with materials about what was missed at the luncheon. Both Moore and Taylor feel that every effort was made to inform the faculty of the situation in plenty of time to correct any problems with the new system. The luncheons were scheduled six weeks before the preregistration process began.

Faculty members and students were concerned about some of the survey's contents. Out of the 140 questions, three were singled out as being suspect.

From the survey:

Directions: Choose the response most accurately describing the frequency with which you have done each activity during the past year.

No. 98. Made friends with someone whose race is different from mine, or who comes from another country.

No. 126. Maintained a sexual lifestyle consistent with my personal values.

No. 130. Maintained friendships with people whose values about sexual relationships are different from mine.

Moore explains that these questions are in the same group as:

No. 80. Tried to understand another person's point of view.

No. 75. Made friends with students whose background or interests are very different from mine.

These questions pertain to one of fourteen goals, a "Sense of Awakening," which Moore defines as "understanding yourself and being tolerant of others." The purpose of the project is to clarify and define (the fourteen goals) to make sense . . . I can't imagine why someone would get upset . . . the questions are fairly harmless, we're asking them to look at their standards . . . it doesn't say what those standards are, the items really don't carry a positive or negative connotation to me."

Moore also asserts that people may be misinterpretting the purpose of the survey. "This is not a research project . . . the point of the survey is to get students to assess their use of time. There is no attempt to look at individual results."

In response to questions about why students had to sign their names to the survey, Moore explains that it was a matter of mechanics. "How could we achieve assessment and feedback if names weren't on them? They had to get the survey back (in the group discussions) Moore added, "No one was forced to answer the individual items."

Considering the events of the past week, the future of the actual survey is uncertain. The Fourteen Goals and the Involvement Project will remain a priority in that Longwood and all higher education institutions are committed to helping students get the most out of their college experience.

Scholarships And Fellowships Available for 1986-87 School Year

The following is a list of scholarships and fellowships for the 1986-87 school year. Restrictions may apply and some deadlines are approaching rapidly, so get those applications in the mail.

The Scholarship Bank

Over $500 million in funds for higher education are available from private foundations, major corporations, trade, union, and civic groups. The following are just a sample of programs available:

Teaching — offering up to $3,500 per year, the Danforth Foundation gives awards to students interested in teaching as a profession. There are 3,000 annual awards with 25 percent to minorities.

Exceptional Student Fellowships — awarded by a major life insurance company to students in business, law, computer programming, accounting and related fields. Summer internship required with all expenses paid.

Anthropology, biology, conservation and marine sciences — Field Research Project grants up to $600 a year.

Journalism, broadcasting and related fields — The Poynter Fund awards annual scholarships to $2,000. Must have a career interest in one of these fields.

Center for Political Studies — Internships in political science, law, public relations, business, history and education.

White House Fellowships — graduate level fellowships to work as an intern at the White House; 14-20 yearly openings.

Many private aid sources do not require a showing of financial need but are dependent on the student demonstrating a career interest in a certain field, or a willingness to intern or enter a competition. Low and no-interest loans are also available. The Scholarship Bank is a non-profit nationwide organization. Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution 1986 Younger Scholars Award

To commemorate the 200th anniversary of the U.S. Constitution in 1987, the National Endowment for the Humanities has launched a special nationwide competition for high school and college students to conduct research and writing projects on the U.S. Constitution.

Award recipients will be expected to work full time for nine weeks during the summer, researching and writing a paper under the close supervision of a teacher or professor of the humanities. No academic credit may be sought for these projects. Awards are $1,800 for high school students and $2,200 for college students. Each award includes $400 for the teacher or professor who serves as project advisor.

Applicants must be 21 years of age or under throughout the calendar year in which the application is submitted; or, if they are over 21, they must be full-time college students pursuing an undergraduate degree at the time of application. Applicants must be U.S. citizens or foreign nationals who have lived in the United States for at least three consecutive years at the time of application.

To request guidelines and application forms for the special competition, write to: National Competition Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, Room 504, National Endowment for the Humanities, 1100 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20506. The deadline for receipt of applications is December 15, 1985.

Americans for Democratic Action Education Fund, Inc.

The Americans for Democratic Action Education Fund, Inc. has created the Allard K. Lowenstein Fellowship program to give college student leaders an opportunity to spend 4-6 weeks in the nation's Capital.

Lowenstein Fellows will intern at Congressional offices and participate in a variety of policy seminars, and nuts and bolts organizing programs specifically designed to improve their personal and organizational skills. Lowenstein Fellows will receive a practical, first-hand understanding of politics and government, and a renewed commitment to their ideals.

Applicants must be registered college students, but should not have reached their senior year, and must demonstrate leadership ability through community service, social action projects or campus involvement.

Applications for the January 3-31 program must be postmarked by November 22, 1985 and Fellows will be chosen by December 6, 1985. Applications for the July program also must be postmarked by November 22 and Fellows will be chosen by May 15, 1986. Travel expenses and a weekly stipend for living expenses in Washington will be provided to all those accepted into the Fellowship Program.

For more information on how to apply, please contact: Bill Morton or Sara Grider — (202) 638-6447.

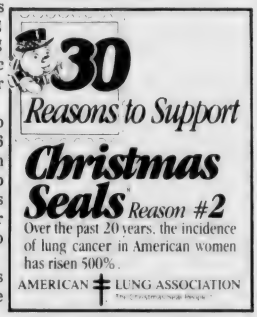
National Wildlife Federation

The National Wildlife Federation is calling for applications for its Environmental Conservation Fellowships and Publications Awards Programs for the 1986-87 academic year.

As an Environmental Conservation Fellow, a graduate student can receive a maximum grant of $4,000 a year to do research in fields relating to wildlife, natural resources management and protection of environmental quality. The Publication Awards each carry a cash gift of as much as $2,500.

Applicants for the Environmental Conservation Fellowships must be pursuing graduate degrees and have been accepted for the fall semester of the 1986-87 academic year. First year graduate students involved primarily in course work should not apply.

Application forms are available by calling Leigh Muse at (703) 790-4484, or by writing to: Executive Vice President, Conservation Fellowships Publication Awards Program, National Wildlife Federation, 1412 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036-2266. The deadline for applications is November 30, 1985. All applicants must be citizens of the U.S., Canada, or Mexico.



Scholarship Foundation

The Harry S Truman Scholarship Foundation has announced that it is now seeking nominations of outstanding students in any academic discipline who are preparing for careers in public service.

Institutions can nominate up to two sophomores for the 1986 competition. If selected, each student will receive a scholarship award covering eligible expenses up to $5,000 per year for their junior and senior years and two years of graduate studies.

The deadline for nominations is December 1, 1986. Eligible students must be full-time sophomores working toward or planning to pursue a baccalaureate degree, have a "B" average or equivalent, stand in the upper fourth of the class and be a U.S. citizen or U.S. national heading toward a career in government.

Interested students should contact Dr. Massie Stinson, Truman Scholarship Faculty Representative, in Grainger 105, or by calling 392-9256, by November 10, 1985.

Women's Basketball

Longwood women's basketball coach Shirley Duncan is faced with the unenviable task of trying to maintain a winning tradition without three players who scored nearly 3,000 points and grabbed over 2,000 rebounds over the past four seasons. Florence Holmes, Valerie Turner and Marianna Johnson, Longwood's MVP's over the past three campaigns, have graduated.

"It will take more than one year or one season to replace what we lost last year," said the coach. "We may be struggling some this year. We are very young and our schedule is extremely tough."

Longwood, which opens its season at American University November 22, will get a chance for a preseason tune-up Sunday at 3:00 when the Lady Lancers host the Blue Angels Athletic Club, a women's basketball team made up of former college cagers. The AAU sanctioned team is based in Richmond.

Former Longwood standout Cindy Eckel is a member of the Blue Angels. Eckel scored 1,029 points for the Lady Lancers from 1979 through 1983. She ranks fourth on the all-time scoring list.

Duncan has led Longwood to seasons of 16-10 and 16-13 in two years. Despite the losses from last season's squad, some talented players are on hand.

A trio of junior starters are back. Guard Caren Forbes scored 14.2 ppg. and dished off a school record 140 assists. Inside performers Melanie Lee, 5-11, and Karen Boska, 6-1, combined for over 17 points and 13 rebounds per game in 1984-85. Duncan is counting on the threesome to provide leadership as well as points, rebounds and assists.

Also returning from last season is senior Beth Ralph, who joined the Lady Lancers at midseason and started several games. A 5-10 forward, she averaged 6.4 ppg.

Reserves back for another season are sophomore guards Annette Easterling and Angie Hill.

Second-year center Barbie Burton, 6-2, is academically ineligible first semester, but hopes to rejoin the team in January.

Four promising freshmen are also in the fold. Center Sandy Rawdon, 6-1, forward India Walton, 5-9½, forward Kita Chambers, 5-9½, and guard Angee Middleton, 5-6, comprise one of Longwood's strongest recruiting classes ever.

Duncan warns, however, that the freshmen will have to grow up in a hurry with only 10 players on the squad first semester.

"We're hoping they will all be able to make a contribution early," said the coach.

Taylor, Stukes Grabs 2nd In Wrestling Tourney

In a strong showing by the Longwood wrestling team, sophomores David Taylor and John Stukes took second place in their respective weight classes Saturday as the Lancers competed in the Campbell University Wrestling Tournament in Buies Creek, North Carolina.

Stukes, who won the 134-pound division at the James Madison Takedown Tournament November 3, got a first round bye and won two matches to reach the finals. In the semi-finals he beat an All-American from Livingstone College. He lost a decision to claim second place.

Taylor went 3-1 in the 190 class and had a "super tournament", according to coach Steve Nelson.

Nelson had special praise for sophomore Pete Whitman who went 4-1 to take third at 142.

"Pete had an exceptionally good tournament," said Nelson. "He wrestled really well. He was probably our top performer."

Also finishing third for Longwood was heavyweight Jesus Strauss who went 2-1. Terry Hyams was fourth at 190 with a 2-2 mark and Tim Fitzgerald, wrestling unattached, was third at 118 with a 3-1 mark.

Longwood's next action is November 19 (next Tuesday) when Division I William & Mary pays a visit to Lancer Hall for a 7:00 bout.

Player Of The Week

Sophomore wrestler John Stukes has gotten off to a strong start in his first year with the Lancers, winning six of his first seven matches. Stukes has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period November 3-10. Player of the Week is picked by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Stukes has garnered a tournament title and a second place finish in two tournaments thus far.

He was 4-0 at the James Madison Takedown Tournament November 3 to win the crown in his weight class and last Saturday he came in second at 134 pounds in the Campbell University Tournament with a 2-1 mark.

"John is a real hard worker and a welcome addition to our team," syas coach Steve Nelson. "He'll be a strong point for us at 134 and has an excellent shot at returning to the Division II Nationals once again."

Women's Volleyball

Longwood's women's volleyball team ended its season on a losing note last Tuesday, falling to Chowan and Mary Washington in Murfreesboro, North Carolina.

Chowan beat the Lady Lancers 15-6, 15-10 while the Blue Tide handed Longwood a 15-13, 15-8 defeat.

"All the seniors played and they played really well," said coach Linda Elliott. "Julie Mobley came off the bench and did a great job. She had several kills."

Elliott expressed pride in her team's accomplishments, despite a record of 4-28.

"I'm proud of the whole team," she said. "They're leaving the season as better volleyball players. They learned a new system and improved their skills. Unfortunately, the win-loss record won't show it. Opposing coaches gave us credit for being a scrappy bunch. I just wish I had this year's seniors back for another season."

Men's Basketball Preparing For Par-Bil's Tournament

1985-86 LONGWOOD MEN'S BASKETBALL OUTLOOK

Coach Cal Luther enters his fifth basketball season at Longwood and 25th overall seeking to reverse a rare losing mark from a year ago when the Lancers ended up 11-17.

The 1984-85 campaign was a "season of close games." The Lancers played six overtime games and had 13 games decided in overtime or by two points or less. A strong, aggressive defense (LC gave up just 61.6 ppg.) kept the Lancers in the game with everyone on the schedule. Longwood, however, struggled offensively, particularly after the loss of top - scorer and rebounder Kenneth Fields at mid-year because of academic difficulties.

"It was a very frustrating season," said Luther. "Despite the tough breaks, I've never had a team work harder than last year's squad. Here at Longwood we have been blessed with good athletes who are also very good people. The five seniors on this year's squad are good examples of this. They are dedicated to making this their best season. Although we are playing the toughest schedule any Longwood basketball team has ever played, I am optimistic we can have a winning year."

Seniors Fields and Lonnie Lewis, and junior Kevin Ricks are perhaps the top three returning players. Lewis, a 6-3 forward, scored 11.1 ppg. end was a starter during the second half of the season a year ago. With 937 career points, Lewis is destined to become the fifth player in Longwood history to top the 1,000 point mark.

Fields, a 6-2 leaper, averaged 13.3 points through the Lancers' first 12 games a year ago. An explosive scorer inside, Fields also averaged 4.3 rebounds and hit 59.8 percent from the floor.

Ricks was the Lancers' top defender last season with 78 steals and 13 blocked shots. He also scored 7.8 points per game and handed out 85 assists. Ricks' status is questionable, however, because of a treseason hand injury.

Part-time starters back for another year are seniors Dave Edwards (6-6), Lionell Ogburn (6-3), Frank Tennyson (5-8) and junior Eric Pittman (6-2). Sophomore reserve Mike Leake provides size at 6-5.

Longwood's men's basketball team, looking to make amends for last season's 11-17 record, opens its season Friday, November 22 in the first round of the Par-Bil's Tip-Off Tournament in Lancer Hall.

The tournament, sponsored for the third year by Par-Bil's Food Store, will match Longwood against Virginia Wesleyan in the lidlifter at 7:00 on the 22nd. At 9:00, St. Paul's will take on Shippensburg. Consolation and championship games will be played Saturday night (Nov. 23) at 6:30 and 8:30, respectively.

Men's Soccer

An overtime 0-0 tie with arch-rival Randolph-Macon Sunday afternoon in Ashland brought an end to a successful, but disappointing season for Longwood's men's soccer team.

The Lancer booters, despite a 12-4-3 record, won't be going to the VISA or NCAA Playoffs this season. Coach Rich Posipanko's team had to win Sunday's game to qualify for the State Playoffs and Longwood failed to do it.

The game with the Yellow Jackets was reminiscent of last year's 0-0 battle, which ironically, propelled Longwood into the State Playoffs and eventually resulted in a co-State Championship with Mary Washington.

"It was a great game," said Posipanko. "We just didn't get it done. We missed two great scoring opportunities and so did Macon. The tie with Virginia Wesleyan came back to haunt us. If we had won that game (a 1-1 tie), we could have tied today and still gone to the playoffs."

Rugby

On Saturday, November 9, the Longwood College Men's Rugby Club played in its last home match of the season. Their opponents were the George Mason Men's Rugby Club from George Mason University in Fairfax, Virginia.

George Mason scored first to take a 4-0 lead.

Longwood fought back to take a 6-4 lead on a try by Brian Liming and a point after by George Miller.

George Mason came back with a penalty kick late in the first half to take a 7-6 lead into halftime.

Longwood played a tough second half. However, they were unable to score while George Mason scored twice in the waning minutes of the match to seal a 16-6 victory.

Longwood has an overall record of 5-4 and a 4-1 record within their division. Longwood plays its final match of the season next week at VMI.

The Rotunda would like to extend congratulations to Philipe Casenave and Joseph Pisciotta for being named to the Virginia Select Squad. These are the first men from Longwood ever to be named to the select squad. We wish them luck in the upcoming tournament in Philadelphia.

Class Of 86's Job Outlook Brightens "Slightly"

BETHLEHEM, PA (CPS) — Students who graduate in 1986 will enjoy "slightly" better prospects for landing a job than 1985 grads, the College Placement Council (CPC) predicts.

All told, American businesses expect to hire about two percent more grads next year, the CPC found in its annual mid-year assessment of the student job market.

The CPC's report, the first of three national job outlook surveys published by major agencies in November and December of each year, forecasts better times ahead for most kinds of majors.

But last year, the CPC's rosy predictions of a bumper job market for college grads did not come true, in part because of the computer industry slump.

"The recovery slowed down to some degree," explains CPC spokesman Rhea Nagle. "The big fall-off in the Silicon Valley was the category we were off in."

This year "there will be plenty of opportunities (for computer majors) outside the computer industry," says John Shingletjon, placement director at Michigan State and the sponsor of another of the annual job outlooks.

Shingleton expects his report to appear in a few weeks, and that it also will indicate a "slightly" better job market for the Class of 1986.

He also predicts starting salaries will rise more slowly than the Cost of Living Index compiles by the federal government.

In the CPC survey, firms said they expected to hire seven percent more business grads than last year. They also forecast having four percent more openings for masters of business administration, although last year was a bad one for MBAs.

Students with degrees in science, math and technical disciplines — excluding engineering — should also experience a slightly improved job market, CPC predicts. Employers expect to hire three percent more bachelor's grads in these areas and 13 percent more who have a master's, CPC data show.

Employers' predictions of engineering grads' prospects "are contradictory," Nagle says. "Employers are saying one thing, but when they project figures, those figures show a decline."

The data indicate corporations will hire five percent fewer grads this year, but in interviews engineering executives thought there would be a rising demand for engineers, explains Nagle.

"It's particularly surprising at the bachelor's level because they have been the most sought after for a number of years," she adds.

Companies expect to have seven percent more job openings for engineering students with advanced degrees, however.

Liberal arts majors face a similarly confusing job market, Nagle contends.

While the data show companies anticipate hiring three percent fewer liberal arts majors in the coming year, many employers say they are increasingly interested in hiring humanities

Virginia Governor-Elect Gerald Baliles was a surprise visitor to Longwood College last Wednesday. Baliles, who turned up at a banquet for Longwood's "Superintendent's Network", looked tired from his long campaign and declined to make a statement in order to not influence Governor Robb's last days in office.

Longwoods "Network" is an outreach program to help re-train teachers and generally improve K-12 school systems in the South-Central Virginia area.

Halley's Comet

By BARRETT BAKER

Picture, if you will, a blazing 6-billion-ton fireball, screaming towards the earth at over 20,000 miles per hour! Could this be the new plot line to another best-selling fiction by Stephen King? Possibly, but this story is not expected to involve the destruction of our planet as we know it. In reality, this is a description of Halley's Comet, which is to appear for the first time since 1910 sometime later this year. From a scientific viewpoint, this appearance will give astronomers and scientists a first-hand opportunity to unlock some still unanswered mysteries involving the origin of our universe.

Although this fireball will not actually be burning, it will definitely be blazing. In an article published in the Washington Post, on January 27, 1985, Michael Kernan, the author of the story, stated that Halley's comet is going to be about 100 times brighter than originally predicted. This is due, in part, to the core of the comet vaporizing much sooner than previously expected. According to Mr. James Curley, who teaches astronomy here at Longwood, the prediction was also based on a sort of 'safety factor.' In 1972, a comet by the name of Kohoutek was predicted to be almost as spectacular as Halley's. Unfortunately, it turned out to be somewhat of a dud. "About a year ago, Halley's was predicted to be very poor — very poor vision," Curley said. "I think that Kohoutek had a lot to do with that. But even so, it will be less than what it was in 1910, simply because of our point of view — where we are located in our orbit relative to where the comet is. You see, in 1910, we were so close to the comet that the tail of it actually went through the earth — or we went through it. Now we are going to be farther away from it, thus it'll be a little dimmer, so (they) were predicting poorer results. Now they are saying, 'Hey! its vaporizing a little better than we had anticiapted' so that's going to make it brighter. And I hope so, too," he finished, "because this is a once-in-a-lifetime thing, and if we miss it. . ."

So — what is a comet? What is so special about Halley's comet in particular? What is the significance to this year's appearance? And what are we doing to avoid 'missing' it?

First of all, a comet is a mass of frozen gasses with dust, sand, and a little gravel mixed in with it — what astronomers refer to as a 'dirty snowball.' As this snowball gets closer and closer to the sun, the sun's radiation vaporizes some of those frozen gasses, casuing the head of the comet to expand — up to much larger than the size of the earth, creating a tail that can extend out as far from the comet as the distance between the sun and the earth. So, the closer it gets to the sun, the larger it becomes.

Halley's comet is a special case because of its extremely regular appearances — showing itself every 76 years or so. It has been said, by a Chinese scientist, that his ancestors may have spotted the comet as far back as 1057 B.C. But a Halley's historian at the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, California, doubts this date because subsequent close passes in 374, 607, and 837 A.D. would have changed its time schedule. This would put a more conventional date at around 240 B.C. — making next year's event the 29th recorded appearance.

The comet gets its names from Edmond Halley, who was the first to discover that these comet sightings throughout history were all the same comet. Halley first got excited about comets in 1682, when a spectacular one appeared over his home in Britain. He had previously been working on a theory that would conclude that a comet was the cause of the great flood depicted in the bible through the story of Noah's Ark. Previously, during Middle Ages, comets were believed to be a phenomenon of the atmosphere; that they were part of the earth itself. Shortly after this period, someone finally figured out that it was not part of our atmosphere and started working on the theory of orbits. Halley was the first person to work out the comet's correct path on a 76-year orbit and astonished the world when he predicted its return in 1759. Unfortunately, he never got the satisfaction of seeing his prediction come true.

This year's appearance of Halley's comet is causing quite a stir with the scientific world because it will be the first opportunity to find out where comets actually come from. "One idea," said Mr. Curley, "and probably the most

My Page On Lankford

If this editorial seems to have a rhythm to it, it is because a pipe above the ceiling has burst, demolished a ceiling tile, and is filling the Rotunda office-suite complex with a rather consistent pitter-patter-type drip. If this editorial seems to use an overabundance of short words, it is because The Rotunda's Lankford Building home is so cold that we can see our breath and can only take our hands out of our pockets long enough to write the shortest of words.

This is a rather crappy situation, as it is difficult enough to get people to come in to the office and work without asking them to experience what, in essence, is the exact atmosphere of a slowly melting igloo.

Let's see, what should I rank on this week? . . . I've got it, let's examine the various frailties and shortcomings of the big, fat elephant that is the Lankford Student Union Building.

Firstly, a big chunk of the comprehensive fee that we pay to Our Lord, Cashiering and Student Accounts, goes to repay the loan that bought Lankford; this loan will be paid off around the time that we are thinking up names for our grandchildren. (I've already decided to name my first "Frankie Lankie", always hoping that the kid will never get as useless and burdensome as his Student Union namesake.)

Let's face it, if you don't work for The Rotunda, hold a SGA office, go bowling, play videogames, or appear in front of the judicial board, you don't get a lick of use out of that place. (Oh yes, we did take a nice fraternity picture on the front steps.)

To be fair, the Lancer Cafe is a huge step in the right direction towards making Lankford a real Student Union; but if we apply international mathematic principles and basic American exaggerationism, we find that (considering the total cost of the building) a beer at the Lancer Cafe costs us $750,000 per mug. Who's buying the next round?

A quick look around upstairs will bring any budget-minded student to tears. Besides Garth Wentzel's Oval Office-cubbyhole, there isn't a thing up there worth a pud.

You have your color rooms that are all white, and will stay white since we apparently aren't allowed to reserve them for parties anymore. You've got your Mecklinburg prison-type T.V. room that would rouse anybody but a Longwood student to riot. Of course, there is the Day Student Lounge where all the weird people hang out.

Finally we have the Gold (fleece?) Room, A.K.A. Grandma's living room. Apparently the purpose of this room goes along with "living fully" at Longwood. How can anybody pretend to "live fully" without knowing how to act at Grandma's house? Take your shoes off! Don't slouch! Quit picking at your pimples! The only thing missing is a fat lady at the door who pinches your cheeks when you enter.

In reality, the Gold Room is an expensive gift from the Longwood students to the Town of Farmville. The only time there are more than two people in that damn room is when the townies get together for the Women's Club, Men's Club, boy's club, girl's club, pedaphile club or the club-foot club's annual thump dance. The only time Longwood students use the Gold Room is when they are waiting to be tried by judicial board. But we owe it to the Town of Farmville as compensation for all of the time their police spend patrolling our loading zones, right?

While discussing the problem of Longwood being a suitcase college, with the President's Student Advisory Committee, Lankford's uselessness came up. Administrative responses were: 1) Janet Greenwood: "We're considering building two new wings on Lankford, extending towards Stubbs." 2) Vice-President for Academic Affairs Adams: "Maybe we should have classes on Saturdays." I now respond: 1) Forget the new wings, let's save money and improve what we have and 2) Where did this guy come from and why?

The truth is, I, like everybody else, am stuck for answers to the problem of Landford's under-usage. However, the first steps are obvious: Fix the pipes, turn the heat on and drive a catapillar-bulldozer right up them steps and into Grandma's living room.

The only way to have a real student union is to quit flying with these winged ideas and approach the people who pay for, and are suppossed to be benefitted by the ton of bricks that has Myron Lankford rolling in his grave.

FIREARMS

The administration has recently overruled a judicial board recommendation of probation for a student who had a gun in his room; the student is gone, later, see ya, goodbye. The judicial board has more gun cases coming up. You will be next on the long road home if a room search turns up guns in your room.

The Campus Police will gladly store your gun if you wish to have one on campus. Give Campus Police a call and bring all of your guns; their rooms don't get searched.

In a similar but different tidbit, we are told that anyone caught pulling a fire alarm will be suspended from school as well. You would be well advised to pull on something else, Ya pointy-headed flits.

Cable In Cunninghams

To the Editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to offer support for Mr. Weibl concerning the cable T.V. issue. I approached Mr. Weibl earlier this semester regarding the feasibility of getting hooked up to a roof antenna on top of the Cunningham complex. The idea was ruled out, but he did strongly suggest that I get residents to show interest in cable TV so the cable company would be interested in hooking up the building. After talking with representatives and the manager of Farmville Cablevision on several occasions, the manager agreed to send someone out to the Cunninghams to see if the building could be hooked up. The men that came, checked out the building and said it could be wired for cable. The next day Farmville Cablevision called me back and said they would give the Cunninghams cable service if there were enough interested residents. I immediately called Mr. Weibl and asked him if it would be O.K. to start drumming up support. He gave me his O.K.! So, Cunningham Residents, do you want your MTV??? If so, come by 204 South Cunningham and sign up.

Thanks,
Kevin Duck

"Life Threatening"

To The Editor:

All right everybody, let's gather all of our "life threatening" materials and carry them over to campus police for storage. No, maybe that's not such a good idea. I really don't think there is enough space!

Perhaps it would be more clever to define what "life threatening" material is. In the "Urgent Reminder" that was issued to us all, it was stated that things such as "firearms fireworks, explosives, knives (except nonspring pocket Knives) are considered "life threatening." (Oh, I see, nonspring pocket knives can not threaten someone's life, right?, wrong!)

With a good imagination, practically anyone can create "life threatening" materials. Let's begin now by ridding the dining hall of all their knives, spoons and forks. Also, we must not forget the golf teams clubs; or the baseball team's bats. (Man, I bet an Accounting book could really do some damage!)

It's the individuals who are "life threatening," not the materials which they may possess. I believe that anything which a person may own, is their own personal thing. Who has the right to take these things away from them? And, if they wish to store these items in their rooms, what does it really matter? Think about it, if someone wants to threaten someone else's life, storage of their personal items in the campus police station will not stop them.

Why start complete paranoia over a few incidences. Isn't this how wars are started? Lastly, it's nice to get these reminders every now and then; it really let's us know what a real jungle we live in. Students of Longwood, unite. We are the soldiers on this great battlefield. Present Arms! Or, should we just turn ourselves in??

Sincerely,
Mark Higgins

'Living Fully' In S. Ruffner

As a denizen of South Ruffner's 3rd floor Residence Hall, I would like to voice a few of my "pet peeves" to those who are the cause of many a sleepless night along the west side of our humble (what an understatement!) abode.

Firstly, I will address Mr. and-or Ms. To-Whom-It-May-Concern in the dining hall-kitchen, who might be able to tell me what possible good can be done by the 12"x12" exhaust fan that runs 24 hours a day in the alley below our rooms. "How disturbing can a little 12"x12" exhaust fan be?" you're thinking to yourself. Well, things echo in that alley like you wouldn't believe. That little exhaust fan sounds like a Boeing 747 right outside our windows. At night, with no other noises to mask this monotonous droning, the effect is better than that of 3 or 4 NO DOZE tablets. Even with the windows closed, you can't help feeling there's a Sherman Tank somewhere close at hand waiting for just the right moment to pop in. (To make matters worse, the few people that know where the heck we live on campus refuse to visit us because our rooms more often than not smell of what will be affectionately referred to as "Dinner" that evening in the Dining Hall).

Now: how about the midnight shift construction workers who are rebuilding the porch at the end of this alley — WHY are they rebuilding it? No one ever uses it or knows it exists — even if they did, why work on it from 12-7 a.m.? Aren't the daylight hours enough? (remember the echo . . .)

Being a native New Yorker, I am compelled to compare these conditions to those found in tenement neighborhoods of the Bronx. Oh, how I love to peer from yonder window and watch diners across the way tiptoeing their way through their Hearty Beef Stew! Mr. Weibl, I'd like to request permission to hang a clothesline from one building to the other to complete the scene. Then all we'd need would be a big Italian woman sticking her head out a window calling "Anthony! Anthony! Come home for dinner! It's Wednesday — Prince Spaghetti Day!" Perhaps you could use some of last year's room damage $ to hire someone to do that for us — God only knows it wasn't spent on painting our rooms or replacing the screen in our hall kitchen. As a result, pieces of our ceiling fall on our heads periodically, our walls look like a road map of lovely downtown Saigon, and we have pigeons in our kitchen. (These things don't keep me awake at night (except for the ceiling, since I have the top bunk), but I thought I'd mention them while I'm at it . . .)

Sounds like a real academically oriented atmosphere, eh? We can't sleep, get more than our fair share of the dining hall's cooking, and have become pretty good shots with our rusty trusty Ronco Pigeon Pistols.

I hope my messages will reach the eyes and minds of those they are aimed towards, and maybe get a few gears turning.

Sincerely,
Cathy Gaughran

One More Parking Problem

By MICHAEL T. CLEMENTS

As we all know, Longwood's system for providing parking does leave something to be desired. Many times we have made seemingly endless journies to or from the most desolate and under-lighted reaches of campus where we were forced, without alternative to leave our vehicles. Well gang, we have not suffered enough.

Recently a statement was made by the Parking Appeals Committee which referred to the alleged Loading and Fire Zone in front of Curry and Frazer.

You know the ones you are told to park in by campus police when you first arrive as a freshman.

What was stated is that rule which says "students are allowed to park in loading zones for twenty minutes if both hazard and head lights are left on" but does not refer to this area. - Actually it does not refer to the driveways in front of Cox, Wheeler, or Stubbs either. Technically none of these are loading zones, they are there for fire and emergency use only and anyone parked in these areas regardless of how many flashing lights you have on your car is subject to ticketing.

In conversation with members of the Parking committee it seems this has always been the case. In the past our campus police have been somewhat understanding about the fact that most students would like to park at least within a hundred yards of the building in which they live, when loading or unloading their cars. Although do not forget those guys downtown, they cannot get you in front of Cox, Wheeler or Stubbs, but anything in front of Curry or Frazer is like money in the bank to the Farmville Police Department. So even though this is not a new occurrence it seems the law will be more strictly enforced by both Police Departments, especially with the statement made by the Parking Committee which was supposedly being spread by word of mouth. Don't you just love how students are kept so well informed?

In regards to this one question still lingers, "Where are those loading zones we are told of in the parking rules and regulations book?" And as usual nobody seems to know about the ones for any buildings, other than Curry and Frazer. The zone designated tjo accommodate these two buildings is the small dirt area which is situated between them.

With the departure of everyone on Tuesday, we wish you a happy and safe Thanksgiving. Although it would be wise to beware of the eager little uninformed men with their pens and ticket books.

An R.A.'s Opinion

By JUDI LYNCH

R.A. — Those two letters are either looked upon in awe, or laughed at. Freshmen look upon R.A.'s in awe, while the rest of the school laughs at them.

What exactly is an R.A.? Someone who is Really Awesome? Or someone who is a Real Asshole? What?

Being an R.A., I can honestly say that students tend to forget that their Resident Assistants are people the same age who are dedicating themselves to the contentment of their fellow students. They are not the "bad guys," although they are often considered to be such. They are not spies for the judicial board, living only for the misery of others, while ruining the college (party) atmosphere. And, they certainly are not spending every waking moment trying to meet a quota of "write-ups."

What, then, are R.A.'s?

I recall this past summer, coming home from a "real" job at Smoketree Pool in Richmond, only to find a letter in the mail from Sue Saunders, our new Dean of Students. Although I had not applied for a position, I was faced with an opportunity of a lifetime (or so I was told by my parents). AN R.A. POSITION AT LONGWOOD COLLEGE!

I accepted the job, knowing the sacrifices which I was about to make. (Not being able to live in Stubbs; not being able to continue my rowdy behavior; etc.) I began my first phase of training in August, not very excited at what I had gotten myself into. (Plus, I had to give up a whole week of sun!)

SURPRISE!! I was wrong! (Yes, I admit it.) It was probably one of the more exciting weeks of my life. I met people who I had known and people I hadn't. The funniest part was, no one fitted the description which I myself had made of typical R.A. I found everyone there to be . . .HUMAN!! Fraternity members, sorority members, wrestlers, rugby players, Smurfs from Kings Dominion, . . the list continues. Where were the Army sergeants, ready to drill the incoming students? Where were the detectives, ready to snoop out a game of quarters or a Thursday night party?

By the end of the week, my outlook was one of total positivity. I was looking forward to meeting "MY GIRLS" and helping to create a homey atmosphere for them, while also keeping them aware of the rules and regulations expected to be maintained. (Even the girls in my kitchen were an experience I was anticipating!) I was also sorry to have that week come to a close, because deep down I knew that the close bonds developed would soon be broken as old friends returned and new friendships started. We'd all go our separate ways, trying to keep this campus content and controlled.

Although I did not go into detail in this article about what an R.A. is, I think I did a fair job of giving you an insight as to WHO we are. We're people who have a job to do in terms of administration, while also continuing our jobs as students. . . and friends.

State Department Speaker

On Friday, November 22, students were given a chance to listen to and speak with Mr. William Burns, Special Assistant to the Deputy Secretary of State. Students of Dr. Harbour's and Dr. Helm's government classes were given the opportunity to ask questions concerning Government policy in the Middle East and elsewhere, following a fifteen minute speech on the Government's position. The number and quality of questions asked, showed that time in and out of the classroom was not wasted.

Mr. Burns surprised me in that he appeared to be just out of graduate school. He has made it into a very influential position for a man of his age. Mr. Burns was also a typical government representative; he was informed and also informative. His view was aligned with the government's pro-Israeli position (recent events not withstanding).

Several students spoke up for Arab-Palestinian rights which Mr. Burns did acknowledge but also talked around like many politicians. A luncheon followed in the Virginia Room, but student participation was lacking. I would like to think more students would take the time to better themselves and the world around them. Get more involved with the issues that involve you; Get involved with Student Government, Student Life, and the International studies program here at Longwood.

prevalent one, is that all comets originally came from a gigantic cloud of comet material probably about three times as far out from the sun as our last planet, Pluto — called the Oort cloud. It that is true than comets would contain material which was produced way back when the sun and solar system was born with hardly any changes!" Unfortunately, N.A.S.A. did not get the money to send a probe directly to the comet, but the United States will have equipment on board the European shot — Giotto — which will meet with the comet on March 13, 1986. The U. S. will also have a cosmic dust analyzer aboard the Soviet Vega-1 and Vega-2 orbitors which will launch shortly before the European craft. This is the first joint space operation between the Soviets and the United States since 1975. The space shuttle will also be taking pictures from a distance with the help of three ultra-violet telescopes. These telescopes are designed to pick up the area of the comet that we will not be able to see with the naked eye. "This is why Kohoutek was such a bomb," said Curley. "A comet gives off two different types of light — reflected sunlight off of dust particles and ultraviolet light from the vaporizing gasses. That's what makes Halley's such a nice comet — it has a high percentage of dust. Kohoutek, on the other hand, didn't have very much dust, so all we got was ultraviolet light, which was fine with the astronomers because they had ultraviolet senitive film; something the naked eye couldn't pick up." The Japanese are also sending up a probe to measure the hydrogen halo, which will determine the effect of solar wind on the comet's tail.

Part of all the hoopla to give Halley's comet its first ever physical examination is to establish just how much longer it will be orbitting. Scientists know approximately the size of the comet's nucleus, but have no idea as to how much is rock and dust. The more rock and dust there is, the greater the chance of nuclear vaporization. If this should happen, the nucleus would break into chunks forming several smaller comets that would follow the same cycle as Halley's, but as a group instead. Each time they came around, they would lose a little more material and eventually dissapate — thus being the end of Halley's comet as we know it.

Another significant part of the scientific studies is to see exactly what odds are involved with Halley's comet actually hitting the earth. Some say that it could happen but the odds stand at about a billion to one. However, scientists believe that a very small piece of the comet Encke did strike the earth somewhere in Siberia in the early 1900's. The fragment was estimated to be only about 40 yards across — in comparison to Halley's three mile diameter — but the destruction it caused was phenomenal. It was calculated to have exploded five miles above the earth's surface with an explosion rated around 12 megatons. Fortunately, it hit in an unpopulated area, obliterating a 70-mile streak of trees, flattening thousands of square miles of forest land.

Dance Co. Reviewed

By LEE RICHARDS

The Longwood Company of Dancers finished off a three-day concert series Sunday with Company Director, Dr. Nelson Neal's final production before taking some time away from Longwood College to teach abroad — the 1985 Fall Concert.

The series added five new dances to the Evolution of Modern Dance that was performed during Oktoberfest. The new dances included: ALL AT ONCE, choreographed by Teri Freeman & Kelly Shannon and performed by Freeman, Shannon, Margaret Bickerstaff, Kim Cecil, and Deb Robbins; FOR YOU, a quiet, romantic dance choreographed and performed by Tami Bostian; BODY FLOW, choreographed by Hilary Silvera and performed by Silvera, Cecil, Freeman, Amy Harold, Robbins, and Shannon; CEVEAT, the Latin translation of Beware! choreographed by Sherry Massey, performed by Sandi Dovel, Freeman, Robbins, Silvera, and Mary Thompson, and featuring a lighting design by Barrett Baker; THE SHOOT OUT, choreographed by Tami Bostian and performed by Bostian, Dovel, Shannon, and Thompson.

The evolution dances included: TORCH, choreographed and performed by Sherry Massey, featuring costume design by Dr. Neal; AUTUM, choreographed by Dr. Neal, performed by Cecil, Dovel, and Silvera, and featuring costume design by Marna Neal; RITUAL OF THE POLES, which featured some new choreography by Dr. Neal added to what was previously seen during Oktoberfest. The result made the dance spectacular, performed by Bickerstaff, Bostian, Robbins, Shannon, and Thompson, and featuring set design by Dr. Neal; and RAZZ MA JAZZ - JUMP, also featuring an addition to the Oktoberfest show by Tammy Tipton, choreographed by Tipton and Dr. Neal and performed by the entire company.

The Company would like to thank everyone for their support of this event including the Longwood Ambassadors, who helped as ushers, and the lighting-technical crew: Barrett Baker, Jennifer Chilton, Lee Ann Grimsley, and Gail Starling.

REPORT:

Education Majors May End Up Teaching 'Wrong' Classes

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — Many college students planning to become primary or secondary school teachers can expect to spend all or part of their time teaching classes they are not certified for, according to a new study.

The study, produced by the American Federation of Teachers (AFT) and the Council for Basic Education (CBE), estimates some 200,000 teachers are teaching at least one class a day they are not properly trained to teach.

"It is not an exaggeration to infer that what some educators call 'out-of-field' teaching is out of control," says CBE director Graham Down.

"It's not a pretty picture. The implications for morale, professionalism, pedagogy, subject knowledge and student learning are dire, to say the least."

The study, released Sept. 24, is based on a state-by-state survey of misassigned teachers.

But because many states do not track misassignments, a precise accounting of the probelm is not possible.

Although most states prohibit misassignments, few have reliable ways of preventing them, the report concludes.

Moverover, some 15 states permit misassignments on a limited basis, the survey found, while six don't restrict the practice.

The report's authors reject the widely-held assumption that misassignments invariable occur because of shortages of qualifed teachers in certain disciplines.

In fact, they say, many English and humanities classes are taught by teachers certified in other fields, even though there is no shortage of English and humanities instructors.

The authors call on state lawmakers to tighen policies against misassignments, but they blame teachers themselves for some of the problem.

Some teachers, the report says, do not understand the subjects they are certified to teach, and are therefore reluctant to challenge misassignments.

There is one feature of the problem that will help reformers, according to the report:

"It may be the only problem currently plaguing education that schools themselves could correct, alone, quickly, without cost, and probably with dramatic effect."

"Liberal" Professors Named

By JIM SCHWARTZ

(CPS) — Accuracy in Academia, the ideological watchdog group that began hunting for "liberal" professors earlier this fall, has begun to name names and, according to some, to apply pressure on administrators to rein in — if not fire — the professors.

In its first newsletter, AIA accused Arizona State political science Prof. Mark Reader of using his classes to espouse his views on nuclear weaponry.

AIA then sent a letter complaining about Reader to the ASU administration.

AIA National Director Matthew Scully says AIA will be naming three more allegedly-leftist professors in its next newsletter, which the organization distributes to 5,000 people and organizations.

Though Scully refuses to name the three teachers AIA will charge mislead their students, College Press Service has learned that Mary Karasch, a history professor at Oakland University in Michingan, will be one of them.

Scully estimates there are 10,000 leftist professors working on American campuses today, and reports classroom "monitors" — anonymous students who inform AIA of what they perceive as leftist teachers — have already turned in the names of about 100 instructors since the program began in September.

"I would assume a good number (of the complaints) are valid," Scully says.

So far, ASU has stood behind Reader, the lone professor named publicly.

"There have been no reprisals against Reader," days Brent Brown, Arizona State's vice president of community affairs. "He is a respected member of our faculty."

"The administration has come out on my behalf, fully and completely," Reader affirms.

Brown adds there's been no reaction from the state legislature, either. During the McCarthy Era in the early 1950's, state legislators sometimes threatened to slash college funding if the college refused to fire professors with whom they disagreed.

"I don't see any indication of any pressure to muzzle our professors," Brown says.

"We are very pleased with the response of college presidents," says Iris Molotsky of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), which at a national meeting last week passed resolutions condemning AIA

"We don't think professors are above criticism, it's the methods (AIA uses to monitor lectures)," Molotsky explains.

"What's really disturbing is that they are enlisting students who won't reveal their identity," she says.

"Spies in the classroom break trust between people," Reader contends. "Students have told me that they are less willing to speak up in the class and professors don't feel free to talk privately to students anymore. They don't want conversation to become public property."

Scully, however, disagrees with Reader's public lectures, largely because he uses too much class time to discuss the threat of nuclear war.

"He devotes his whole class to the nuclear issue," Scully ways, "If you call a course one thing, you should not teach something entirely different."

"The charges are false" Reader says. "What's so lovely (is that) I have so much documentation. It will show that they are inaccurate."

An anonymous AIA monitor contends Oakland University Prof. Karasch presents only the "leftist" viewpoint about Central America in her classes.

Scully refuses to elaborate on the Karasch case, and Karasch did not return phone calls to College Press Service.

Scully says AIA looks into its monitors' reports before "reviewing" professors in its newsletter.

But AIA's investigations and professors' confidence their schools will support them haven't muted the alarm in the academic community.

"I have never had the volume of responses to any issue as this one. It's of great concern," Milotsky says.

The implications of what AIA is trying to do worry Reader. "It's absolutely frightening."

"One step leads to another. McCarthy started by labeling people communists, but then some of them lost their jobs," administrator Bill Antaramian observes.

"This is what was done in Nazi Germany. Students did this for Hitler when he was getting started," Antaramian adds.

Scully contends AIA's objective is merely to "make free and open debate," on views exposed by leftist professors.

ASU's Reader attributes the effort to what he sees as AIA's unwillingness to allow free and open debate.

"Most political thinking (today) is being cast against the possibility of extinction of the human race," he says. "These people don't want to think about the extinction possibility."

But Scully asserts it's the professors who aren't thinking.

"They (professors) have led an insular existance. A word of criticism to them represents censorship," Scully observes. "When you have an ideological fever swamp, a little chill might do them some good."

Schools don't see criticism of conservative academiecs as censorship, he asserts, noting the case of Stanford anthropology grad student Steven Mosher, whom the university dismissed after he reported stories of alleged forced abortions in China.

"Why do professors talk about unlimited freedom and Mosher does not get it? He (Mosher) offended their progressive sensibilities," Scully maintains.

Stanford dropped Mosher from a doctoral program in 1983 after a panel of faculty and members determined that Mosher had "endangered the subjects of his research" by reporting the alleged abortion scandal, a serious example of "ethical misconduct."

Mosher himself charges Stanford failed to treat testimony from his former wife about his "misconduct" in China as charges from "a scorned woman."

"Nobody expects professors to be bias-free," Scully says, but he wants them not to abuse the spirit of academic freedom by advocating their views in class.

"If professors don't tell students how lucky they are (to live in the U.S.), they are not doing their job," Scully believes.

He does not think "conservative" professors advocate their view in class.

"We need not pretend to need to monitor conservative profs abusing their position," Scully says.

Ambassador's Corner

By KIM SETZER AND BOB SMITH

Mr. Parker Wheeler and Mr. Bill Grogand, owners of Par-Bils, were made honorary Longwood Ambassadors. Jean Wheeler was chosen as a new advisor to the Ambassadors. Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Grogand made a substantial contribution to the Ambassadors.

The Ambassadors will be holding interviews for the spring membership campaign December 2 through the end of the semester. Pick up applications and make an appointment for an interview in the Institutional Advancement Office, second floor Ruffner. A reminder that to become an Ambassador, a 2.3 GPA is need and being a second semester freshman in the spring is required.

Two Ambassadors congratulate Mr. Grogand and Mr. Wheeler.

Events being hosted by the Ambassadors:

Thursday, December 5: Decorate Christmas tree at the Longwood House.

Saturday, December 7 - Sunday, December 8: Renaissance Dinner.

Sunday, December 15: Open house at Longwood House, 1:30-5:30.

students, Nagle says.

The rising interest of employers, if in fact true, "is a positive note for liberal arts grads. It shows employers recognize the value of the skills liberal arts majors have."

Of the contradictions in the survey responses, Nagle speculates, "Maybe, if the survey was bigger, the results would have been different."

Getting Around Longwood

By KIM SETZER
and OMAR FAKHOURY

Being handicapped or disabled, temporarily or permanently, can create problems on Longwood's campus. Many of the buildings are inaccessible to many handicapped and disabled students. There doesn't seem to be much improvement in the near future. Hiner, Iler, and Lankford don't have elevators. This makes it difficult for disabled students to reach second floor. Some can't even attend events in the Gold Room.

There are a few facilities for those in need of them. Wheeler, South Cunningham, Curry and Frazier have apartments for the handicapped. Still, there is much need for improvement in many areas. Many elevators are not in working order. Wheeler's elevator has been broken since the first few weeks of school. One major complaint concerning this dilemma is that of the Ambassadors. Many Ambassadors show their rooms to prospective new students and their parents. Many older parents cannot climb the flights of stairs. This entire situation projects a bad image of Longwood.

When it rains, many handicapped or disabled persons have trouble with the walkways. The walkways are not cleared and some slip on a wet leaf, on mud, etc. Sara Collie, a handicapped junior, stated that she had a very hard time getting railings put up on the steps in front of Wheeler where she lives. She also stated that railings are needed across campus in addition to lighting.

The dining hall can be the worst obstacle to overcome. The ARA workers provide no services for handicapped persons. They have to find another student to get their food. Also, sometimes there is a hard time getting a table on ground floor. There is only one elevator that serves Grainger and Ruffner. It is usually closed between twelve and one because "it makes too much noise in the tea room," states a teacher.

So, if you break your leg in a rugby game, maybe the worst obstacles to conquer are yet to come . . .

Education Degree May Take 6 Years

EAST LANSING, MI. (CPS) — If a group of education deans gets its way, most of the nation's education majors will find it much harder to graduate from college in the near future.

Under the group's plan, students intending to become "regular career teachers" would need six years of study to get teaching certificates, while "professional career teachers" would have to obtain a second advanced degree emphasizing leadership.

The group of education deans from 39 "leading research universities — which named itself The Holmes Group in honor of legendary Harvard education Dean Henry W. Holmes — hopes to enlist 60 other teaching colleges in its effort to create "a new type of teacher" by making teaching a prestigious, highly-paid profession.

In its founding statement, released last week at Michigan State University, The Holmes Group said it hoped to overhaul the education programs by 1990.

There is, moreover, "a willingness of institutions to move in this direction," says Richard Prawat of the Holmes Coordinating Committee.

Prawat, a Michigan State education professor, helped present the group's suggestions to the Academic Vice Presidents Committee of the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

Prawat says the report was "received very positively."

The Holmes report coincides with similar findings released two weeks ago by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

The Carnegie study also suggested tightening professional standards to get greater recognition and rewards for teachers.

"It won't be enough to prepare a new type of teacher," Prawat says. "We need incentives for holding the best and the brightest."

To do so, the Holmes plan would aim to create "career professional teachers" who have extensive academic training and can lead the profession into better supervising, and developing and evaluating coursework.

According to the plan, both "career professional teachers" and "regular career teachers" would get undergraduate degrees in academic subjects, rather than in education.

Students would then devote a fifth year of study to "learning to teach."

They would spend a sixth year in a supervised internship to complete graduate requirements.

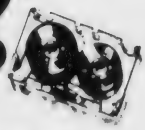
Career professional teachers would have to earn a second advanced degree, and then would qualify for higher pay.

Prawat envisions career professional teachers, comprising 20 to 25 percent of the nation's teaching force, forming an elite corps for the profession.

To work, the plan would need the help of institutions that employ teachers as well as those that train them.

For example, elementary and high schools would have to prohibit instructors from teaching subjects other than their acadmic major.

While Prawat admits The Holmes Group proposal is a radical one, he doesn't believe its rigorous training requirements will discourage prospective teachers.



"If we can change the workplace, conditions and compensation, then people will know their career will reward them for their efforts," he says.

But the plan may not be for all colleges.

"While our goals and strategies for improving teacher education may be appropriate for teacher training programs in other institutions, they have been designed with the research universities in mind," explains Judith Lanier, dean of Michigan State's College of Education and chair of The Holmes Group.

Nevertheless, group organizers hope to sign up a total of 100 schools in its reform efforts by January, when the final version of its report, "Goals for Educating Teachers as Professionals," is published.

DO YOU WANT TO PAY A TAPING TAX?

If Not, Here's How to Fight Back.

Record company big-wigs want you to pay a tax every time you buy a blank tape and every time you buy audio recording equipment. They're pushing Congress to tax you. And to send them the money.

A dollar or more on every blank tape. 10-25% on cassette decks, boom boxes, portable stereos, or anything else you use to record.

The record companies say home taping hurts them. The truth is they can't be hurting too much. Last year, they hit new highs in sales and profits. Maybe they just want to take a few bucks from your pocket to put in their own.

What do you think?

Do you want to pay them a tax to tape a record so you can play it in your car? Do you want to pay them a tax when you tape a lecture? How about a tax for the tape you use in your telephone answering machine, or the tape of your little boy's birthday party, or the tape of your daughter's first trumpet solo?

Can you stop this tax? Yes! Here's how.

TURNED DOWN FOR 75 CAMPUS JOBS, a 45-year-old Arizona State U. student is charging ASU with age discrimination. "They hire people who are 24 and pretty," he says, "and I'm not 24 or pretty."

COMPLAINTS HAVE BEEN FILED against the U. of Minnesota police by three students arrested for an anti-apartheid sit-in at the UM president's office. The students say police incapacitated them with mace as they loaded them into a police van, and then drove around for 30 minutes, stopping and starting quickly and slamming them against the sides of the van, instead of driving straight to the police station. The students also plan to file complaints against the Minneapolis police.

ANOTHER SCHOOL SONG has been changed to recognize the importance of female collegians: The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has changed its "Arise Ye Sons if MIT" to "Arise! All Ye of MIT."

A WAVE OF VIOLENCE has prompted the Minneapolis police to crack down on student parties in neighborhoods near the U. of Minnesota. Assaults and stabbings have plagued student-hosted parties since last year, and police attribute it in part to recent crackdowns on drunk driving, which prompted more parties at home.

A TUITION FREEZE was the demand of more than 200 U. of Iowa students and faculty who gathered outside a recent UI Board of Regents meeting. Inside, the Regents raised tuition by 6.5 percent.

NOTES FROM ALL OVER: Indiana U., named the nation's second most sexually-active campus by Playboy in 1983, was called one of the nation's top 20 "coolest" schools in the latest issue of High Times, the drug magazine . . . Harvard President Derek Bok has agreed to sell shares in companies that helped kill off the woolly mammoth, now extinct for about 100,000 years.

EMPLOYERS WHO DISCRIMINATE against gay and lesbian job applicants will no longer be allowed to conduct interviews at Stanford Law School. Previously, the law school allowed recruiters who practiced discrimination based on sexual preference to the use the school's facilities as long as they disclosed their discriminatory practices in advance.

TEXAS MAY AXE ITS STUDENT GOVERNMENT AGAIN: Students are circulating a petition to dissolve the student government on the grounds of "general uselessness." If they gather 840 valid signatures, the campus will vote on the dissolution issue in the next election.

MINORITY STUDENTS represent only 14 percent of all students at four-year institutions and 21 percent at two-year schools, according to a new study by the American Council on Education. White students comprise 82 percent of the four-year student body, and 79 percent of the two-year.

"RACIST" FLYERS, distributed to advertise a student bowling party at the U. of California-Los Angeles, drew strong objections from UCLA's black, Hispanic and Asian student groups. The flyers portrayed a black infant playing a drum above the caption "Take the Skinheads Bowling." A confrontation and verbal exchange between the groups and the bowlers prompted Bruin Bowl to end the party.

RONALD REAGAN'S VISIT to Milwaukee brought out about 300 student protesters from the U. of Wisconsin campus in that city. The theme of the protest was that federal funds would be better spent on education than on defense.

CAMPUS C.I.A. WOES CONTINUE: Police arrested 26 U. of Michigan protestors of Central Intelligence Agency recruiters, but U. of Colorado President E. Gordon Gee refused to bar CIA recruiters from campus. Also, last week, the House Intelligence Committee scheduled hearings into the CIA's academic activities in the wake of a revelation a Harvard professor used CIA funds to stage a campus conference.

BRANDEIS DECIDES TO KEEP FUNDING AN 'ANTI-SEMITIC' STUDENT PAPER: Students at largely-Jewish Brandeis voted to cut off student fees to a leftist student journal called The Watch on the grounds it was unsupportive of Israel and therefore anti-Semitic. But the Faculty Senate last week voted to retain funding for The Watch if it agrees to faculty controls and seeks wider student input into its pages.

A bumper sticker dating club, begun by student at the U. of Kansas, has a unique student twist. Members of the dating club wear stickers on their backpacks. The stickers have the club telephone number and a four-digit ID number. People who see the sticker and would like to meet the club member call the club with the ID number and leave a message. An "introductory offer" is selling life memberships for $7 to students and $15 to non-students.

Longwood Hosts Science Fair

Longwood will be the sight of the 1986 Southside Regional Science Fair.

Although plans are still being made, the basic outline of the event is finished.

The fair is a two-day event and will be held on March 14 and 15. On the 14th the contestants (winners of high school science fairs) set up their exhibitions. On the 15th there will be a speaker, programs for the students, and judging of the exhibits.

The exhibits are broken down into 13 categories including Biology, Chemistry, Micro-Biology and Zoology.

Each contestant will receive a certificate, the 2nd-3rd place winners in each category will receive pins, and the first place winner in each category will receive $25 and a chance to compete with the twelve other categories.

The top two winners of the second judging will compete in the 37th International Science Fair which will be held from May 11 through May 17 in Fort Worth, Texas.

The remaining winners will compete in the State Science Fair which runs from March 11-March 17 in Richmond, VA.

At the present time, there are 12 counties participating in the fair. Each of these counties must pay $500 dollars to be associated with the fair. The money raised by the fees will be used to pay the expenses of the contestants who will compete in Fort Worth.

Two students collided behind Cox this week; their cars were only in the way.

Nostalgia:

Since the beginning...1920-1985

The following is the the third in a series of articles extracted from old Rotunda issues. This article is a tribute to Dr. Joseph L. Jarman, fourth President of The State Normal School.

(For our President, from his girls)

For you, whose life is as a torch held high, to guide us on our way, we, your girls, would ask the boon of just these simple blessings: may your eyes be always clear to see the things that the years should bring; may you have an unfaltering faith that will lead you to your goal; may each morning find you with courage and strength to face the task before you; and each day's close bestow upon you the joy of unselfish service rendered, and the peace of work well done.

Dr. Joseph L. Jarman, fourth President of the State Normal School, was born in Charlottesville, Virginia, on the 19th day of November, 1867. His father, William Dabney Jarman, served in the Confederate Army, and his mother was Catherine Goodloe Lindsay, of the well-known Lindsay family of Albemarle County.

His early education was obtained in the public schools of Charlottesville, and at the age of fourteen (having been left an orphan) he was sent to the Miller Manual Training School, where he remained from 1881 to 1886. In the competitive examination, he won the Miller Scholarship at the University of Virginia, where he as a student from 1886 to 1889, devoting himself especially to the Natural and Physical Sciences.

Upon completion of the course at the University, he returned to Miller School as a member of the faculty, but remained there only one year as, at the end of that time, he was called to the chair of Natural Science at Emory and Henry College. He filled this position for twelve years, and left it in 1902, to take up work at Farmville.

During his stay at Emory and Henry College the degree of A.B. was conferred upon him by that institution, and since he has been in Farmville, Hampden-Sydney College has honored him with the LL. D. degree. Within the past year Dr. Jarman has been elected to Phi Beta Kappa by the University of Virginia Chapter, an honor that comes to alumni only after a prolonged period of distinguished service.

Dr. Jarman has been a member of many state and national organizations and he has held responsible offices in these organizations. However, his greatest contribution has been made in connection with education in Virginia, and particularly in connection with the State Normal School at Farmville. The history of the educational renaissance in Virginia which has taken place in the last thirty years is the history of the work of wise and courageous leaders, among whom Dr. Jarman ranks near the top.

The State Normal School at Farmville, which is both a result and a cause of the movement for better education in the state, has had a conspicious part in the development of education in Virginia. A good foundation was laid when Dr. Jarman became president in 1902, but it was only a beginning. From a relatively small school doing high grade secondary-school work in the main, it has become a modern teachers college, with strictly professional courses, covering four years' work, with diversified types of work fitting students for many types of service in the state, and an enrollment of over 700 students. It has been ranked by competent judges among the best normal schools of the country. This growth in the large is due to the foresight, careful planning, and energy of Dr. Jarman.

But an institution is more than buildings, courses, faculty, and students. Mere numbers and comparative statistics do not begin to describe the State Normal School, or the work of Dr. Jarman in developing the Normal School. The biggest thing in S.N.S. after all is its peculiar and distinctive spirit. It cannot be described in words. It can be felt only. Students here gain more than a knowledge of the textbooks and training in teaching. There is an indefinable atmosphere about the school that affects in a marked way the character and personality of Farmville folks. This intangible, stimulating, and character-forming force is probably the greatest thing about the school. This force, emanating from and passing to faculty and students alike, finds its source in the spirit and attitude of Dr. Jarman.

In spite of his constructive educational work, his contribution to the educational development of the state, honors received at home and in various parts of the country, the greatest thing about Dr. Jarman is his loving, sympathetic personality.

ENFORCEMENT OF MARIJUANA LAWS is facing a new challenge in Phoenix. Stickers have been appearing on the Arizona State U. campus encouraging students to deluge the police department's "Silent Witness" telephone number with "phony tip(s) about marijuana" in the hope that rampant false alarms will frustrate the police and public enough to cause them to give up on enforcement.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Longwood's young women's basketball team ran into a tough opening game assignment Friday night at Divison I American University and the Lady Lancers came out on the short end of 97-53 contest.

With six players reaching double figures, American converted numerous Longwood miscues into points while racing to a 45-17 edge at the half. Coach Shirley Duncan felt her team played better in the second half with the opening game jitters out of the way.

Things don't get much easier for Longwood in its next two games as a Monday night visit to Radford and the home opener versus Virginia Commonwealth Monday, December 2 are next on the schedule. The Lady Lancer's first game with a Division II opponent is December 5 when St. Paul's visits.

Three Longwood cagers reached double figures Friday night at American Guard Caren Forbes led the way with 14 points. Melanie Lee scored 10 points and freshman Sandy Rawdon had 11.

Junior center Karen Boska was the top rebounder with 8 and scored 6 points.

Longwood played a solid game in most aspects, shooting 50 per cent from the floor (20-40) and grabbing 30 rebounds to American's 33. The Lady Lancers turned the ball over 46 times, however, enabling American to get off 76 shots. The Lady Eagles hit 40 of the those shots for 52.6 per cent.

"Our early season schedule is very tough," said coach Duncan. "I may be guilty of over-scheduling. As a team we did much better in the second half against American. They (Lady Eagles) were much more talented and experienced than we are. They forced many of our turnovers. Radford will also be good, but they're not experienced as American."

American returned all five starters and eight veterans from a team that finished 12-14 a year ago in Division I.

FOOTBALL

In theory, basketball is a simple game — put the ball in the basket. Longwood's men's basketball team found out the truth of that axiom over the weekend in the third par-bil's Tip-Off Tournament.

The Lancers, opening the season on their home court, were handed two surprising losses by hot-shooting teams. Virginia Wesleyan canned 57.8 per cent of its shots in a 78-70 win over Longwood Friday night and St. Paul's did even better Saturday night, hitting 59.6 per cent in a 75-64 victory over the Lancers.

Longwood shot only 41.2 per cent against Wesleyan and 36 per cent versus St. Paul's. Despite hustling, scrambling comebacks in both games and outstanding play from seniors Lonnie Lewis and Kenneth Fields, the Lancers got too far behind to catch up in both contests.

Now 0-2 for the first time since 1977, the Lancers visit Guilford Tuesday night and then break for Thanksgiving before returning to play at North Carolina Charlotte Monday, December 2.

For the record, Shippensburg carried the Par-Bil's Tournament Championship trophy back with them to Pennsylvania Sunday, after beating St. Paul's 82-70 Friday night and waltzing past Wesleyan 82-62 Saturday night.

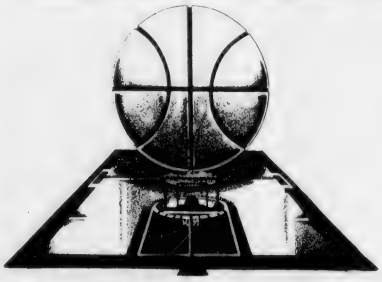
The Red Raiders landed three players on the All-Tournament team, forward Mike Palm, the tournament MVP, center Dale Lay and guard Rick Jackson. Longwood's Lonnie Lewis, who tied Jackson for the fifth spot, was joined by St. Paul's Keith Downs and Virginia Wesleyan's Joe Darby.

Shippensburg set a tournament record by shooting 68 per cent in their opening win over St. Paul's and Jackson had a record 14 assists, seven in each game.

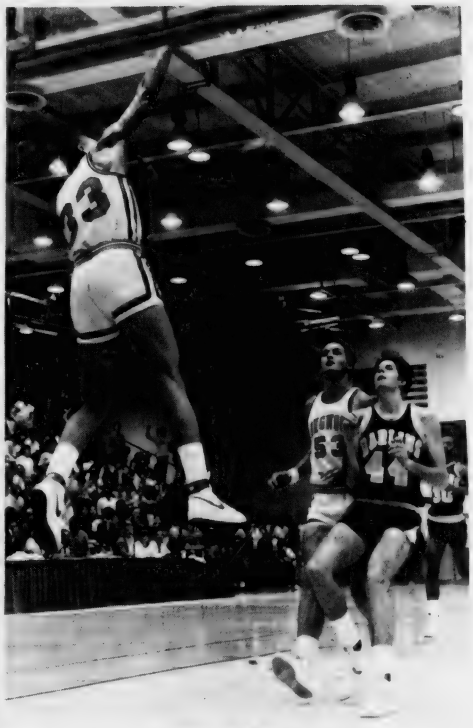
Longwood had its chances to win both tournment contests, but seemed to run out of gas. Against St. Paul's, Fields scored seven straight points in a 10-0 Lancer run which moved the home team from a 39-48 deficit to a 49-48 lead with 11:58 remaining. The Tigers then ran off the next six points and held onto their lead.

Fields put on a spectacular performance with 28 points, 17 coming in the second half. He also hit 8-8 free throws and grabbed six rebounds. Lewis scored 18 points, grabbed six rebounds and handed out seven assists, a career high.

Center Quintin Kearney was saddled with foul problems both nights. He fouled out of the loss to Virginia Wesleyan, playing just 15 minutes, and he picked up four fouls against St. Paul's, staying on the court 28 minutes.



Kearney proved to be a solid performer when he wasn't on the bench. The 6-6 junior had six points and five rebounds Friday and nine points and seven rebounds Saturday.



Guard Walter Harvey played well for the Lancers against Wesleyan Friday night with eight points and five assists. The Blue Marlins ran off 11 straight points at the start of the second half to take a 40-28 lead. The Lancers could never get closer than five the rest of the way.

Lewis scored a career high 29 points and Fields added 11 points and eight rebounds.

With 47 points in his first two games, Lewis is fast approaching the 1,000 point mark for career scoring. The 6-3 senior from Henrico High School has 984 points heading into Tuesday night's game at Guilford. He will be only the fifth player in Longwood history to top 1,000 points.

The Lancers were hurt by the hand injury of senior forward Lionell Ogburn. Ogburn was able to play just two minutes in the tournament, after hurting the hand in an accident last week.

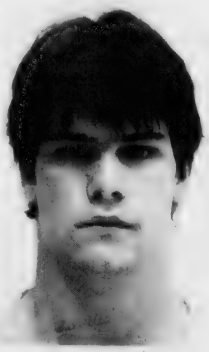
Wrestlers Whip Hampsters 39-8

By Tony Brzezicki

Longwood's grapplers won three out of three matches in an outstanding performance in a four-team meet at Hampden-Sydney Saturday with six team members going undefeated.

The Lancers defeated Pfeiffer 39-14, Furman 36-18, and Hampden-Sydney 39-8. Longwood's record now stands at 3-1.

Sophomores Pete Whitman 142, Tommy Eaves 167, Jesus Strauss-HWT, John Stukes 134, and junior Billy Howard 158 went 3-0 for the day. Freshman John Boatwright 150 went 2-0 against his opponents. Stukes now has a season record of 10-1, Howard 6-1, and Whitman is 11-3 leading the grapplers to a great start for the 1985-86 season.



"All in all it was probably one of the best days of wrestling we've ever had," said coach Steve Nelson. "We had a lot of hustle, we worked hard and it paid off."

Last Wednesday the Lancers played host to William & Mary suffering their only loss this season, 36-14.

"We made inexperienced mistakes which always hurts," said Nelson. "We are young and weak at the lower weights."

Whitman, Stukes, and Howard were the only victors for Longwood, winning by decisions.

Longwood's grapplers next match will be the Washington & Lee Tournament at Washington & Lee on December 6-7.

BILLY HOWARD

Saturday at Hampden-Sydney, Longwood's wrestling team perhaps its finest hour. At the forefront of the Lancer showing was junior Billy Howard who won all four of his matches last week and has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period November 17-24. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

A veteran in his third year on the Lancer team, Howard took a 14-0 decision at 158 pounds in Longwood's loss to William & Mary Tuesday night and then won all three of his matches Saturday as the Lancers beat Pfeiffer 39-14, Furman 36-18 and Hampden-Sydney 39-8.

"Billy has wrestled extremely well since getting his weight down to 158 pounds," said coach Steve Nelson. "He was rated as a preseason All-American in NCAA Division II and he has lived up to that rating this past week.

"He is starting to show much more maturity and is working much harder this year," said the coach. His hard work is shwoing early season dividends as he is 4-0 in dual meets."

Riding Team Gains Ribbons

Sunday, Nov. 24, 1985, at their show at R-MWC, the Longwood riding team brought home three first place ribbons. These were won by Mike Carey, LeaAnne Lawson and Laura Thomas. Mike's and LeaAnne's blues won them a spot in the regional show. This means they are both State finalists. Among the other ribbon winners were Liz Stevens, Bill Fahey, Jennifer Winn, and Sharron Kaufman.

The next show will be held on Dec. 6, at Sweet Briar College. Stay in tune for more state finalists.

Results: Laura Thomas — Flat, 1st; LeaAnne Lawson — Fences, 1st; Bill Fahey — Fences, 3rd; Liz Steven — Flat, 5th; Mike Carey — Flat, 1st. and Fences, 5th; Sharon Kaufman — Flat, 5th; and Jennifer Winn — Flat 4th.

Qualified for Regional: Lea Anne Lawson — Novice, Flat and Novice, Fences; Mike Carey — Novice, Flat and Novice Fences.

Next show — Dec. 6 at Sweet Briar.

SCHEDULE OF EXAMINATIONS FALL 1985

Examinations for the Fall Semester 1985 are scheduled at times determined by the regular class meeting time. For example, the examination for the classes normally meeting at 2 p.m. Tuesday and/or Thursday will be held 9-12 Thursday, December 17 in the regular class meeting location.

This schedule provides makeup periods on Thursday, December 12, Monday, December 16, and Tuesday, December 17. Makeup periods have been established so that students with valid reasons may arrange with the instructor to make up a missed exam.

Night classes will take their examination from 7-10 on the regularly scheduled night during examination week. The Wednesday night courses will take their examination from 7-10 on Reading Day.

Students having three examinations on one day may take one of the examinations during the conflict period or during a scheduled makeup period. The arrangements are to be worked out between the student and the instructor.

SOCCER

Longwood senior Mark McArdle has been named to the Virginia Intercollegiate Soccer Association All-State team for the third year in a row, and teammates John Kennen and Erick Karn have also been voted to the select group. Kennen is a two-time All-State pick.

McArdle, a second team All-America in 1984, had three goals and two assists from his midfield position as the Lancers notched a 12-4-3 record and 20th place national ranking in Division II. Kennen, a senior forward, collected 6 goals and a record-tying 10 assists. Karn was a consistently outstanding performer at sweeper for what was probably Longwood's best defense ever.

Lancer booters named to the All-VISA second team are goalkeeper Rob Liessem, midfielder Mahfoud Kyoud and forward Mark Kremen. All three are juniors.

Liessem had a record-tying six shutouts and a goals against average of 0.88, Kyoud totaled 4 goals and 4 assists and Kremen had eight goals and three assists.

The Candidates

MICHAEL CLEMENTS

The upcoming election on Tuesday will not only decide the Student Government Association officers, but as well, the effectiveness of the SGA for the next two semesters and possibly even further into the future. My plans of running for SGA president are not new ones. I have been involved in student government since I arrived at Longwood. As Freshman class president, I was quickly oriented with the system. Also, as member of the Student Advisory Committee to the President and the Student Life Committee I am able to witness and take part in what I think is necessary to be a good, knowledgeable and effective SGA president

Through my involvement, I have been able to form some strong views about the policies, administration and student body of Longwood College. To be more specific, I believe there are many policies at Longwood that need to be altered or amended. In the same right, there are some that should not exist at all and some that do exist which should be strictly informed. One such policy is that of visitation. Past studies about the feasibility of our policy in comparsion with those of other institutions have been done. It is my plan to continue the work done on this subject and prepare a proposal to the Board of Visitors on their next visit, which will allow for a more open and, in my opinion reasonably visitation policy.

In reference to my views on the administration and the student body, I am very concerned with the relationship between the two. I feel that are far too many thing that are done on this campus, in which students don't have the input they deserve. I strongly believe there should be three opinions equally considered on any decisions that will effect the college as a community. The three opinions I am speaking of are the administration, the faculty and the students. As well, I feel that the students are very poorly informed about what is happening on campus. If put in the position to correct this, correct it is what I will do.

Lastly, I plan to make a few changes in the Student Government Association itself. This association is an organization which will represent, inform, and serve the entire student body. Therefore, it should be the most efficient possible. One constitutional change I plan to bring before the Senate for vote is an amendment that would make the Judical Board Chairs members of the Executive council. Also, I plan to put more consideration in the way that the money of SGA is allocated to its various agencies, such as Judical and Honor Boards. Also, I sincerely plan to see more funds go to residence halls and other facilities, which I believe will lead to an enchanced pride in the institution of which we are a part.

As you can see, I have a lot of plans for the future of Longwood College. I sincerely hope that you the students are dedicated to the betterment of the college as much as I. In turn, I sincerely hope you will put me in the position to work for you on Tuesday. Just remember to vote with consideration to how your choice will affect you. I feel a vote for Michael Clements is a vote for a better Longwood.

JOHN COLANGELO

When I came to this college a year and a half ago I was one of the privileged few who spent those first important days of my college career not in a dorm, but in "temporary - housing" (basements, converted kitchens and, as in my case, a motel located a mile and a half from campus). It seems that the wonderful institute of higher education in which I was enrolling had a housing policy about as old as the school itself.

I would like to work towards the realization of several goals as S.G.A. President, one of which is a change in the current housing policies of the school. I would like to see further improvement in the work currently underway to develop separate housing for fraternity and sorority members as well as creating greater opportunity for other students to live off campus. I think that if Longwood wants to grow and become an important figure in the world of education, it's going to have to let go of some of its traditional values and move towards more modern and efficient policies.

I think that work on a new proposal for the Board of Visitors should also be begun within this next semester in order to develop a more realistic visitation policy than the form of "hide and go seek" we have now. Much work has already been done within the S.G.A. in researching the visitation policies at other colleges and I feel that a workable plan could be reached within the near future. I would like to see a lot of involvement from the student body in developing this plan as well as other policies and programs which affect the student population. I will strive to increase the intercommunication of various student organizations and the student body as a whole. Policies such as limiting first semester freshmen from registering automobile on campus should be made with consideration from all sides and not just the opinions of a limited few. I personally would like to see a policy such as this take effect as well as the pursuit of additional parking areas, somewhere within this zip code, but I am open to other suggestions and views on the matter.

Another priority I see for the S.G.A. in the coming year is to keep the Judicial and Honor Boards in student hands and running smoothly. I think that the reformation of the Student Judicial Advisory Council (SJAC) will prove a fundamental step in supporting student rights.

I know from past experience that nothing is immune to change and that if you honestly feel something is wrong you can change it with a little hard work and determination. I think that I demonstrated this fact recently with my effort to stop forced participation of sophomores in the Longwood Involvement project.

I believe that through my extensive involvement during high school and here at Longwood that I have developed a solid background of work in student government and can bring new ideas and a new approach to the Student Government at Longwood. I have a real desire to make the S.G.A. a more effective instrument in improving the quality of life here at Longwood.

The Rotunda Reader Survey

Survey Developed by John Tipton

In an effort to improve public opinion of "The Rotunda" our research staff has devised a simple survey for our readers to complete and return to our processing headquarters located somewhere. This is a chance for you, our readers, to speak out and be heard. Thank you for your cooperation.

1. "The Rotunda," so far this semester, has been . . . A. the most meaningful thing in my life. B. bearable. C. made by classes bearable. D. the only thing I've read.

2. I feel "The Rotunda" could be improved if . . . A. it was written in Greek. B. it was published daily. C. it contained stories inquiring minds want to know. D. the paper and college were moved to somewhere in New Mexico.

3. If you were told that the last issue ever of "The Rotunda" was about to be published you would . . . A. cry, scream, and dive face first into a radiator. B. sigh. C. picket in front of Lankford until your feet fell off. D. ask someone what "The Rotunda" is.

4. How many times a year on the average do you read "The Rotunda?" A. once or twice, I think during class. B. ten times, but all of the same issue. C. twenty times, usually after rushing home from lunch on a Tuesday. D. never really thought about it.

5. I feel "The Rotunda" is the best newspaper in this hemisphere because . . . A. it's free. B. it contains vital news items which cannot even be found on the bathroom wall. C. it makes me feel informed. D. it's totally friggin' awesome.

6. I feel the editorials sometime lack . . . A. my own personal opinion. B. depth. C. violence, nudity, and gore. D. brevity.

7. I think the writers of "The Rotunda" belong . . . A. to a unique group of hard-working, funloving individuals. B. in a padded cell. C. somewhere else. D. on a deserted island drinking Mai Thai's.

8. Overall, if "The Rotunda" continues its pattern exhibited thus far, in fifty years I feel it will . . . A. muscle out the Farmville Herald as far as a cult following goes. B. be an equal to or better than The Wall Street Journal, The Washington Post, and The New York Times. C. become a puppet publication for international terrorists. D. Both A and C.

This is not an actual survey. In the event of an actual survey you will be told which page of "The Rotunda" to turn to for further information.

By MARIA GINDER

Finally! Something is being done about cleaning up our campus. The fall of 1985 saw the development of S.A.L.T., Students Against Longwood's Trash. The goal of the group is to increase awareness about the importance of protecting our living environment from different kinds of pollution.

The group hopes to get student involvement and to increase the sense of pride around our campus and throughout Farmville.

S.A.L.T. is in close touch with the Prince Edward Litter Control Task Force, and f necessary will request assistance from the State Water Control Board and The Virginia Division of Litter Control.

The students involved feel that The Keep Longwood Beautiful program might be more successful if students on campus were approached by peers who are committed to the cause. They are trying to convey a positive attitude throughout the campus, toward keeping our campus and the Town of Farmville litter free, or as beautiful as possible.

Nutritional Survey

By JUDITH BURKS

The Student Member Section of Virginia Home Economics received the results from 130 returned nutritional surveys given to randomly selected classes at Longwood.

The survey showed that dinner was the meal eaten the most, and breakfast was the meal often skipped. This made a student starting his day feel sluggish which resulted in getting hungry sooner. Therefore, the student snacked throughout the day to make up for the missed meal. Most snacks were eaten between dinner and bedtime. This created extra calories that would probably not be burned off if the snack had no food value. The seven most popular snacks were 1. soft drinks, 2. popcorn, 3. candy, 4. potato chips, 5. french fries, 6. fruit, 7 crackers.

The Recommended Daily Dietary Allowances for females age of 19-22 are 2,000 calories per day; 44 grams of protein; 800 milligrams of calcium; 78 mg of iron; 4,000 units of Vitamin A; and 60 mg of Vitamin C. Males of the age 19-22 should have 2,900 calories per day, 56g of protein; 800 mg of calcium; 10 mg of iron; 5,000 units of Vitamon A and 60 mg. of Vitamin C.

The foods most commonly eaten by students as snacks have been divided into categories according to it's caloric content and the amount of protein, fat, carbohydrates, calcium, iron, Vitamin A and Vitamin C found in each.

The amount of energy taken in from food equals the energy spent on daily activities. If a person is overweight, reducing caloric intake and increasing activity will help one to lose weight gradually.

A daily food intake should contain complex carbohydrates with starch and fiber found in fruits and vegetables. Avoid overuse of concentrated sweets such as sugar, candies and cola beverages. Carbohydrates should be 55 per cent of caloric intake. One should be moderate in the use of meats and nuts and other fat rich foods; also be moderate with pure fats such as butter and oils. Fats should be 30 per cent of caloric intake.

A meal should have adequate amounts of protein from meats, fish, poultry, eggs, cheese and milk. Protein should be 20 per cent of caloric intake.

One should get their Vitamin A from dark green or deep orange vegetables or fruit with Vitamin A every day. Citrus fruits everyday will give adequate Vitamin C and one should have calcium everyday.

If one follows the nutritional guidelines of the preceding they will more than likely start feeling better about themselves and will be healthier and happier. Go ahead, you have nothing to lose and everything to gain, but weight.

Merry Christmas!

Parking Yet Again

By Maria Ginder

It seems as though the issue of parking on campus is one that has been played out over and over again, but just recently I was faced with a situation that I'm sure many other students have been stuck in.

I've been told that the campus police offer ride services any time of the night, but what if you are returning to campus in the late night or early morning and you've been driving all around the lots closet to your dorm, and you see cars blocking other cars in, cars taking up two spaces, etc . . ., so you are faced with the problem of parking across campus somewhere and walking back to your dorm alone.

Are phones properly placed all around campus to call the campus police for a ride? Will they be willing to take along any luggage you might have? What if you don't have any change to make the connection to the Campus Police Office? (after all you do have to deposit 25 cents after dialing and the party has answered).

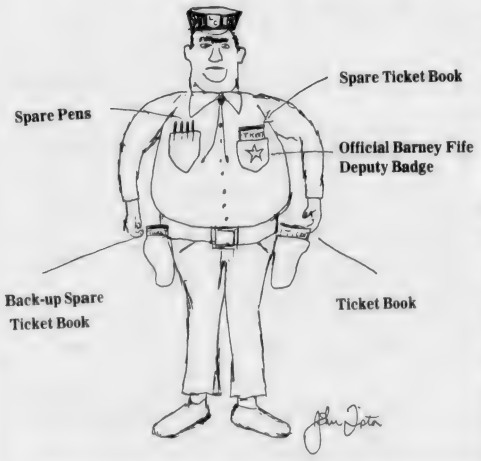
I'm not sure what the possibilities are to help solve this problem, my concern is that it's dangerous to walk across campus alone during the late night or early morning, regardless if you are male or female.

AXP Does Good

By JOHN TIPTON

On Saturday, December 7, twenty-two youngsters descended upon the Alpha Chi Rho Chapter Room located in main Cunningham basement. The fraternity, along with the help of several Sigma Sigma Sigma volunteers, area merchants, Reverend Breckinridge, and Santa Claus entertained the Farmville area underprivileged children.

The day started for the AXP brothers with a daring journey into Parkview Gardens Apartments and to Woodlawn Trailer Court where the young tykes were holding up. The AXP brothers and the volunteers entertained the kids with their wily antics, cheerful conversation, and a few Christmas carols.



Gifts, most of which were donated by area merchants, were given to the Santa Claus (AXP Brother Mike Cary) and then distributed to the children. Food and drinks were also donated for the children.

The children, ranging from six to eleven years of age, were chosen by Reverend Breckenridge because they came from low income families. Reverend Breckinridge also helped the fraternity with planning the event.

Reverend Breckinridge said he was very happy with the way things turned out and was confident all the children enjoyed themselves.

Since this projct was so successful AXP President Terry Raum said he thought that AXP would try this again in the future.

Fashion Show

By JUDITH BURKS

In January, the Office of Career Planning and Placement will have a fashion show in the Blackwell Dining Hall. The theme will be "Dress for Success." Students have been chosen to represent their Sororities, Fraternities, and other organizations on campus to model outfits. The outfits that will be modeled will show how students going into the business world can dress and look successful. The exact date has not yet been decided. Look for details in the Campus Bulletin.

Couture's Book

Historian Richard Couture describes his recently published book as "a labor of love."

The book is titled To Preserve and Protect: A History of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities (APVA). Published by Taylor Publishing Co. of Dallas, the book is now available in Richmond bookstores, from the APVA, and from the Longwood College bookstore.

Most of the book's fact — and a great deal of the color and commentary — were gleaned from APVA Minutes, yearbooks, and scrapbooks. Couture said he enjoyed reading these materials because "there is so much humanity and humor involved."

He also interviewed many of the present members of the APVA, exploring how the philosophy of the organization has evolved and where it may be headed.

The APVA was founded January 4, 1889, when "a group of ladies got together to try to preserve Jamestown Island," Couture said. "Those public-spirited and public-minded ladies sort of backed into what has become the premier preservation organization in the country."

The APBA now owns 46 properties and has 22 branches. It has been the model for several other prestigious preservation organizations.

Among important APVA properties are: Jamestown, the "cradle of America;" Bacon's Castle in Surry County, a huge Jacobean structure built c. 1665; the Cape Henry Lighthouse, the first lighthouse authorized by Congress, built in 1791 near the spot where the English colonists landed on their way to Jamestown; Scotchtown in Hanover County, built c. 1719, Patrick Henry's home during his active political life and later the girlhood home of Dolley Payne Madison, wife of President James Madison; the Mary Ball Washington House in Fredericksburg; and the John Marshall House in Richmond.

The APVA also owns the Colonial Capitol site and Powder Magazine in Williamsburg but has leased these properties for 99 years to Colonial Williamsburg, Inc.

The overriding aim of the organization throughout its nearly 100 years of existence, Couture says, has been to make Virginia's historic shrines accessible to the public through preservation and education. As each property was acquired, work began immediately to make it ready for opening to visitors.

The Association also has undertaken the care and protection of numerous tombs and graveyards, the preservation of historical records, the restoration of gardens, and the placing of plaques and other markers at points of interest throughout the state.

Couture says he has made no attempt to hide the human follies, frictions, and "rivalry sometimes felt just below the surface of the APVA Minutes.

"The ladies lived in conflict," he notes, "but there was never any deep jealously, no lasting bitterness nor hatred... In strain and at odds with government and nature, the ladies fought time, lethargy, inactivity, and ignorance."

In publishing the APVA history, Couture said, he seeks "only the credit that this Association deserves for the great work that has been done."

From its beginning with those ladies who "wnet out and did the job they felt they had to do" to save Jamestown Island and other Virginia shrines, the APVA has become a multimillion-dollar organization with headquarters in Richmond and a professional staff. Its work includes historical research and archeological explorations, authentic restoration and furnishing of homes and other buildings. "living history" that demonstrates the lifestyles of bygone years, and oral histories that record and preserve personal reminiscences.

But the motivation for the work is the same as it was a century ago. Couture writes that the APVA is "more than the sum of its parts . . . and projects. Overall, the APVA has come to mean love.

"Love is a peculiar word to give to a sticks and stones organization," he continues, "but love is what motivated the early work — love for Virginia and her shrines. With the love, the APVA would have been a cold and unimportant organization in the history of the Commonwealth."

Couture is assistant professor of history at Longwood College and resides at Bolling Island Plantation in Goochland County. He is the author of A Bicentennial History of Powhatan County and has done considerable work on a history of Longwood College.

He is a lifetime member of the APVA and serves on the board of trustees of the Preservation Alliance of Virginia.

Rotunda Holiday Preparation Tips

With the Christmas Holidays right around the corner the Rotunda Nutritional Research Staff has come up with some tasty holiday treats to satisfy the palate. Here are a few recipes to try on your friends and family.

First, here is a simply delectable holiday dip that will make even the lousiest celery or cauliflower seem a delicacy.

INGREDIENTS

8 oz. sour cream
4 oz. semi-sweetened chocolate
1 oz. finely chopped canibus sativa
4 oz. Mad Dog 20-20 grape wine
2 jalepeno peppers

STEP 1 — First mix the four ounces of wine, the one ounce of chopped canibus, and the eight ounces of sour cream in a large bowl.

STEP 2 — Next, melt the four ounces of chocolate while stirring constantly. Dice the jalepeno peppers and add to the melted chocolate still stirring constantly.

STEP 3 — Add the peppers and chocolate to the sour cream and stir fifty strokes or until the dip is a light brown. Cover and let sit overnight at room temperature. A delightful family treat.

Next, here is a recipe for a holiday drink that will liven up even the dullest of situations.

INGREDIENTS

1 candy cane
1 jigger of Bacardi 151 proof rum
1 jigger of Wild Turkey 101 proof bourbon
1 jigger of Peppermint Schnapps

STEP 1 — Fill an eight ounce glass with ice.

STEP 2 — Add 1 jigger of Bacardi, 1 jigger of Wild Turkey, and 1 jigger of Schnapps.

STEP 3 — Stir with candy cane and serve with it in the drink. For the children,d o the same steps replacing shots of liquor with shots of water or cough syrup.

Life Skills

By Karen Wallace

The Counseling Service here at Longwood offers a series of workshops in addition to individual counseling in Life skills. Trained counselors assist students with assertiveness training, stress management, weight control and other problems that students are most likely to face in college.

Assertiveness is the ability to appropriately express yourself. One learns not to be aggressive or passive, and is taught to react, through role play, calmly and maturely. This type of ability to react is helpful in dealing with roommates. Sometimes when a person does not like the actions of his or her roommate they will hold back their feelings instead of expressing them honestly. At some point in time the person cannot hold back any longer and their anger is released, usually on their roommate. This just causes problems. If students can learn how to react to situations, such resulting problems may not occur.

We all know that college can cause a lot of stress. Grades, tests, peer pressure, and even your family can cause most of this stress. The Life skills workshop will teach the individual coping skills, like certain exercises, to deal with the stress. This can make college much easier to handle.

These life skills can help you handle problems that may arise in college, but more importantly, they may be applied throughout a person's life. Careers and a family also brings about problems, and coping skills, if learned now, can be used at anytime.

The Counseling Service is located on the first floor of French. Remember, this is for your use. Much can be befitted from such programs, so use them and grow from them.

NOTICE: Students who pre-register and do not pay by the due date will be subject to a $50 late fee and/or schedule cancellation. Students who register after the late registration date will be charged a $50 late fee. For spring semester 1986, bills are due December 13, 1985, and late registration is January 13, 1986.

Groff All-Region

Longwood senior field hockey player Sue Groff has received honorable mention on the All-South Region team, composed primarily of Division I players.

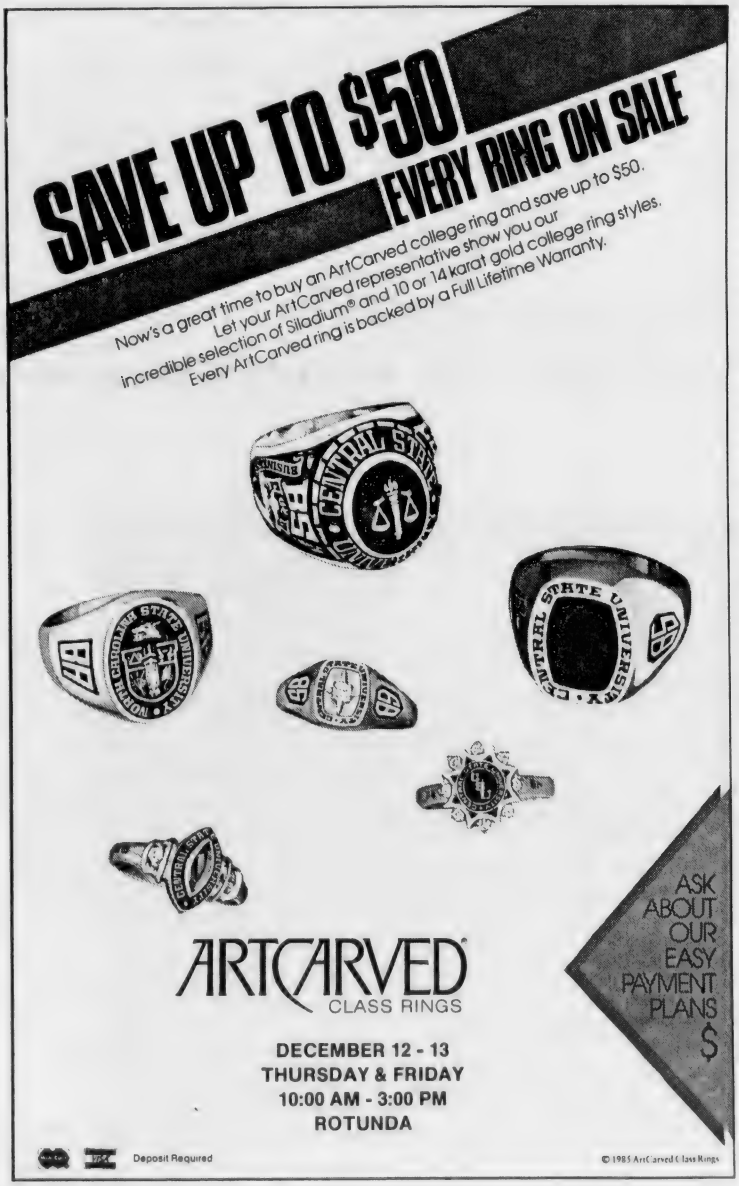
Groff, the Lady Lancer's second leading all-time scorer, led Longwood to one of its best seasons ever this past fall.

Intramural Update

Past Event Winners:

The swimming events took place on Monday, November 25, with the "Strokers" winning all six events in the men's division. The "4th Floor Fluzies" dominated all six events in the women's competition. Men's volleyball came to an end last week with the "Bandits" keeping an undefeated record throughout the tournament. "Death from above strikes again" made there way back through the losers bracket to take second.

Underway:



Women's indoor soccer is now underway with three teams still in the tournament. The "Crazy 8's" are the only undefeated team left. The finals will take place Tuesday, December 10. Women's pool began on December 3 with eight women entering. Amy Cook and Cindi Krauthamer are both still undefeated. The tournament will come to an end on Tuesday, December 10. There are ten teams entered in the weekend basketball tournament. Play will begin at 10 a.m., Saturday, December 7. The tournament will continue into Sunday with the final game at 4 p.m.

Coming Events:

(1) Regular men's basketball will begin play after Christmas break. There are seven "B" league teams entered and eight "A" league.

(2) The song contest will be held on January 21st after returning from Christmas break. Classes should plan to participate and start writing their songs.

The IAA staff and officers would like to wish everyone a "Merry Christmas."

Work Up A Sweat

SAN DIEGO, CA (CPS) — It wasn't unusual to come across Patty Randolph jogging, stocking-footed, in the ladies' room just before an exam.

As a student, Randolph jogged to give her brain an ozygen boost for the test. Now, as a developmental psychology lecturer for San Diego State, she passes along similar study and test-taking tips to her own students.

"Studying is a kind of hoop-jumping event," Randolph says. "There are certain skills you can develop that will put you a few grade points higher.

"It can mean the difference between a 'B+' and an 'A' or a 'C+' and a 'B,' " she adds.

Keeping the brain stimulated during an exam is as important as keeping the rest of your body relaxed, she advises. Randolph recommends drinking fruit juice during an exam to maintain the brain's glucose level.

When you receive the exam paper, she suggests putting it aside, closing your eyes and clearing your mind.

"Take a deep breath and relax; concentrate on how much you know and don't worry about what you don't know. Be positive," she says.

Randolph says students sometimes "psyche themselves out" on exams to the point where their completed test doesn't reflect their actual knowledge.

Keeping your body in good shape prior to an exam usually helps the brain stay active, too.

"How well you think is reflective of how your body is doing," she says.

She recommends eating fruit, instead of candy bars, for energy, because it makes you feel better physically, and feeling positive is a must for doing well on a test.

Randolph compiles her study tips from fellow faculty members, counseling center resources, and students attending study workshops she conducted at Texas Christian University.

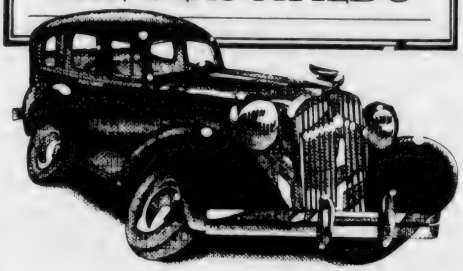
She says freshmen in particular need study tips because they "don't realize the importance of studying as a regular habit."

"They also have the added burden of training other people to respect their study habits; to have other people accept their studying."

If a student is afraid of the material, he needs to have a talk with himself and start with his hardest subjects first, when he is freshest, she advises.

"But if he is absolutely paranoid, start with the easiest subjects to reinforce confidence."

But can you study too much?



Yes, she says, if extra studying means skimping on sleep.

"It's okay to make trade-offs on sleep versus study, depending on how well you know your body. Cut down on sleep if you know you can still operate well," she advises. "There's no point to being so exhausted you aren't able to say what you know on an exam."

For some students, however, the night before the test is spent not reviewing information, but learning it for the first time. Such cramming, Randolph says, is a "waste of time."

"If you've never put the material in before, you're not going to get it out during the exam."

Men's Basketball Wins Three

LONNIE LEWIS

A week that began with an 85-63 defeat at North Carolina Charlotte ended on a roll for the Longwood men's basketball team as the Lancers polished off Averett, Benedict and St. Leo to up their record to 3-4.

Paced by senior co-captains Kenneth Fields and Lonnie Lewis, Longwood played well defensively and got its fast break going. The Lancers scored 100 points for the first time in three years Wednesday night in a 102-57 win over Averett.

Friday and Saturday in the Central Virginia Doubleheader at Liberty University, Longwood beat Benedict 86-72 and highly regarded St. Leo 80-58. Fields had 46 points and 23 rebounds in the two games while Lewis chipped in with 56 points and 12 rebounds. Fields is averaging 22.1 ppg. and 8 rpg. while Lewis is right behind with a 21.7 ppg. average.

Center Quintin Kearney, who is improving with each game, had 13 points and 11 rebounds in the win over Benedict and 11 points against St. Leo, a team that lost to Liberty in overtime Friday night. Kearney is averaging 10.8 points and 6.8 rebounds for Longwood.

This week Longwood hosts North Carolina Asheville Monday night and visits Division I East Carolina Wednesday night. The games will end the Lancers' play in 1985. The next contest will be January 4, 1986 when St. Vincent visits.

After Longwood got off to its 0-4 start this season, coach Cal Luther told his team that better days were ahead if they would just keep plugging.

"I told our players that we would battle our way back out of this thing, if they would just keep working and not lose confidence in what we're trying to do."

Luther says the big keys to Longwood's turnaround are defense and shooting.

"We didn't shoot very well in our first two games and our opponents shot the lights out," said the coach. "Our shooting has been excellent recently and our defense has helped get us some easy opportunities on the break."

Longwood has shot over 50 percent in each of its last five games, culminating in the 67.9 percent the team had against St. Leo.

Leading the way in the shooting department are Fields and Lewis. Fields canned 21 of 29 shots in the two games at Liberty while Lewis bagged 22 of 33 field goals. Lewis also hit 12 of 12 free throws in the two games. He is hitting 88.2 percent of his free throws.

Fields, a 6-2 skywalker, grabbed 13 rebounds in the win over Benedict and 10 against St. Leo. He's shooting .648 from the floor and .841 from the line. He had seven assists to go along with his 24 points in Saturday night's win.

Guards Frank Tennyson and Kevin Ricks also had solid performances over the weekend. Tennyson had 10 points, 4 assists and 2 steals and Ricks 9 points, 9 rebounds, 3 assists and 2 steals in the win over Benedict.

Lonnie Lewis Named Player Of The Week

Senior co-captain Lonnie Lewis got his shooting eye zeroed in on the basket last week, scoring 81 points in three Longwood men's basketball victories. For his performance, Lewis has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period December 1-8. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

A 6-3 forward, Lewis had games of 25, 30 and 26 points as Longwood whipped Averett 102-57, Benedict 86-72 and St. Leo 80-58. The Henrico High School graduate also made 13 of 13 free throws and 34 of 48 shots from the floor (70.8 per cent).

Lewis also moved into fourth place on the all-time Longwood career scoring list last week. He now has 1,089 points to move past All-American Kenny Ford, who scored 1,040 from 1978 through 1981.

A starter off and on since his freshman season, Lewis is in the midst of his best start ever. He has now scored 20 or more points in four of Longwood's seven games and has demonstrated improved play in both rebounding and defense.

Currently averaging 21.7 ppg., Lewis is hitting 52.1 per cent of his shots from the floor and 88.2 per cent from the free throw line. He also has 19 steals and 19 assists.

Lancer Wrestling

By Tony Brzezicki

Paced by 134-pound junior John Stukes, Longwood's wrestling team managed a sixth place finish out of eight teams in the Washington & Lee Invitational Tournament Friday and Saturday in Lexington, Virginia.

Stukes defeated his three opponents, twice by pin, once by technical fall, and placed first in his weight division in the tournament.

Hiram won the tournament, followed by W&L, York College, Gettysburg, Longwood, Mecklenburg, and Loyola.

"Stukes wrestled very well," said coach Steve Nelson. "He outclassed everyone in his weight-class and wrestled some excellent matches. The week layoff did hurt us some. We did not wrestle well as a team."

Also placing for the Lancers were Pete Whitman-142, 3-1 at 3rd place, Billy Howard-158, 2-2 at 4th place, and David Taylor-190, 2-2 at 4th place. Also competing for the Lancers were John Boatwright-150, Jesus Stauss-HWT, and Shawn Washington-167.

This week Longwood faces always tough Campbell on Tuesday in Lancer Hall. Matches will begin at 7:00.

SOCCER

Longwood senior booters Mark McArdle and John Kennen are among 11 players from three teams who have been voted to the 1985 All-South Atlantic Region soccer team as voted by the region coaches.

Both Kennen and McArdle, who led Longwood to a 12-4-3 mark this past fall, were named to the all-region squad a year ago. McArdle was also picked as a second team All-American.

Kennen socred 6 goals and passed for 10 assists, tying the Longwood record for assists in a season. McArdle had three goals and two assists and played more than half the season with a cast on his broken right wrist.

Gramm-Rudman Bill Could Slash Student Aid By 60%

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — Congress' new budget-balancing bill, passed in December, could mean student aid soon could be cut by as much as 60 percent, some college lobbyists here warn.

The first round of cuts is due March 1. Various sources estimate the first round could mean decreases of anywhere from two to 40 to 60 percent in all student aid programs.

The new law, usually called the Gramm-Rudman law after senators Philip Gramm (R-Tex.) and Warren Rudman (R-NH), who co-sponsored it, forces the federal government to balance its budget by 1991.

But in doing so, Congress is not allowed to cut spending for Social Security, some welfare programs, many defense programs or to pay off the federal debt.

So, unless the government tries to help balance the budget by raising some taxes, education programs will be tempting fiscal targets, lobbyists say.

By calculating current Gramm-Rudman targets and the escalating deficit, Susan Frost of the Committee for Education Funding figures the U.S. Dept. of Education will have to shave all its college program funding by 4.6 percent in March and another 30 percent in October.

Educators are reluctant to specify just how many students would be forced out of school by the cuts, or to estimate how much schools would have to raise tuition to compensate for them.

The same pressure to reduce spending could also force Congress to reduce college program funding in the upcoming Higher Education Act of 1985, which sets spending levels through 1990, adds Pat Smith, legislative analyst for the American Council on Education (ACE).

Under the the new law, Ozer estimates Congress will have to trim about $11.7 billion from the 1986 fiscal year budget by March.

If it doesn't, President Reagan would "sequester" funds, deciding by himself which programs not to fund in order to save money.

Based on what he's done before, the president would seem likely to cut education programs to do it.

The federal government will spend about $8 billion on student aid programs this year — about the same as in fiscal 1985 before a supplemental appropriation bill funding Guaranteed Student loans passed.

After March, the Gramm-Rudman law then mandates the government to find ways to keep reducing the federal deficit by $36 billion a year through the rest of this decade.

One way to reduce the deficit, of course, is to raise taxes.

"More and more people are talking about a tax increase. It will be the only way," reports Tom Gleason, a spokesman for Sen. Gary Hart (D-CO).

"I don't think there is a proclivity toward cuts," argees Bob Sneed, an aide to Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-SC). "Most people think drastic reductions" without accompanying tax hikes "will be dead on arrival" in Congress.

Gleason thinks some conservative senators will endorse tax hikes if they help spare the defense budget from cuts, though he doesn't expect them to publicly support the hikes until after next fall's elections.

Ozer worries fall may be too late for many student aid programs.

Skeleton Comes To Longwood

Lancaster Library Temporary Home

By KIM DEANER

Julie Gorniak, on anthropology major at Longwood, is studying the skeleton of an Indian woman who lived approximately 300 years ago.

The skeleton was found in good condition by Loy C. Carter in September of 1984. It was uncovered in Mecklenburg county on the Dan River.

"Finding a complete skeleton like this is fairly rare," said Dr. Jordon, Associate Professor of Anthropology." To the best of my knowledge, this is the only burial which is currently being analyzed in the Commonwealth of Virginia."

Gorniak feels the skeleton is in good shape and said that they have 174 of 206 bones.

The skeleton was found in a fetal position. Gorniak said, "The arms were crossed over the chest and the knees were drawn up toward the chest. They buried people like that for two reasons: it saved time digging because the hole was smaller, and it aided in what they believed was re-birth into the next life."

Julie Gorniak and Oscarette who is now on display in Lancaster Library.

A pottery vessel, necklace made of turkeybone and a bracelet made of shells were also found with the skeleton.

Gorniak stated, "I think it's a female. As far as I'm concerned, the sex has been determined." With this conclusion the skeleton has been renamed Oscarette as opposed to Oscar which was the name it had when it was believed to have been a male skeleton.

The skeleton is now on exhibit in the library. It is in its flexed burial position and can be found on the main floor. Oscarette will be remaining on campus until March 25 then she will be returned to Loy C. Carter.

Spring Job Prospects Cool

EVANSTON, IL. (CPS) — Spring grads' job prospects may not be quite as positive as previous reports predicted, the latest testing of American business' hiring plans indicates.

The previous reports, moreover, suggested only slightly better job prospects than students had last year, when the job market was at a nadir.

"I expect it to be flat, maybe plus or minus one percent compared to last year," observes Victor Lindquist, supervisor of Northwestern University's Endicott Report, the most recent of the three major surveys on job prospects for graduating seniors.

And previously "hot" engineering, computer and chemistry grads are going to have a much harder time finding jobs than their counterparts of the last few years.

Students are going to have to commit to a longer job search and be satisfied with fewer choices," Lindquist says.

In late November, the College Placement Council (CPC) projected firms will make two percent more job offers than they did last spring, while in December Michigan State's national survey of buisness hiring plans predicted a 1.4 percent rise in job offers for '86 grads.

The three surveys ask companies throughout the country how many first-time job seekers they plan to hire from the next graduating class.

Lindquist says his report was less optimistic because it polled firms three months after the CPC did, and because it does not sample government agencies' plans like the CPC does.

"Our report is pretty close to (John) Shingleton's at Michigan (State)," he notes.

"All three surveys sample different populations," explains Rhea Nagle of the CPC.

For only the third time in 20 years, Lindquist's "population" had a declining interest in hiring engineering majors. There will be six percent fewer job offers for them this year, the report said.

The Endicott Report also predicts a nine percent decrease in offers to chemistry majors. The other reports anticipated a "slight" increase.

The Northwestern survey does agree that computer majors will suffer a five percent decrease in employment opportunities.

My Page

My girlfriend says, "Why don't you write a nice editorial for once." I tried, I really did. I searched my heart for optimism and benevolence. Perhaps I've had a poor upbringing; maybe it was that time I was jumping on the bed like I wasn't supposed to and the spring broke and I got launched into the dresser and split my head. .

Several students have approached me with the latest monetary travesty perpretrated by Longwood College. The problem is with the comprehensive fees. Apparently the Board of Visitors (it's a nice place to visit but...) has decided that everybody must pay these fees no matter what the circumstances.

Sometimes these circumstances get rather extreme, yet the administration is handcuffed by Longwood policy and shows little flexibility.

Student teachers always pay $400.00 in fees even though they spend ten weeks of the semester up to 3 hours away teaching drooling pre-pubescents how to 'write good'. The student teachers are charged $345.00 in fees if they live off campus during the six weeks they do spend at Longwood for modules. That means they are charged for sixty-plus dollars per week spent at Longwood. That's a heck of a lot of student activity. That's a comprehensive fee alright.

Four students have been chosen to student teach in Korea this semester. These students are true Longwood Ambassadors, paying all their own expenses, pioneering a new program for the Longwood brochure and probably recruiting new foreign students for Longwood. You guessed it, these four students must pay full fees also. The Board of Visitors must figure these people might fly back for the weekend and catch a Student Union double feature.

The young and bold of the R.O.T.C. program must pay fees when they go away to summer training sessions. If these students actually came to the 'wood to enjoy the benefits of the fees, they would be listed as A.W.O.L. and presumably would flunk the summer course. "Yes Sir! I went to see a S-UN double feature Sir!!" "Drop and give me a million, Cadet!"

Bruce Souza was slated to graduate in December but decided to stay enrolled at Longwood and serve an internship at the General Assembly in Richmond under Dr. Helms' government program. Souza was billed for the full $335.00 comprensive fee. Souza and Helms fought and won. The administration's Richard Hurley decided that Souza was the exception because he had already earned enough credit to graduate.

Hurley should be commended for being able to smell a ripoff and make it right. But Hurley needs permission to be more flexible and make more exceptions for some of these other cases. This can only come from the Board of Visitors.

Longwood College must really need those dollars badly if it is forced to steal it from student teachers and interns. Obviously the money is already spent somewhere. The solution is simple. They are gonna have to raise everybody's comprehensive fees by five or ten bucks and stop charging students who cannot possibly spend the dues they pay.

Future students will feel better about a more fair Longwood, more parents and alumni might donate money and Rotunda editors might begin writing wimpy 'nice' editorials.

To The Editor:

I am an elementary education major, and I have something to say about (as I am sure many psychology and education majors do) the education psychology department being moved up to the Wynne Building.

I was rather upset when I arrived at school in August to find out that half of my classes had been moved to Wynne. (Never, never land!) Although I have adjusted to the "sprint" from Wynne to Grainger everyday in ten minutes or less, I am none too happy with having a night class at Wynne.

On Monday evenings, I trek up to Wynne at about 6:30 p.m. (My class starts at 7:00, so I have to leave early to make sure I get there in time). As the class is ending I start to tense because I realize that I have to walk down that "long dark alley" to safety by myself.

I am sure everyone is now wondering where I am going with this. Well, I would like to know what were the administrators thinking about when they "stuck" one of the largest departments up in "no man's land." Didn't they consider how many students would be late for their classes when either coming from or going to Wynne? Didn't they consider how many people would have to walk back to their dorms in the dark? Didn't they consider that walking either up or down hill is not easily done on loose gravel? Didn't they consider that someone may get attacked walking down the dark wooded street late at night? Why, even if they had to move the education-psychology department to Wynne, couldn't they have put the night classes some where directly on campus? Why not Hiner? Wouldn't that be more economical? Why have two buildings open instead of only one? These are just a few questions that some of the students and I have been raising.

I feel that something needs to be done about this before someone really gets hurt. If the administrators of this fine college feel that I am just blowing off steam, I challenge any one of them to walk beside me for a week of classes. If after a week of classes this brave administrator still feels that the decision to move the education-psychology department to the Wynne building wasn't made in haste, then I will reevaluate my objections. Until then I can only feel that this was another blind decision made by the administrators of Longwood College without considering all of the repercussions.

Summer Governor's Fellows

Governor-elect Gerald L. Baliles is pleased to announce that the Governor's Fellows program, created in 1982, will be repeated in 1986. Fellows will serve during the summer of 1986. Coordinator of the program is A. E. Dick Howard, Professor of Law at the University of Virginia.

Purpose. The purpose of the program is to offer talented and highly motivated young people firsthand experience in the processes of state government. As a result of their experience, Fellows may well be attracted to careers in government or public service. In addition to giving Fellows valuable experience, the program is designed to bring fresh ideas into the Governor's Office. Moreover, the program should serve to strengthen ties between the state government and Virginia's academic community, building a mutual sense of understanding and rapport.

Eligibility. Students must be graduating seniors or must be enrolled as degree candidates in a graduate or professional school. Students enrolled in Virginia colleges or universities, public or private, may apply, regardless of state of residence. Virginia residents enrolled in out-of-state institutions, public or private, may also apply. In the selection process, there will be no discrimination on political, racial, religious, or sexual grounds.

Duration of Fellowship. An applicant selected as a Fellow must be willing to commit at least two months to full-time work in the Governor's Office. The normal period of Fellowship would be from the first week in June to the last week in July, 1986.

Assignment of Fellows. Fellows will be assigned to work with members of the Governor's Cabinet or personal staff. The nature of the assignments will depend partly on the official's needs and partly on the background and experience of the Fellow. The number of Fellows selected will depend upon the quality of the applications.

Funding. No state funds are available to support Fellows. However, in previous years, colleges and universities proved willing to offer summer grants to Fellows selected from those institutions. In 1986, institutions from which Fellows are selected will again be urged to make summer grants available.

Screening of Applications. A panel of distinguished Virginia educators has agreed to screen the applications. Personal interviews may be requested, at the discretion of the panel.

Application Procedure. Applicants should submit:

(1) A letter of application,

(2) A resume,

(3) Transcripts of undergraduate grades and of graduate school grades, if any. Be sure to indicate GPA.

Applications should include, either in the letter or the resume, the following information:

(1) Name, address, and telephone number (both present and permanent).

(2) Schools attended (with dates) and degrees, if any.

(3) Extracurricular activities.

(4) Awards and recognitions.

(5) Work experience.

(6) Voluntary community activities.

Applicants may submit such other information as they deem relevant, e.g., list of publications, leisure interests, etc.

Letters of Recommendation. Letters of recommendation would be helpful. One or two should suffice in most cases. Letters should be sent directly to the Governor's Fellows Program, rather than being submitted by the applicant with the application.

Deadline. Applications must be received by February 8, 1986.

Send applications to: A. E. Dick Howard, Governor's Fellows Program, Office of the Governor, Richmond, Virginia 23219.

National Shakespeare Company Comes To Longwood

The Quality of mercy is not strained;
It droppeth as a gentle rain from heaven
Upon the place beneath. It is twice blest;
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes.

These are famous lines from William Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice and they will be performed live Tuesday night, January 21, at 8 o'clock when the National Shakespeare Company, now in its twenty-third touring season, makes its first appearance at Longwood in Jarman Auditorium.

Following the performance of The Merchant of Venice, the National Shakespeare Company will present Shakespeare's tragedy Othello on Wednesday night at 8 p.m. on the Longwood College campus.

Both appearances by the famous company are being sponsored by the Department of Speech and Theatre in cooperation with the Longwood College Arts Council. Longwood College students will be admitted free with the presentation of their student I.D. card.

The Merchant of Venice has endured as one of Shakespeare's most popular and controversial comedies. Centering on the issues of law, love, and business, the play has been praised for its exhaltation of mercy and condemned for its seeming anti-Semitism. The play is set in Italy where the beautiful Portia has been kept a rich recluse with her cousin Nerissa by her father's will, which states that she may marry the man who chooses the correct of three caskets: one of gold, one of silver, and one of lead. Thus deprived of her free will, she pines for a young Venetian, Bassanio, while she is courted by many suitors she will not have.

Bassanio is also in love with Portia, but lacks sufficient money to woo her. He tries to borrow from his friend the merchant, Antonio, but Antonio's money has all been invested in a fleet of ships. However, Antonio agrees to stand bond for Bassanio to borrow the money from Shylock, a Jewish money lender. Shylock agrees to lend the money, but since Antonio has no capital, he requires as collateral a pound of Antonio's flesh.

Meanwhile, Shylock's daughter, Jessica, has eloped with Lorenzo, a friend of Bassanio's, taking much of Shylock's wealth with her. Shylock suspects Antonio of being behind the elopement and is determined to punish him.

Bassanio goes to Portia's home at Belmont and woos and wins her by choosing the correct casket by the rules of her father's will. But their happiness is shortlived as word arrives from Venice that Antonio's merchant ships have been wrecked at sea and Shylock is demanding his pound of flesh. Bassanio hurries back to Venice with money to repay Shylock, but Shylock refused to accept it. Instead he demands his pound of flesh from Antonio.

Portia, who has followed Bassanio back to Venice, masquerades as a judge and hears the case in court, granting Shylock his pound of flesh — but refusing him even one drop of Antonio's blood. Confounded, Shylock is unable to collect and his goods are confiscated and he is compelled to convert to Christianity.

Portia, still masquerading as the judge, also tricks Bassanio into giving her his engagement ring, which he has sworn to her never to remove from his finger, as a token of gratitude for saving Antonio. When all return to Belmont, there is much berating of each other about the rings, but all ends merrily as Bassanio and Portia, along with Lorenzo and Jessica, among others, plan weddings and lives filled with happiness, as befits the resolution of all comedies.

Amy McLellan plays the role of Portia and Dan Snow is Shylock. Ms. McLellan is a graduate of the National Shakespeare Conservatory and has played a number of roles in New York and at the Pioneer Playhouse in Danville, Kentucky. Snow has appeared in New York in various roles, including the role of Danny Minx in Joyce Carol Oates's play Triumph of the Spider Monkey. He has just completed his third season of "Project: Educational Theatre," which tours the south each year.

The National Shakespear Company's production of The Merchant of Venice is being directed by Ron Daley. Daley has been with the NSC since 1976 and has directed a number of the tour shows, including Macbeth, Hamlet, Twelfth Night, and Taming of the Shrew. He also is the Artistic Director of NSC.

A SCENE FROM THE NSC PRODUCTION "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE"

Antonio, the Merchant of Venice, with Shylock, the money-lender, and Lorenzo in a scene from the National Shakespeare Co.'s production of "The Merchant of Venice" to be presented Tuesday at 8 p.m. in Jarman Auditorium. The NSC production of the tragedy "Othello" will follow on Wednesday night in Jarman at 8 p.m.

Fire Safety

By JEFF ANDERSON

You, the Longwood community, should be aware of the danger involved with fire. Let's take, for example, one of the high rises burning down. Do you realize the amount of property and lives that would be lost? Imagine trying to find somewhere for five-hundred people to live. Would you want to be one of these people with no belongings, no books for classes, and especially no place to live. More importantly could you remain a student at Longwood.

With all this in mind, you should be aware of fire hazards that exist on campus. Carelessnesses, forgetfulness, and ignorance with the following may lead to fire: smoking materials, flame, decorations, trash, flammable liquids, furniture and especially appliances.

If a fire should occur you should stay calm and act quickly. First, you should warn others by pulling an alarm or by shouting down the hall. Next, you should get safely away and call the fire department.

Another dangerous hazard is the pulling of false fire alarms. There is a lot of confusion during a fire alarm which could cause an accident. The main reason being the "panic" related to a fire. False fire alarms cause people to loose faith in the system. If it is an actual emergency, people may not react, thinking it is false.

Pulling a false fire alarm is a Class 1 Misdemeanor punishable by up to a $1,000 fine or one year in jail or both.

KRAKAJAX Reviewed

The pulsating and fast bent band, KRAKAJAX, rocked the LDH on Friday night until the walls came tumbling down. Krakajax played a variety of music which consisted of Phil Collins, Prince, WHAM, Huey Lewis and The News, Van Halen and many others. The students really seemed to enjoy the band. One student commented that "Sun really got their act together this year. The band was awesome!" Even though the students were packed in the LDH like sardines, everyone still enjoyed the show.

Some of SUN's upcoming events include: The Observers, Janet McLaughlin and the spectacular band The Voltage Brothers.

The Students Against Longwood's Trash in conjunction with the Keep Longwood Beautiful Project that is administered by Student Development Education have just received a major boost in their program.

This past week Jennifer Hutchings, chairman of the group was informed that they were awarded first place in the college and universities "Keep Virginia Beautiful" project.

The competition went throughout Virginia in all of the state supported colleges and universities.

The Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity here at Longwood contributed to the winning of this award by their efforts to keep our campus clean.

Members of S.A.L.T., Jennifer Hutchings, Lynn Larmon, and Laura Funkhouser, along with Kathy Scheib, president of the Alpha Phi Omega fraternity, will be attending an awards banquet at the Marriot Hotel in Richmond on January 22, 1986. Also attending this banquet will be the Governor and First Lady of Virginia, as it will be she who presents the award, also the Lieutenant Governor of Virginia, athe Attorney Gneral, and other state legislatures.

The group's advisor Kathy Brown stated "I feel this is indicative of the importance of our Anti-pollution campaign. I hope it serves as incentive for participation from Longwood students toward future conservation projects."

If interested in getting involved in S.A.L.T. you could contact any on of its members. The acting officers as of now are:

Jennifer Hutchings — Chairperson; Lynn Harmon — Co-chairperson; Laura Funkhouser — Secretary; Jay Fitzhugh — Treasurer; Stacy Hicks — Publicity Manager.

Orientation Leaders Needed

By KIM DEANER

"A good orientation program is essential for new students entering Longwood if they desire to gain the maximum out of their college life. The opportunities are here, and orientation opens doors for new students that allows them to become more well rounded individuals and sharpen many valuable skills they will need later in life."

Rudy Hull

"I thoroughly enjoyed being an orientation leader. I feel it not only put me in contact with new and interesting people, but also made me more familiar with Longwood College and what a full college life should include."

Michael Clements

"This past fall was my first try at being an orientation leader. It was a good experience helping incoming freshmen with their problems and questions. I learned a lot about Longwood while helping them."

Lisa LeMay

Orientation for fall of 1986 has just entered its preliminary planning stages. Now is the time to take the opportunity to get involved in Longwood, develop leadership skills, and meet people. The requirements for an orientation leader are to participate in leadership development sessions for a total of 4-6 hours during the spring '86 semester, participate in a 4-day training session and maintain a 2.2 G.P.A. This year there will be a $100 salary for all leaders.

If anyone is interested in applying for a position, and is willing to dedicate themselves to the orientation program, applications will be available in the information office on Monday, January 20, 1986. If there are any questions contact Kathe Taylor in Student Development (392-9298), Matt Church (392-8778) or Kim Deaner (392-9579).

I.R.S. May Review Student Loan Applications

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — The Internal Revenue Service, recently signed up to help corral students who default on their student loans, may now get in the business of deciding if students are telling the truth on their aid applications.

To "catch errors" on student aid applications, the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) said last week it will ask Congress to give federal agencies access to IRS records.

Claiming student loans have the "highest error rate" of any federal benefit program, OMB spokesman Steve Tupper says the plan could save the government at least $1 billion.

But some student aid officials say the OMB insists on overestimating the error rate.

"There seems to be an attitude that there are a whole bunch of people out there cheating," says Dallas Martin, head of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administaators.

"But our experience has been that people are very, very honest," he notes.

Tupper is quick to say he doesn't believe students are "cheating," though he does call the measure "very necessary," and believes Martin "is very wrong."

Nineteen percent of all Pell Grant recipients, for example, are overpaid because of informational errors on the applications, Tupper maintains.

By verifying family income information with the IRS, institutions can make sure "everyone receives just the right amount of money they're entitled to," he adds.

But as the OMB hurries to complete the proposal before Congress adjourns for the holidays, House members already are complaining the system would invade students' privacy.

"In an attempt to eliminate abuse in government programs, we may also be eliminating privacy and personal independence," says Rep. Don Edwards, the Democratic chairman of the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights.

Student aid is only the most recent addition to the Reagan administration's effort to solve the "payment integrity problems" troubling federal benefit programs by bringing in the IRS.

Congress has already approved having the IRS verify income and eligibility for the food stamp, unemployment, Medicaid, and Aid to Dependent Children programs.

In August, the administration announced it would also have the IRS withhold the tax returns of people who are in default on their students loan repayments.

The withholding will start with 1985 tax returns.

"The OMB is saying to Congress, if your intent is payment integrity, then you must add at least a dozen other programs (to the verification systems) including student aid," Tupper says.

Tupper says the error rate for all federal benefit programs currently stands at five percent.

Allowing agancies access to IRS and other information — eg., alien status, Cocial Security files and railroad retirement income — would decrease the error amount by as much as $1 billion, Tupper estimates.

Under the new proposal, the Pell Grant overall error rate would drop "by much more than a few (percentage points," Tupper says.

Meanwhile, the Department of Education's Office of Student Aid and the American Council on Education say they'll reserve judgement until the proposal makes its way to Congress.

Student Aid

"Clearly cuts will be triggered before possible tax legislation," she says.

ACE's Smith, moreover, doesn't think states readily will replace federal student aid cuts with funds of their own.

"We haven't heard of any quantum leaps in state aid," Smith says. "It tends to go up with inflation, and that's it."

Lobbyists have not surrendered, though.

The USSA will be organizing a letter campaign around the country for students to write their representatives. The target time will be around St. Patrick's Day, when legislators will be making key decisions. "We will be working the green back in the education budget," Ozer says.

A similar nationwide letter-writing campaign helped defeat a presidential proposal to cut federal student aid programs in 1982.

Spring Job

Not all the news is gloomy, however.

There is, Lindquist found, a continuing employer interest in business and marketing degrees.

And liberal arts grads have better job prospects this yar, the Endicott Report found.

Firms planned to make 12 percent more job offers to liberal arts grads then they did last year, Linquist says.

Companies think liberal arts majors are "more able to deal with disparate thoughts and ideas. Their thinking is more holistic," Linquist says.

"We need people who can translate computers into usable terms," explains Steve Bennett, author of "Playing Hardball with Soft Skills," a soon-to-be-released book about how liberal arts majors can break into the job market.

Lindquist says American Telephone and Telegraph (AT&T) recruits liberal arts majors as managers because they perform better than any other degree.

Lindquist also credits the move by many liberal arts majors to take a more diversified curriculum, which often includes computer, math and business courses. "Kids are getting better prepared for jobs."

In preparing for the job market, Lindquist recommends seniors had "better hit the ground running now, get a resume together, know the market. You are going to be competing with all your classmates. It's going to be a very competitive year."

Halley's Comet: Science or Sales

By BARRETT BAKER

With the threat of catastrophe all but put aside, some entreprenuers are viewing Halley's comet as an excellent chance to take advantage of a good thing. According to Mr. James Caleb, who teaches marketing as a profession, this is one of those typical situations that comes about periodically where people have definite reasons for doing particular things. "Some of these people are trying to 'make a name for themselves' to show what they can do in the marketing area and then use that for a stepping stone for other projects," he said. "But I think that most of them are just in for a fast buck. I don't believe people when they tell me that they are not in it for the money or they aren't in it for something. They must have some goal in mind or else they wouldn't be doing it in the first place."

From a marketing standpoint, the appearance of the comet is going to be almost as significant to sales as it is to science. And similar to the expectations of scientists, marketing experts and novices alike are already gearing up for the big event. "You have to look ahead on something like this," said Mr. Caleb. "There is already enough competition the way it is, but if you get in on it early enough, producing the gambit of products that would be applicable to this situation — t-shirts, bumper stickers, reprints of scientific findings — you may be able to discourage at least some competition. However," he finishes, "there is still going to be the Johnny-come-latelys that will be saying, 'uh, oh! look what's happening here!' and they'll jump on the wagon, too." Already there are more than 16 different Halley t-shirts on the market with topics ranging from those who saw it in 1910, to those who will see it again in 2061. Most slogans, however, are geared towards the 'once in a lifetimers'.

In other words, whoever gets to market first will probably rake in the fastest money, and when trying to exploit something that's going to come around every 76 years for only about six months, fast is a key word. "Except, of course, for the products that are going to appreciate with time," said Mr. Caleb, "most of the people involved are not looking at this as something to make a living off of for the next ten years. There are a lot of companies who just do things like this — special event kind of things like Halley's comet or the Olympics. They don't just come into an event and then get out after it's over — they do other things as well. Take the people who make t-shirts, for instance. They change their product simply by changing the logos, regardless of whether it's going to be about the comet or whatever. Bumper stickers are the same way." Some of the more expensive items that are expected to appreciate with time are bronze medalions inscribed with "Libra Nos a Malo Cometae" or "save us from the evil of the comet," and "Haleyscopes" which are relatively inexpensive refracting telescopes that are being marketed as something that can be used as an educational tool in years to come. So the key to this attack seems to be between those who come up with the most original ideas and those who have the best-planned marketing strategies.

However, it even seems that companies having absolutely nothing to do with the comet are going to be cashing in on its appearance, also. In a New York Times article dated November 21, 1984, a science writer in Millville, New Jersey is introducing a plan called 'Dark Skies for Comet Halley' to avoid excess light from washing out the spectacle of the comet. The idea is to get people in small and middle-sized cities to turn off advertising signs and other non-essential lights after midnight. According to Mr. Caleb, even a plan like this could be profitable for businesses. "These companies might want to tie in something to coincide with the comet even though they don't have any products directly related to it — something to the effect of 'this is Halley's comet night, so we will be turning off our lights so that you can see it better and before that time we're going to have a special,'" he said. For that manner, it would be almost like any other special sale kind of situation — like Washington's birthday or Halloween. Everyone is going to have an opportunity to cash in on it. In fact, business is going so well that even certain cruise lines will have to find extra ships or book more cruises because the response to 'comet cruises' has become so great.

So what kind of effect will something like this have on the merchants or even the citizens of Farmville? Again, Mr. Caleb elaborates: "I'm sure that there will be some impact," he said, "but I don't forsee anything out of the ordinary. Most of the businesses in Farmville are very traditional — they don't really make an effort to capitalize on things like this — even to the extent of Oktoberfest. That has always been an occasion that brings a lot of people in here so you should have sales, specials, and different things happening. I don't see anything too different in this situation. That," he finishes, "might be an area that someone might like to look into."

"As for myself," said Caleb, "maybe I'm too low key — but I don't get too hyped up on this stuff. Yes, it is interesting, but I don't think that I would necessarily go out of my way for anything like a cruise. First of all, I couldn't afford it and if I could, I'd want to take it for a different reason."

The common observer who is trapped between the two extremes of science and sales can also ponder one additional thought. Comets, in general, have always been considered bad omens. This is one reason that modern astronomers discount the notion that the Star of Bethlehem was a comet — the Star was supposed to herald the birth of a king and not the death of one, as was thought in those days. As Mr. Curley points out, "The three who followed the star were wise men and they knew their astrology," he said. "It would be illogical for them to pick a comet to depict the birth of a king."

Following a quick history of Halley's comet — which, incidentally is pronounced identically to alley or Sally — could definately give someone the impression that it does symbolize something very ominous: It was in the sky when Jerusalem fell; it was in the sky when Attila the Hun was invading Italy; it was there when Norman the Conqueror invaded England in the Battle of Hastings; it was above when Napoleon was marching in and out of Russia; it passed by in 1664 and in the following year, bubonic plague wiped out a fifth of London's population; Queen Elizabeth of England was warned not to look at it — all though she really had nothing to worry about — she was not a king. "The Norman Conquest is a story in itself," said Mr. Curley. "Here was William the Conqueror in his ships off the coast of England ready to invade, and there's Halley's comet in the sky. 'Good grief', he thought, 'that means the death of a king — and I'm a king!' He had a good wizard though because the wizard explained to him, 'You are fighting another king — the comet means his death' and that seemed to convince William. And," he ends with a laugh, "it was the other king who died afterall . . . and it was probably the wizard who killed him!"

Throughout history, man has always looked for convenient ways to blame quirks of nature to cover up his own stupidity so why shouldn't a comet be subjected to the same abuse? "I think that any year you can find disasters," said Curley, "so to attribute the fact to comets is ridiculous. Take for instance Mark Twain. He came in with Halley's comet and predicted that he would go out with it — and sure enough he did it."

So what does that mean? "I don't know," said Curley. "You'll have to ask Samuel Clemens . . ."

Maybe there is a substitute for experience.

Female Teachers Let Men Dominate Class Rooms, Too

By JIM SCHWARTZ

CAMBRIDGE, MASS (CPS) — Male students tend to dominate classroom conversations even when the instructor is female, a new Harvard study says.

Previously, much education research blamed women's classroom reticence on discomfort with having male professors.

The report is the second in as many weeks indicating colleges aren't always as hospitable to women as they are to men.

Two weeks ago Congress' Office of Technology Assessment found college teachers often steer women away from high-paying science and engineering careers with subtly-discouraging classroom behavior.

In the new Harvard study, Education Prof. Catherine Krupnick videotaped Harvard courses taught by 24 different instructors, and then calculated how often — and how long — male and female students participated in classroom discussions.

Krupnick, who conducts workshops on other campuses, says men dominate classroom discussions at colleges around the country.

While Krupnick notes men's and women's grades and aptitude test scores are about the same, she says male dominance in the classroom is important because - "liberal arts schools are set up to imply participation is important."

She adds the same problems show up later in the workplace.

Krupnick began studying classroom speaking habits to help her figure out why women who do as well as men in college don't seem to be keeping up in their careers ten years after graduation.

Studies show that marriage and childbearing are not the main obstacles to career success, she adds.

Women's career problems, Krupnick now believes, are at least partially related to both their restraint in participating in the classroom and instructors' acceptance of what they have to say.

"In the real world, the ability to express ideas forcefully is important. It's highly correlated with how you do in your career," Krupnick asserts.

"It confirms our findings," says Bernice Sandler of the Project on the Education and Status of Women.

Sandler and colleague Roberta Hall have released numerous summary studies documenting differences in the way men and women go to — and are treated in —college.

Female instructors themselves often were raised in homes that considered men's views as more valuable, Sandler observes.

Their upbringing, she says, may explain why women teachers might allow men to dominate class discussions.

"Many of the different expectations for men and women are carried over from the larger social situation into the college classroom," Hall says.

In another study, University of California researchers Candice West and Donald Zimmerman found men interrupt classroom conversations three times more often than women. Also, women wait twice as long to interrupt.

However, they also found that women are just as likely as men to gain the floor when they do interrupt.

Previous research also indicated women's classroom language is not as "assertive" as men's. But Krupnick's study differed.

Krupnick compares female students' classroom problems to the plight of immigrants being introduced into the public school system in New York City around the turn of the century. "They did not speak up as much in class because of language barriers."

Women, she says, are unfamiliar with the type of assertiveness associated with success.

"College experience can reinforce old expectations, or can help women to overcome them," Hall says.

Parking Solution

By MARIA GINDER

In reference to my article in issue eleven, I have been informed of the solution to my parking problem. Once again the Campus Police came through.

If you cannot find a place to park, drive your car to the Campus Police Station. In this office there is a phone that will directly contact the officer driving around at the time. He will come to the Campus Police Station, drive in front of or behind you in your search for a parking place, then take you and whoever or whatever you have with you to your respective dorm.

Maybe you could even talk the officer into making sure you don't get a ticket the following morning if you happen to have to park illegally, but in any case, at least you will get to your dorm safely.

Bible Study

What is a parable? Is it merely a clever story or a moral tale? Hardly. A parable is a veiled self-testimony that calls for a decision from the hearer or reader. The parables of Jesus have an uncanny ability to expose and explain human existence. You are invited to participate in a ten-session Bible Study. Each participant will be given a copy of THE PARABLES OF JESUS by Dr. Peter Rhea Jones. The studies will be held in the BSU Center each Tuesday at 12:10 followed by the study of the Parables.

NATIONAL COLLEGE NEWS

YUPPIES ARE A MEDIA INVENTION: According to Business Week magazine, only 5 percent of urban residents between the ages of 25 and 39 make more than $30,000. Nearly 50 percent have incomes below $20,000.

THE MOST EDUCATED PEOPLE IN THE WORLD is how a recent Census Bureau study described Americans. In 1980-81, 32 percent of U.S. citizens 25 or older had at least some college education, compared with 17 percent of East Germans, 17 percent of Canadians, 16 percent of Swedes, 15 percent of Japanese and 7 percent of Hungarians.

A GENERATION TO WATCH: Most young women between the ages of 13 and 15 are "healthy, happy and well-adjusted, whether they are black, brown or white, middle or working class, from intact or single- parent families," according to a study by the U. of California-Berkeley School of Social Welfare.

CIA RECRUITING EFFORTS at Arizona State U. prompted two students to pass out flyers urging students to ignore the recruiters. "We're not a student group," said one. "We're just . . . a couple of pissed-off students who got together to alert other students about the kind of atrocities the CIA has committed."

COLLEGE DEGREES ARE WORTH MORE to male students now than at any time since the 1960s, according to a new Census Bureau study. Male college graduates can expect to earn 39 percent more than men who quit school after high school.

HEALTH CENTER FEES are about to go up, and services to be cut back, on campuses around the country, according to the American College Health Association. Increasingly large court awards in malpractice suits are driving insurance rates up, and causing some companies to refuse coverage.

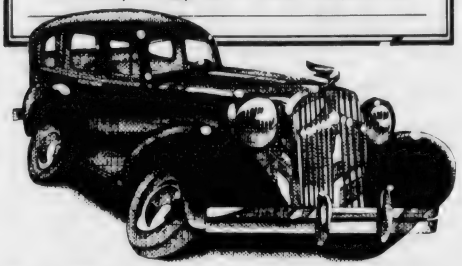
TIMES HAVE CHANGED: In 1940, 38 percent of Americans at least 29 years old had a high school diploma, and 6 percent had a college degree. Today, 86 percent have a high school diploma and 22 percent a college degree.

"I DON'T RENT TO BLACK PEOPLE ANYWAY." That's what an on-campus agent for the University Rental Service told a Northwestern U. student when she tried to rent a refrigerator. The company fired the agent and apologized to the student, but NU officials say they will monitor all such companies and bar from campus any found discriminating for race.

"TRAINING," a game in which students jump in front of moving trains to see who can get the closest without being hit, recently claimed the life of a U. of Kansas student.

TELEPHONE REGISTRATION SYSTEMS are gaining in popularity. The latest addition to a growing list of schools using phone registration is Prairie State College in Illinois, where it will be available only to students registering for fewer than 12 credit hours.

BLACK STUDENTS' GRADUATION RATES, which were 65 percent of that of whites in 1940, improved to 96 percent by 1980.



DRUG USE IN AMERICAN HIGH SCHOOLS, declining for five years, reversed the trend in 1985, according to a U. of Michigan study. Use of marijuana, tranquilizers, barbiturates, alcohol and cigarettes leveled off, and use of cocaine, PCP and opiates other than heroin increased. (CONTACT: Dr. Lloyd Johnston at 313-763-5043.)

COLLEGIATE FISCAL WOES ARE OVER, according to a poll of administrators by the higher Education Panel. The administrators think their schools are on the brink of a more prosperous era. They predict, however, that students will pay even higher tuition over the next few years.

MINORITY STUDENTS ARE RECRUITING for Cornell U. In response to this year's drop in freshman minority enrollment, 15 students donated their fall breaks to recruiting high school students from around the country. Cornell trained tahe recruiters and paid their travel expenses.

ROWDY STUDENT FOOTBALL FANS at the U. of Wisconsisn have gone too far. The UW dean of students says fans ejected from the stadium for vandalism, drinking, body passing or other disruptive behavior should be suspended from school and refused admission to UW football games next year. Student behavior has been so bad that a special committee has been named to evaluate proposals for restoring order.

Nader Back In Limelight

WASHINGTON, D.C. (CPS) — It was 20 years ago last week that Ralph Nader published his first book, and embarked upon a period in which he was very much a national campus hero.

His public challenges of corporate behavior — his first book, "Unsafe At Any Speed," ultimately forced General Motors to take its Corvair model car off the market — GM's retaliatory spying, and his apparently seamless personal integrity made Nader into a potent symbol at the time.

Indeed, through the seventies Nader was able to summon an army of collegiate activists to Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) chapters, which he founded. His supports billed him as the nation's most popular college lecturer, a claim many professional booking agencies confirmed.

But the 20th anniversary of "Unsafe," which prompted a belt law that has saved as many as 150,000 lives to date, finds Ralph Nader a somewhat out-of-step figure on campus.

These days, an authority no less than the Carnegie Foundation calls college students "self-obsessed" and materialistic.

Business classes, of course, typically are the most popular offerings on many campuses.

PIRGs are under continuous — and at times successful — attack from both conservative groups and a widespread campus apathy.

But Nader maintains interest in him and his causes has not waned.

"There is a lot of enthusiasm. A lot of students turn out," Nader says of his most recent lecture tour of the nation's campuses.

The 52-year-old advocate also sees a lot of political concern among students during his tours.

"There are more mechanisms for the activist today," Nader contends, giving not a little credit to his own PIRGs.

Nader also credits the South Africa issue for contributing to increased student political consciousness about some issues, specifically international affairs and world hunger.

Yet Nader is aware of many students' careerist bent these days.

"The computer has attracted people to business courses. You don't see other views (on some campuses)," he says.

So 20 years later, Nader has returned to his original theme of corporate sin and corporate responsibility.

"All you have to do is read the Wall Street Journal to find out there is a corporate crime wave across the nation," says Nader, who thinks as many as two-thirds of the Fortune 500 companies have been convicted of some kind of illegal behavior.

Too few prosecutorial resources are used to fight corporate crime, Nader contends. "Lots of resources are devoted to crime in the street instead of in the suite."

The social implications of the "corporate crime wave" — a deterioration of the morals of the leadership class — are awesome, Nader asserts. "Society is like a fish. It rots from the head down."

He says his PIRGs help fight rot, and argues the PIRGs remain healthy despite some funding losses and a serious court setback earlier this year.

Professors, for example, recently have been more willing to give students credit for their PIRG activities, Nader says, which he says teach students about civic affairs.

Despite some trouble getting PIRGs started in a few states, such as Georgia, and a membership decline in some areas, overall participation is at "an all time high," Nader says.

The most important assault on the ways PIRGs are funded was led by the Mid-Atlantic Legal Foundation in Philadelphia, a group of lawyers funded by prominent industrialists such as Joseph Coors to pursue certain conservative interests.

In September, the Third U.S. Circuit Court ruled the mandatory refundable system of devoting student fees to the PIRG at Rutgers University was illegal.

"The court found that PIRG was fundamentally a political group and educational activities were incidental to that purpose," says Mid-Atlantic Lawyer Joseph Marshall.

The appeals court ruled the PIRG had much educational value, but that the funding system infringes on the First Amendment rights of students who disagree with its stand on various issues.

"As a practical matter, if you are going to be a member, you have to buy the party line," Marshall says.

Nader, however, contends the only legal decisions against PIRG funding have come at Rutgers and the State University System of New York (SUNY), and that those decisions could be overturned.

Leave a clean trail.

Basic Facts About ROTC

College sophomores who did not take Army ROTC the first two years of college can still enter the Advanced Course. The Army ROTC Basic Camp held each summer at Fort Knox, Kentucky, prepares students for the last two years of the ROTC commissioning program.

During the summer of 1985, there were 3,245 students who attended one of the six cycles of Basic Camp. Each student was a US citizen who was medically and academically qualified. Most were sophomores in college. Also, high school graduates who plan to attend a military junior college in the fall are required to attend Basic Camp in order to complete the ROTC program in two years.

The six-week course is tough, demanding, and challenging. It is also realistic. Students learn to read military maps, how to use a compass, how to fire the M-60 machine gun, tactical maneuvering, and they gain experience in expert marksmanship with an M16 rifle, and drill and ceremony. During the Basic Camp training, students learn leadership skills by actually leading other attendees.

Students are paid more than $600 for attending Basic Camp. Transporation to and from camp is furnished and room and board are free.

There were 495 two-year scholarships awarded at the 1985 Basic Camp. These scholarships pay tuition, required education fees, and a specified amount for books, supplies, and equipment. In addition, there's a subsistence allowance of up to $1000 per year for each year the scholarship is in effect.

There are no military obligations for students attending camp.

Information on how to apply for the 1986 Army ROTC Basic Camp is available by contacting CPT Ben Sweger of the Military Science Department located in Room 355 E. Ruffner or by calling 392-9348-9259 for an appointment to discuss Basic Camp. Get the facts!

Canterbury Association

The Episcopal Campus Ministry Association on the Longwood and Hampden-Sydney campuses — open to all students, Episcopalian and non-Episcopalian alike — holds its regular meetings on alternating Wednesday evenings of each month and rotating meetings between the two campuses. The first meeting of this semester will be held on Wednesday, Jan. 22, at 6:30 p.m. in the Campus Ministry Center, located in the basement of the Episcopal Church Parish House, directly across from Longwood's Library. The next program will feature a popular movie — soon to be announced — watch for posters! and an Ice Cream Social afterwards. Come and bring a friend for the fun and socializing!!

The Episcopal Chaplain, Allen Breckenridge, is in his office Monday through Friday, and may be reached at 392-3860 (of.) or 392-8911 (hm.). He is available for counseling, just a friendly chat, or any other help he might be able to give. Please feel free to come by for a visit and relax in the Campus Ministry Center — it's a great place to get away from the hustle and bustle — for study or relaxation!

Future Canterbury meetings will be on the following dates: Wed., Feb. 5 — at Hampden-Sydney — rides leave The Episcopal Center at 6:10 p.m. Wed., Feb. 19 — at Longwood Campus Center.

The Episcopal Campus Ministry also helps sponsor and support other programs on both the Longwood and Hampden-Sydney campuses, such as weekly worship services on the campuses, working closely with the Peace & Justice Action Group or the Inter-Religious Council, or sponsoring the Guitar Interest Group (GIG) held weekly at Hampden-Sydney. For more information contact the Episcopal Chaplain by phone or campus mail.

Our three-year and two-year scholarships won't make college easier.

Just easier to pay for.

Even if you didn't start college on a scholarship, you could finish on one. Army ROTC Scholarships pay for full tuition and allowances for educational fees and textbooks. Along with up to $1,000 a year. Get all the facts. BE ALL YOU CAN BE.

How to live with someone who's living with cancer.

Learning to live with cancer is no easy task. Learning to live with someone else's cancer can be even more difficult.

Nobody knows better than we do how much help and understanding is needed. That's why our service and rehabilitation programs emphasize the whole family, not just the cancer patient.

We run local programs with volunteers who are recovered cancer patients, or whose lives have been touched by family members or friends with cancer. That's what makes us one of the largest, best-motivated and most caring of any health organization in the country.

Among our regular services we provide information and guidance to patients and families, transport patients to and from treatment, supply home care items and assist patients in their return to everyday life.

Life is what concerns us. The life of cancer patients. The lives of their families. So you can see we are even more than the research organization we are so well known to be.

No one faces cancer alone.

Tough Breaks for Wrestlers

By TONY BRZEZICKI

The start of the second half of the 1985-86 Longwood wrestling season began on a sluggish note Friday and Saturday at the Central Virginia Open Tournament on the campus of Liberty University.

Despite numerous tough losses, there were bright spots for the Lancers over the weekend. Sophomore Pete Whitman went 3-2 at 150 pounds to lead Longwood. He won by scores of 3-2 and 7-6, picked up a default and dropped decisions to grapplers from William & Mary (13-9) and Liberty (10-5).

The Lancers, 3-2 in dual matches, visit Newport News Apprentice Tuesday evening for a 5:00 bout and travel back to Lynchburg Saturday to take on the Flames and George Washington.

Longwood's top wrestler John Stukes, who had a good shot at qualifying for NCAA Division II Nationals, has been declared academically ineligible for second semester action. Stukes had a sparkling 14-1 record at 134 pounds first semester.

The sophomore competed unattached at Liberty over the weekend and went 3-1 to finish second at 134 pounds in the individual tournament. He lost in the championship match 10-8 after leading 8-3.

"Losing John is a tough blow to our team," said coach Steve Nelson. "He did an outstanding job for us in the first half of the season. It's too bad he won't have the opportunity to pursue his second straight trip to nationals. We hope he can come back strong next season."

Player of the Week

Junior Melanie Lee turned in a consistent three-game stretch of scoring and rebounding for Longwood's women's basketball team last week, and for her efforts, Lee has been named Longwood College Player of the Week for the period January 12-19. Player of the Week is chosen by the Longwood Sports Information Office.

Lee scored 44 points and grabbed 36 rebounds in three games as the Lady Lancers won one of the three last week. The 5-11 center hit 20 of 42 field goal attempts and averaged 14.6 points and 12 rebounds per game.

"Melanie has done a good job for us with her scoring and rebounding," said Lady Lancer coach Shirley Duncan. "She has played well for the most part, and we're looking for her to continue improving."

Lee had 12 points and 15 rebounds in Saturday's 91-73 loss at Maryland Baltimore County. She had 18 points and 11 rebounds in a 53-45 loss to William & Mary Thursday and 14 points and 10 rebounds in a 78-70 victory over Randolph-Macon Tuesday.

For the season she is averaging 14.1 points and 7.7 rebounds while hitting 51.7 per cent of her shots from the floor.

Last season she averaged 7.8 points and 6.8 rebounds, hitting 48.8 per cent of her shots from the floor.

A graduate of Indian River High School in Chesapeake, Virginia, Melanie is majoring in social work at Longwood.

Therapeutic Rec Showcase

"Come on down . . ." to Longwood's first annual Therapeutic Recreation Showcase on Tuesday, January 28, from 9:30-4:00 p.m. in the Lankford Student Union. Next Tuesday, over twenty Therapeutic Recreation professionals are coming to Longwood to share information and experiences about the profession with Longwood College students and prospective majors. They will be displaying information about their facilities and be available to talk to anyone interested in this field. The different facilities represented will include community hospitals, mental retardation facilities, psychiatric hospitals, nursing care centers, community recreation centers, and rehabilitation centers. Interview opportunities will be available in the afternoon. (Contact Box 1158 or Dr. Hupp in ths HPER department). Certain guests will be involved in two separate panel discussions, each on an issue of current interest in the field of Therapeutic Recreation. One discussion will be held in the morning, the other in the afternoon.

Therapeutic Recreation is a process of helping others maintain or improve their mental, physical, emotional and/or social functioning. Treatment, leisure education, and recreational opportunities are provided to assist individuals to experience independent lifestyles. Longwood has a national reputation for one of the finest curriculums in Therapeutic Recreation in the United States. It was the first curriculum in the nation with a specific singular degree in Therapeutic Recreation to be accredited by the National Recreation and Park Association-American Association for Leisure and Recreation Joint Council on Accreditation. The large response to the invitations to our showcase show that professionals in this field highly regard our program and its students.

Still not sure what Therapeutic Recreation is all about? This showcase can be yours, if you'll come on down. The price is right . . . it's free!

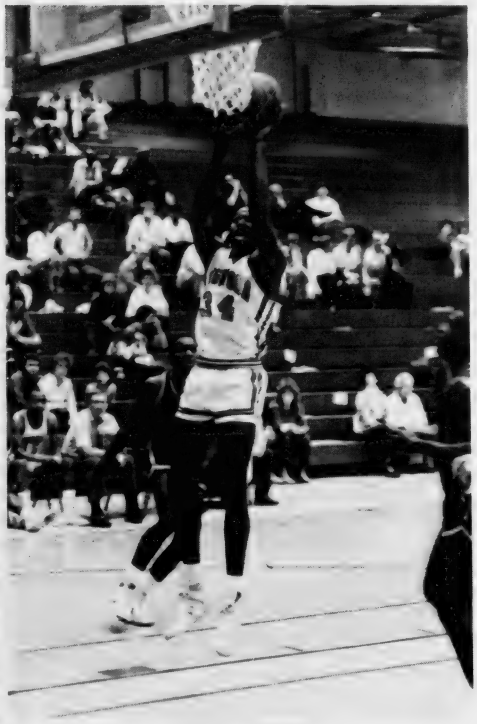
Lancer Basketball

Senior forward Lionell Ogburn turned in the top performance of his career Saturday night, scoring 22 points to lead Longwood to a resounding 89-68 basketball triumph over visiting Maryland Baltimore County in a Mason-Dixon Conference contest.

Lancer coach Cal Luther is hoping for more such heroics this week as the conference race heats up. Longwood(1-1, 5-10) hosts Liberty University Wednesday night at 7:30 and visits Pittsburgh-Johnstown Saturday at 2:00 in a full week of Mason-Dixon Conference action.

With an exceptionally tough pre-conference schedule behind them, the Lancers have hopes of making some noise in the MDAC. A 60-56 setback at Randolph-Macon Wednesday put those plans on hold, but Longwood was back in top form Saturday night when the Retrievers came to call.

Ogburn lit a fire under Longwood in both halves before a Longwood Basketball Alumni Day crowd in Lancer Hall. He came off the bench in the first half to score six points as the Lancers forged a 40-27 halftime edge. His return in the second half ignited another rally which put the Retrievers (1-11, 0-2) away for good.



A 6-3 forward who has spent considerable time on the bench this season, Ogburn bagged eight of nine field goal attemps and six of nine free throws to get his 22 points. The Wheaton High School graduate seemed to be in the right place at the right time as he scored layup after layup off the Lancer fast break. He came into the contest scoring 3.7 points per game.

Ogburn had given an indication of things to come at Macon Wednesday night when he scored six points off the bench. His play last week serves notice that Longwood reserves are capable of being a factor in the weeks ahead.

Senior co-captains Kenneth Fields and Lonnie Lewis also played well as did junior guard Kevin Ricks. Fields had 17 points and six rebounds, Lewis 13 points, four assists and four steals and Ricks added 12 points, four assists and three steals.

With the victory Longwood ended a four-game losing streak. The Lancers shot 59 per cent and delighted the home crowd with a fast-breaking offense.

Heading into this week's action Lewis (18.9 ppg.), Fields (18.7 ppg.) and center Quintin Kearney(11.4 ppg.), rank as the top Longwood point producers. Fields has hit double figures in each of the Lancers' 15 games.

Campus Notes

The Longwood Company of Dancers are now holding try-outs for those interested in joining the Dance Company. Try-outs actually began yesterday with a practice session, but there will be one more practice on Wednesday, January 22, from 4:00-5:30 p.m., before the actual auditions begin on Thursday, January 23, 3:30-5:00 p.m. It is not mandatory to attend both practice sessions before the audition. However, the material that you are judged on in the audition is covered in practice and therefore attendance is recommended.

Anyone who is interested in trying-out should come properly dressed to the Lancer Dance Studio at the times previously mentioned. All students are encouraged to attend — especially males!

Foxy Lady Tourney

Longwood's women's basketball team (3-7, 0-2) will be looking for some consistency on the road after an up and down 1-2 mark in games last week. Coach Shirley Duncan's squad visits Liberty University Tuesday night for a 7:30 contest and will take part in the eight-team Foxy Lady Tournament Thursday through Saturday at Francis Marion College in Florence, South Carolina.

After starting the week with a 78-70 win over Randolph-Macon last Tuesday, Longwood fell to visiting William & Mary 53-45 Thursday and dropped a 91-73 decision to Mason-Dixon Conference foe Maryland Baltimore County on the road Saturday night.

Against UMBC, Longwood trailed by just six points at 39-33 in the second half until the Retrievers went on a 19-4 tear to go up 58-37 with 14:02 left in the game.

"We had a number of turnovers in that stretch," said Longwood coach Shirley Duncan. "We had played pretty well up until then."

Guard Caren Forbes scored 21 points and handed off a season-high nine assists for Longwood, and center Melanie Lee added 12 points and 15 rebounds. The Lady Lancers were unable to get the kind of balanced scoring they exhibited in last week's win over R-MC.

Lee had 18 points and 11 rebounds in Thursday's game with William & Mary. The Lady Lancers led 25-23 at the half, but the Indians pulled away late in the game behind superior rebounding.

Longwood will be out to improve its 0-2 MDAC mark against the Lady Flames Tuesday night. Thursday, St. Augustine's, a CIAA team with exceptional height, will face the Lady Lancers in the first round of the Foxy Lady Tournament. Other teams in the field include Francis Marion, Wingate, Coastal Carolina, Limestone, Belmont Abbey, and USC-Spartanburg.

Alumni Reunion

Saturday was a special day for 19 former Longwood College basketball players who journeyed back to their alma mater for an Alumni Basketball Game and reunion.

Eight members of 1979-80 team which advanced to the NCAA Division III Final Four were on hand for Basketball Alumni Day.

LONGWOOD REUNION PLAYERS

Shack Leonard, Randy Johnson, Thomas Alston, Kevin Newton, Joe Goydish, Byron Bracey, Orlando Turner and Jim Sixsmith were members of the 1979-80 squad who visited the college Saturday.

Also back for the weekend were: Steve Bianco, Jimmy Yarbrough, Pete Hofrichter, Earl Witcher, Rob Fleming, Bay Thornhill, Dalany Brown, Eliot Hedley, Mike McCroey, David Strothers and Guy DeLaudarantaye.

Leonard led the Blue team to a 91-90 victory over the White team in the Alumni Game Saturday afternoon. The guard poured in 27 points and hit the deciding technical free throw with one second showing on the clock. Other Blue team leaders were Johnson with 18 points, Witcher with 17 and Thornhill with 10.

McCroey topped the White team with 30 points while Strothers had 18 and Brown 13.

The alumni cagers were recognized at halftime of the Longwood-Maryland Baltimore County game and attended a social in their honor sponsored by the Longwood Alumni Association and the Lancer Club.

Gymnastics

Freshman Linda Chenoweth led the way as Longwood's gymnastics team came out with a win and two losses in meets at Maryland Baltimore County and Navy over the weekend.

In their initial action since the Christmas break, the Lancers fell for the first time ever to UMBC 153.70 to 149.75 Friday night. George Washington took first in a three-team meet at Navy Saturday night with GW scoring 150.3, Longwood 147.2 and Navy 143.7.

Chenoweth was Longwood's top all-around performer in both meets. Against UMBC, she was the all-around meet winner with a score 31.75. She earned a first in floor with an 8.3 and a second in beam with an 8.25. Lisa Zuraw was second in vaulting with an 8.65 and Keri Hruby was fourth in vaulting with an 8.50.

At Navy Saturday, Chenoweth was third all-sround with a 30.55. Sophomore Leslie Jaffee won a first in vaulting with an 8.5 and was third in bars with a 7.3.

"We were leading the meet at Navy through the first three events, but we lost it on beam," said a disappointed Longwood coach Ruth Budd.

Now 2-3 for the season, the Lancers visit William & Mary Friday night for a meet which begins at 7:00. In December The Tribe defeated Longwood 162.05 to 151.50 in a three-team meet at James Madison.

SURVEY:

Freshmen More Materialistic

LOS ANGELES, CA (CPS) — College students increasingly are interested in money, but they'll make it as businesspeople, not computer scientists or engineers, says UCLA's 20th annual survey of new college freshmen.

The proportion of freshmen planning to major in computer science and pursue computing careers has dropped by 50 percent in just two years. Only 4.4 percent of the Class of 1989 aspire to be computer programmers or analysts, compared to 6.1 percent last year and 8.8 percent in 1983.

Declining interest in computer careers parallels dwindling interest in engineering. Ten percent of respondents plan to pursue engineering careers, down from 12 percent two years ago.

"Taken together, this decline in student interest in technological careers stands in stark contrast to the growing national concern for increasing technological training in our schools and colleges," says the survey's director, UCLA Professor Alexander Astin.

The decline, however, corresponds with diminishing demands for engineers in the job market.

Recent surveys by the College Placement Council, Michigan State and Northwestern all found American businesses plan to hire fewer engineering and computer science majors this year.

But Astin says students' declining interest in high tech is "all the more remarkable" considering the emphasis secondary schools place on computer education. He speculates that as students become more familiar with computers in high school, they are "less inclined to pursue it as a career and more inclined to view it as a tool for use in other fields."

Among the 200,000 freshmen surveyed nationwide, business and teaching drew the most significant increase in interest.

The proportion of entering students aspiring to business careers — an area showing rising interest since the 1970s — increased to an all-time high of 23.9 percent, more than twice the proportion recorded in the 1972 survey.

For the third straight year, elementary and secondary school teaching rose slightly to 6.2 percent, although Astin adds "we still have a long way to go" before there are enough teachers "to meet the nation's current and future needs."

Astin was surprised to discover students' social attitudes are going to extremes — sometimes in opposite directions.

Seventy-three percent of the freshmen oppose increased defense spending, up 12 percent from three years ago, and 73.3 percent — four percent more than last year — say the wealthy should pay a larger share of taxes than they do now.

But conservative attitudes are equally strong. Almost half of all freshmen think homosexuality should be outlawed, and a record low — 21.8 percent — want marijuana legalized.

By contrast, almost 53 percent of 1977's freshmen favored legalizing marijuana.

And while the Class of 1989 says the rich should pay more taxes, members would like to be among them.

Seventy-one percent of the freshmen say "being very well-off financially" is "essential" or "very important."

About the same number of students agreed with the statement that "The chief benefit of a college education is that it increases one's earning power."

In 1973, only 55.8 percent of freshmen agreed with that sentiment, while just 39.1 percent of 1970's freshmen felt being well-off financially was important.

Poorer students are finding it increasingly difficult to go to college. This year's survey showed a five percent drop in students whose parents make less than $15,000 annually.

Now, only 15.9 percent of students come from low income families, while 24.5 percent of all freshmen's parents make $15,000 to $29,999.

Ethridge to student-teach in Korea

Amy Ethridge soon will make history for Longwood College.

The senior will become apparently the first Longwood student to student-teach outside the state of Virginia. In fact, she will teach a long way from the Old Dominion.

Ethridge will do her student-teaching in Seoul, South Korea.

"I'm either a pioneer or a guinea pig, whichever way you want to look at it," laughed the English major from Bowling Green.

She will student-teach at the Seoul International School, a private, English-speaking school with students from more than 35 countries, said Dr. Robert Gibbons, director of student teaching. The school, which has 600 to 800 students in grades K-12, is owned and operated by Edward B. Adams, a cousin of Dr. James Adams, Longwood's vice president for academic affairs. It was founded in 1973 and is accredited, which is required for state teaching certification.

"Quite a few" of the students are American, but there are no Koreans — they are prohibited by law from attending the school, Dr. Adams said. Many of the students are children of embassy personnel and industrialists, he said. Nearly all go on to college; many attend Ivy League schools.

Longwood President Janet D. Greenwood visited the school during a college presidents' trip to the Orient last October that was sponsored by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities.

Ethridge, 21, will fly to Seoul February 2 from National Airport outside Washington. She will teach for the required 10 weeks. She will teach high school English, which is what she plans to teach after graduating in May.

During her stay, she will live with a Korean family in Seoul in exchange for tutoring their children in English one hour a day. "I'll be riding a school bus or van to school every day with my students, so it'll be like being in the first grade again," said Ethridge.

Seoul, with eight million people, is one of the world's largest and fastest growing cities. It will host the 1988 Summer Olympics. It is a surprisingly clean city and crime is not a problem, said Dr. Adams, who was born in Seoul.

Ethridge is undaunted by the prospect of teaching in a foreign country. "I love traveling," she said. "The only place I've ever been outside the United States is Nassau. But I've traveled a lot inside the country . . .I'm sure it will be fun and will be a good experience."

"It all started when I saw a notice on the bulletin board that said, 'If you want to student-teach in Asia, come see me,' " she recalled. "I thought it was a joke, but I decided to ask about it anyway."

Gibbons confirmed that she probably is the first Longwood student to student-teach in a foreign country. "I've been here 17 years, and as far as I know, she is the first to even student-teach outside the state of Virginia," he said.

Because she will be overseas, Ethridge will be excused from attending her second set of "modules," a three-week program of mini-courses for prospective teachers. "But I'll still have to do the work. I'll be taking my books with me." She'll return in time for Commencement on May 17.

Ethridge, a graduate of Caroline County High School, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Hicks, of Bowling Green. She is a member of the Longwood Ambassadors, a student public-relations group, and Alpha Delta Pi sorority.

Longwood hopes to continue to place student-teachers in foreign countries. "We already have a lot of interest in next year's senior class for student-teaching abroad," said Gibbons.

SGA

The New Student Government Association is trying to put together a proposal for a more workable visitation policy. This proposal will be presented to the Board of Visitors during their next meeting. Twenty-three and one-half hour visitation will be discussed.

Bring your support and ideas to the Virginia Room at 12:15 on Thursday, January 30.

My Page

"I was trying to go back to sleep after deciding to blow off P.T. (Physical Training)...I heard this loud explosion. It sounded like a shotgun in the stairwell, that's how loud it was. Then the familiar fire alarm."

That was how a R.O.T.C. candidate described the early stages of the Curry fire on Thursday morning. Apparently some loser woke up early or stayed up late in order to toss some type of fireworks down the trash chute. The garbage at the bottom of the chute then caught on fire. The smoke rose and escaped through broken doors that will not close.

I will not waste ink raging on the lunatic who caused this fire. This homicidal human facsimile is a rare example of what happens when beastiality and exotic drug-use are combined without contraception. This person has obviously slipped through the near-flawless Longwood admissions system which has even the highest-ranked high school prospectives biting their nails. A shoe-in for the Quadaffi Scholarship, this hiney-wipe is destined to go down in the anals of mass murder history when he-she discovers a more effective way to incinerate hundreds of people.

This fire has brought my attention back to yesteryear, when I had the opportunity to enjoy the fire drills, broken elevators and charming R.E.C.S. that make the high-rise high-life so very special.

I remembered how those trash chutes are on weekends and went over to Frazier to relive those sweet memories.

First we should review basic trash-chute operation (I used to be head-guy-in-charge of one of these babies before I decided to get educated).

There is a little closet type room on every floor with a hatch in it. You put the trash in the hatch and it falls down the chute, a light sensor in a big compactor tells the machine to compact all the trash into big squares. When the square gets to a certain size, the machine turns itself off. Then your head-guy-in-charge of the trash pushes the big square away so the machine can make a new one. But if he is asleep or talking to some chick, the garbage builds up in the chute. Then the head-guy-in-charge must climb up in the chute and pull all the trash out. This teaches the head-guy-in-charge to either: A) stop talking to chicks or B) go get educated.

The point is, however, at Longwood the head-guy-in-charge of the trash chute isn't talking to chicks or getting educated, he just isn't paid to move the big squares on weekends.

Every weekend the story is the same. Trash builds up higher and higher in the chute, sometimes the chute is backed up all the way to the 4th or 5th floor. This gets very nasty, considering some of the things that Longwoodians throw away.

On second floor Frazier, the hatch has broken off, so the trash fills the room. Inevitably, some jerk will come along and open the door and the crap flies out like it was Fred Flintstone's closet. Only it's not bowling balls and golf clubs, it's a slimy grungy mess only comparable to the green stuff from the bed scene in "The Exorcist". Or that stuff that came from the basement in "The Amityville Horror", only not as thick.

If somebody dropped fireworks in the trash chute on a weekend, Farmville would witness its first nuclear-type mushroom cloud.

This sanitational travesty is a health hazard, and a fire hazard, plus it is gross. Having the head-guy-in-charge push the squares away on weekends would be ten times cheaper than having a whole crew clean the mess on Monday.

One end of Longwood runs around trying to catch and crucify the students who ignite, while the other end stacks the wood in perfect piles to be burned.

To The Editor:

In the January 21st Rotunda, James Caleb is quoted as saying that people who view the return of Halley's Comet as a marketing opportunity have some definite reasons: they are "trying to make a name for themselves . . . (or to) use that for a stepping stone for other products . . . But, I think that most of them are just in for a fast buck. I don't believe people when they tell me that they are not in it for the money or they aren't in it for something. They must have some goal in mind or else they wouldn't be doing it in the first place."

I do not know if Mr. Caleb was quoted correctly or if, after some reflection, he would continue to maintain this view. However, I do know that the view attributed to him rests on a confusion and is false.

The confusion is between the goal of an action and the person who has that goal. The fact that my actions are mine does not mean or imply that the goal of my actions is me. It is true that a person involved in marketing a product or any other action, if their action is not random, unmotivated behavior, must have some goal or purpose in mind. It is false that a person's purpose must always be to make money or otherwise advance their own self-interest.

For example, someone might admit that smoking is a harmful addiction which does not advance her self-interest, and yet continue to smoke. That such a person may admit this, and yet continue to smoke, does not show that her self-interest was really, at the moment of lighting up, to have a smoke. It shows instead that there is also a difference between immediate pleasure-seeking and long term self-interst.

The point that not all human actions are self-interested can be made, and has just been made, without any appeal to examples of altruistic or self-sacrificing actions. There is nothing sentimental, soft-headed, or unrealistic in denying the view attributed to Mr. Caleb, known to philosophers as "psychological egoism." Psychological egoism was first refuted by Joseph Butler in the 18th century, and today is accepted by almost nobody who has considered the matter carefully, whatever its apparent popularity in marketing circles may be.

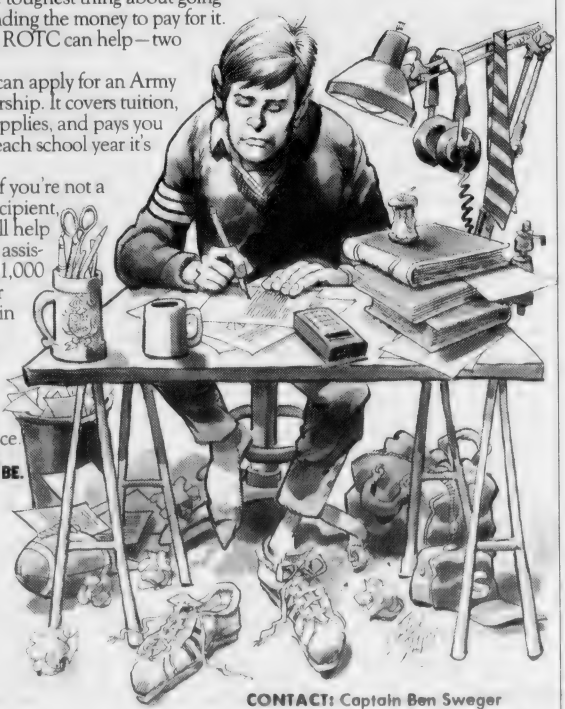
EVEN STRAIGHT A'S CAN'T HELP IF YOU FLUNK TUITION.

Today, the toughest thing about going to college is finding the money to pay for it.



But Army ROTC can help—two ways!

First, you can apply for an Army ROTC scholarship. It covers tuition, books, and supplies, and pays you up to $1,000 each school year it's in effect.

But even if you're not a scholarship recipient, ROTC can still help with financial assistance—up to $1,000 a year for your last two years in the program.

State Board Names College Longwood

Wednesday, March 30, 1949

Beginning with the 1949 summer session, this college will be known as Longwood College, according to the decision of the State Board of Education at its regular monthly meeting last Friday. This action of the Board marks the fourth time within the past 65 years that the name has been changed.

President Dabney S. Lancaster first proposed that the name be changed during the January meeting of the Board. That body agreed to take action on his request in its March meeting and designated its entire membership as a committee to decide upon a new appellation. In making its decision, it was guided by the suggestions and opinions of the students, faculty members, alumnae, and friends of the College. The actual change was made under authority granted to the Board by the General Assembly in 1938 when it passed an act permitting the colleges at Harrisonburg and Fredericksburg to change their names. This act stated that the Board could change the name of the college at Farmville at a later date in the event that the change was requested.

Although "Longwood College" was the favorite choice of what President Lancaster terms a "tremendous majority" of the students, alumnae, and faculty members, there was not complete agreement among the Board members as to the new name. Their final decision was influenced by the fact that the Longwood estate is an integral part of the campus and that it is one of the better-known Southside homes of historic importance. It is the site of the birthplace of General Joseph E. Johnston of the Confederate army, being originally a colonial grant to the Johnston family from the British crown. Later the property passed into the hands of the Venable family. The present home was the birthplace of Colonel Charles Venable, a member of General E. Lee's staff and for twenty years chairman of the University of Virginia faculty, a position equivalent to the present-day presidency of the University.

Commenting on the change, President Lancaster said: "I believe that under the new name the college will go forward to new heights, new attainments, and will serve the State in an ever increasing fashion."

Editor Pushed Out For 'Vulgar' Article

NEW YORK, NY (CPS) — Pace University officials last week appointed a campus paper editor to replace the one they recently pushed out of office for publishing a "vulgar" article about AIDS in November.

Former editor Brian Sookram resigned shortly after controversy arose over publication of the article, the second in a series about acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), the illness which the Centers for Disease Control speculates will afflict at least one person on every college campus by the end of the school year.

The article referred to anal intercourse — which many doctors believe is responsible for helping spread the disease — in common "street language," administrators charged.

In response, a faculty committee voted to hold a "hearing" into Sookram's behavior and to freeze the budget of The Pace Press until a replacement was found.

The administration also seized 3,000 copies of the paper before they could be distributed.

"It was not meant to be vulgar," Sookram says. "It was appropriate for the purpose of the series because of the nature of the disease. That sort of language can relate to most people."

By freezing the paper's funds, the faculty council effectively stopped The Pace Press from publishing for weeks because there was no money with which to operate, a newspaper staffer says.

Sookram resigned before the hearing took place. "I decided to resign to get the paper running again rather than prolong it to the 9th (of December), the date of the hearing," Sookram says.

Some other journalists see the affair as a censorship case.

"I think it's outrageous," says Paul Ryan, student paper editor at the Pace sister campus in Pleasantville, N.Y. The faculty council "set a very dangerous precedent."

Pace officials did not reply to College Press Service's requests for an interview.

Sookram certainly is not the first student editor to ruffle the feathers of faculty and administrators.

In November, members of the Wayne State University Publications Board fired the editor of The South End in response to an editorial explaining the editor's decision not to accept military advertising in the paper.

Administrators subsequently reinstated the editor's First Amendment rights.

In 1983, administrators at Howard University in Washington, D.C., expelled the student editor of the school paper for her coverage of alleged sex discrimination at the university.

A district judge in Washington, D.C., however, ordered the editor re-enrolled within a month of her expulsion.

In recent years, administrators censored material or restricted editors at Calvin College and California Polytechnic State University, among other schools.

The most notorious incident was at Baylor in 1982, when students editorialized against administrators' threats to expel students who appeared unclothed in an upcoming Playboy magazine feature.

In response, Baylor officials cancelled three editors' scholarships.

The lone Baylor woman ultimately appeared in Playboy subsequently was awarded her diploma quietly during a summer session.

General campus reaction to the current conflict at Pace has been minimal.
